Mr. LORD. I must resume the floor. This question has been before the Congress for nearly eight months, and has been pressed upon our attention by the President, by the press, and by the most distinguished republican leader in the House. The Committee on the Judiciary have unanimously adopted his amendment almost in his verbis. I will say that the gentleman who introduced the amendment—and I know his views upon this question, for he stated them to me more than once—never contended that such amendment to the Constitution, which was drawn by him, conferred any legislative power on Congress whatever, and he never intended that it should. But inasmuch as this question, as said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] is one that has been watched with some jealousy and inasmuch as several Congresses in the adoption of past amendments have added a clause to each amendment declaratory of the power of Congress, it was deemed wise to add to this article that it should not "vest, diminish, or enlarge" legislative power in Congress. It was understood by the committee, and I believe that on reflection it will without exception be understood by the House, that this additional clause does not in any manner change the preceding part of the proposed article. It is simply declaratory; more than this, if Congress had any power over the question before, it is thoroughly and absolutely reserved. The criticism, therefore, of the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] falls utterly to the ground, because the proposed amendment provides that this article shall not "vest, diminish, or enlarge" the power of the Congress. Mark the words, "shall not diminish the power of the Congress." Therefore if the Congress has any power now, under any possible view, over the subject-matter of the proposed amendment, such power remains in full force and vigor. The words of limitation only apply to the proposed article; I repeat, any power the Congress has under the Constitution is expressly affirmed and reserved. Therefore, so far from the power of the Congress in the premises being affected, even to the thousandth part of a hair, we affirm that any power that the Constitution has vested in the Congress heretofore will be there when this constitutional amendment is adopted by the States. And we allege that the proposed article, with the addition made by the committee, will be submitted precisely as its author intended it should be. Under these circumstances I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will order the yeas and nays to be now called, as this is a proposed amendment to the Constitution, and it requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 180, nays 7, not voting 98: as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ainsworth, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Bell, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Williams, Wilshire, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Young—98.

So (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the joint resolution was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. COCHRANE. My colleague, Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, is absent by leave of the House on account of sickness.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. WALLING, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. JOHN REILLY. My colleague, Mr. JAMES B. REILLY, is absent on important business by leave of the House.

Mr. RICE. My colleague, Dr. COWAN, is detained at home on account of injuries received by a fall from his carriage; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HARTZELL. My colleague, Mr. SPARKS, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague, Mr. BLISS, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HARDENBERGH. My colleague, Mr. ROBERT HAMILTON, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. WALDRON, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. WILLARD. My colleagues, Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS and Mr. BRADLEY, are absent by leave of the House; if present they would both vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CASWELL. My colleagues, Mr. CHARLES G. WILLIAMS and Mr. MAGOON, are both absent on leave; if here they would vote "ay."

Mr. STEVENSON. My colleague, Mr. CAMPBELL, is absent by reason of sickness; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague, Mr. FULLER, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HANCOCK. My colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, is absent from the House on account of sickness; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. PIERCE. My colleague, Mr. CRAPO, is absent; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague, Mr. ODELL, is absent on account of sickness; if present he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LORD. The gentleman from Maryland, Mr. O'BRIEN, went home this afternoon, under the impression that this joint resolution would not be voted upon this afternoon. He desired to be heard upon it, so he told me, for four or five minutes. I ask unanimous consent that he be granted leave to have printed in the RECORD a five-minute speech on this subject.

Mr. RUSK. Twenty-five, if he wants it.

No objection was made; and Mr. O'BRIEN was accordingly granted leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the proposed constitutional amendment.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DUNNELL. The Speaker did me the honor this morning to appoint me one of the managers on the part of the House upon the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. Since then I have received a telegram which makes it necessary for me to leave town this evening. I therefore ask to be excused from service on that conference.

No objection was made, and Mr. DUNNELL was excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Mr. CONGER in place of Mr. DUNNELL.

Mr. WILLARD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

COUNTERFEIT TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. SAMPSON. I desire to call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 846) to punish counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods. This bill has been returned from the Senate, where the amendments of the House have been disagreed to. The Senate requests a conference with the House and has appointed managers for that purpose. I move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAMPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, Mr. HARTZELL, and Mr. SAMPSON as the conferees on the part of the House.

WILLIAM B. THOMAS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the permission of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] who has moved that the House adjourn, I ask to submit for reference to the Committee of Accounts a resolution designed to correct a mistake in the settlement of the accounts of one of the employés of the House.

Mr. HEREFORD. What is the amount?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Fifty-nine dollars.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby instructed and authorized to pay to William B. Thomas $59.34 for services rendered in the Doorkeeper's department from April 1 to April 15, 1876, inclusive.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

CLERK FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the subcommittee on foreign affairs, having in charge the investigation of the Venezuelan mixed commission, be, and they are hereby, allowed to employ a clerk from the 16th day of July, 1876, to the close of the present session; and the compensation of said clerk shall be fixed at $4 per day.

COMMISSION ON RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. BANNING and Mr. HURLBUT as members on the part of the House of the commission upon the subject of reform and re-organization of the Army, as provided for in the fourth section of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 361) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory.

HARO ARCHIPELAGO, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to House bill No. 3878 for the relief of settlers on San Juan, Orcas, and other Islands in the Haro Archipelago, San Juan County, Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. BUCKNER indefinitely;

To Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, indefinitely;

To Mr. DOBBINS for six days;

To Mr. ABBOTT for ten days from August 5;

To Mr. MILLIKEN indefinitely from Monday next;

To Mr. DUNNELL for two weeks; and

To Mr. LE MOYNE for ten days.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WILLARD that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. GOODIN: The petition of J. H. Rogers, electrician of the House of Representatives, for the appointment of a special committee to examine and report upon the probable cost and efficiency of his plan of taking the vote of the House of Representatives and for calling pages thereof, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of James Burk, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, asking that certain lands along the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad reserved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office from sale or settlement be restored to entry and sale, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of California, asking for legislation that will cheapen telegraphic facilities for the State of California, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 5, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, and was interrupted by Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal. There is nobody here, and there is no use reading it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the further reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate take a recess for one hour. I do not believe in two or three people coming here and waiting.

Mr. HARVEY. I hope not. I think a call of the Senate will be better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate take a recess for one hour.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 3, noes 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

The Secretary called the roll, and sixteen Senators answered to their names.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

After some delay, twenty more Senators having entered the Chamber,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at eleven o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m.) announced that there was a quorum present.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, reported it without amendment, the committee adopting the report of the House committee.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating the offer of the State of Texas and the International and Great Northern Railway Company to donate to the United States the land upon which Fort Elliott is built, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill.

The bill (S. No. 1031) to authorize the Secretary of War to accept a conveyance of the site of Fort Elliott, Texas, was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. LOGAN. I also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2653) making appropriations for the improvement and repair of the military road between Springfield and Fort Randall, in the Territory of Dakota, report it without amendment. I was instructed by the committee to refer the bill to the Secretary of War for information. Having received the information, which shows the necessity of the bill, I take the responsibility of reporting it back, that it may go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

MARY A. ALLEN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1496) granting a pension to Mary A. Allen was indefinitely postponed, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] making the report, be reconsidered, in order that it may be placed on the Calendar. I think it is a bill that ought to be considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the vote indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1032) authorizing the appointment of a commission to consider the expediency of issuing a silver dollar and making the same a legal tender; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to counting the electoral votes. I made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and I thought that my motion was still pending. The other day when it was called up I was told that the reconsideration had been ordered. I now propose that we take up the bill and act upon it without any debate, in order that it may go to the House of Representatives to see whether an agreement can be arrived at. I therefore ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose it will take but a moment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall not interpose any objection if my friend from Ohio——

Mr. THURMAN. I propose that we just vote upon the bill at once.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I shall not object.

By unanimous consent, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. The yeas and nays were ordered before, and were taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know.

Mr. THURMAN. If we order the yeas and nays it may give rise to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It need not give rise to any debate, but I do not want the bill to pass without my name appearing voting for or against it on the record, as it is a bill of great importance, and otherwise might appear as if passed by unanimous consent. I therefore, as everybody agreed it ought to be acted upon by yeas and nays before, ask for the yeas and nays again; it will not take any time. I do not propose to debate it at all.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I ask that the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is the Clerk reading the bill as amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One amendment was made to it. The Clerk is reading it as it stands on its passage as amended.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

That the Senate and House of Representatives shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the last Wednesday in January next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; two tellers shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed as they are opened by the President of the Senate the certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. If upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw and said question shall be submitted to the body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately re-assemble, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return and that only from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

SEC. 3. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once: Provided, That after such debate has lasted two hours it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 4. At such joint meeting of the two Houses, seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to be heard one moment in order to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. I notice that this bill, which it is proposed to make an act of Congress, provides for the length of the time that any Senator or Representative may speak when the Senate is acting separately and the House is acting separately. I wish to know if that is not trenching upon the constitutional power of each House to make its own rules to regulate its own proceedings.

Mr. THURMAN. The joint rule heretofore adopted prohibited all debate, and it seems to have been held good. No question was ever made in respect of that rule. If we have the right to legislate upon this subject, as I think we have—and this whole bill goes upon that foundation—then I think we have a right to regulate the mode of procedure so that it shall not be defeated, as it otherwise might be, by the consumption of time in speaking.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you might pass a law as to all bills.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio if this is not the precise condition of things: The Senate makes its own rule; the House make their own rules; when the two bodies are together it is neither the House nor the Senate, but a convention, and this will be a convention agreed upon by both branches.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the bill refers to their action when they are separate. Your answer would be perfect when they acted together.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose the object of the vote is to have this bill referred to a committee of conference. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio whether it would not be a better plan to reconsider the vote upon the third reading and to make the bill here as we think it ought to be.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not object to that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me, as I recollect the bill, there is an omission in it. There is no provision made in case two sets of returns come up from the same State. That is left open. There was an amendment to meet that difficulty which I offered myself, which I really think is the best one, not because I offered it, but after hearing the whole discussion. I had offered another which I withdrew and presented this one, which was to provide that in that event the question shall be determined by the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that we cannot meet this exigency better than by adopting that amendment. There is, I think, reported to the Senate a constitutional amendment covering this case; but that of course does not apply to the present year. I am not the manager of the bill and do not propose to make any motion, except merely to suggest that we should reconsider the third reading and adopt some amendment providing for that omission in the present bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I have not the least objection to that course; but I suggested that we take the vote on the bill in deference to the opinion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] the chairman of the committee, who reported the bill, and who thought it had better go to the House and let the House amend it, and then the Senate could agree or disagree to their amendment, and in case of disagreement have a committee of conference; but for my own part I am perfectly indifferent which course may be taken. I think something ought to be done, and as time is so short, I am in favor of that course which is most likely to effect the passage of an act on this subject. I confess that I am a little apprehensive of the result if we merely pass this bill as it is, with the objection which prevails on all this side of the Chamber, and which is very weighty with me, which I had great difficulty in overcoming so far as to vote for the bill, that there is no provision made in case of two returns from a State, which was the fatal point in the bill, and which was the cause of nearly every vote on this side of the Chamber being cast against it. Should the bill go in that way to the House of Representatives, I am very apprehensive that nothing will be done, and I would be perfectly willing that the vote should be taken on any one of the propositions that have been made to amend the bill to supply the deficiency of the bill in that respect. I will go further and say that if I can get nothing else I will vote for the amendment, if I understand it correctly, proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, There may be some doubt as to whether that is strictly within the spirit of the Constitution; but I am inclined to think that if we have the power to legislate upon the subject at all we have the power to adopt that amendment, and that is the better impression, although I confess that I am not as clear on it as I should like to be. But rather than let matters stand as they are I would vote for that amendment in the hope that the House might propose even something better, or if they did not, that it might result in a conference committee that would agree upon something better. If the Senator from New Jersey sees fit to move to reconsider the third reading of the bill I shall make no objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will test the view of the Senate by making that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now open to amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the bill be passed over for the present, and taken up after I can prepare the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope it will be with the general understanding that when the amendment is prepared the bill shall be taken up.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That general understanding must take its chances with everything else.

Mr. HOWE. It is to be taken up at some time when nothing else is pending, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asked unanimous consent that it be taken up as soon as the amendment was prepared. The Chair heard no objection to that suggestion, and so stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object, not that I shall make the slightest opposition, but in the present stage of the session we cannot foresee what at any particular moment may be the pending urgency.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then let the bill be laid aside informally, subject to be called up at any time.

Mr. MORTON. Is that the understanding of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion now made by the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORTON. If that is the understanding, then I ask the Senate to take up the resolution I offered several days ago in regard to printing the President's message and accompanying documents and which I gave notice yesterday I should ask the Senate to consider this morning. I move now to proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is morning business. The Senator from Iowa is on the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to call attention to a little bill before the Senator proceeds with his resolution.

Mr. MORTON. If the resolution is taken up I will give way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All of us have a little bill apiece, and it will take all the time.

Mr. MORTON. My friend from Vermont suggests that we all have a little bill. I have one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have one about those poor sailors in that monitor that are going to have their bones blown in the midst of the sea that I want to have the Senate act upon speedily.

Mr. MORTON. I hope my friend from Iowa will allow me to have the resolution taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no wish to yield, but if there is no objection to taking it up I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that I feel bound to oppose taking this matter up. It will be debated.

Mr. MORTON. I propose to submit it to a vote of the Senate.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has yielded to the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Indiana moves the present consideration of the resolution referred to by him.

Mr. THURMAN. Of course I cannot discuss the merits of this resolution upon the proposition to take it up, but I hope the Senate will not take it up, because it will give rise to a very useless debate, in my judgment, a debate occupying time which might be better occupied with the business that is before the Senate and that ought to be attended to in the few days of this session that are left. I think that there is some more important business pending before the Senate and to come before it than printing papers as mere electioneering documents. The Senate has before it now the usual number of copies of this message; it has all before it that is necessary for the information of the Senate or to enable it to inaugurate any legislation that may be proper. There can then be no object whatever in ordering ten thousand copies of this message to be printed at the public expense but to circulate it. That is the whole of it—not for purposes of legislation; for no purpose in the world but——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is debating the merits.

Mr. THURMAN. I say there is much more important business than this before the Senate, and I hope the Senate will not proceed to consider this resolution and waste time upon it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us get up the resolution first.

Mr. MORTON. If I can get a vote on it, I will yield.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the resolution is taken up I wish to say as a member of the Committee on Printing that I did not join in recommending the adoption of the resolution. I feel it my duty to myself as a member of the committee to say that it does not come here with the unanimous consent of the Committee on Printing before this body. If the matter is taken up and becomes a subject of discussion here, I shall have something to say on the merits of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator was not in, I believe, when the report was made which was made by me, and I stated that it was not unanimous and that I would not call it up in the absence of the Senator from Delaware who was opposed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to take up the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MERRIMON, (after having first voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] upon political questions. I believe my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] regards this as a political question and I must observe my pair on this vote. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote and to state that if the Senator from Arkansas were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conover, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Eaton, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, and Withers—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Bruce, Burnside, Clayton, Conkling Davis, Dawes, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, and Whyte—26.

So the motion was agreed to.

PARTITION OF REAL ESTATE.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have a little bill that I do not think will take long. It is a House bill, and it is important that the amendment should be agreed to and sent back to the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask leave to make a report.

Mr. MORTON. There are but a few minutes of the morning hour left and I see a number of Senators rising. I must ask for the disposition of this resolution. I should like to accommodate my friends as a matter of course, but I want this resolution disposed of.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not understand the request of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I would say to my friend from Iowa that while I should like to accommodate him and the Senator from Minnesota and others who have business, there are but a few minutes left and I hope we shall have this resolution disposed of in the morning hour. If I yield to one I must yield to all.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend cannot object to me. I had the floor and yielded to him.

Mr. MORTON. I had the floor when the Senator from Iowa rose.

Mr. WRIGHT. The President pro tempore decided I had the floor and I yielded to the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. If my friend's business does not give rise to any debate, I will not object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am very sure it will not elicit any debate. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3168. I send to the desk the substitute recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3168) relating to partition of real estate in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in all cases of partition in the District of Columbia, the court, in decreeing the partition of any lands and tenements, or any right or interest therein, legal or equitable, may, if it satisfactorily appears that said lands and tenements, or any estate or interest therein, cannot be divided without loss or injury to the parties interested, decree a sale thereof and a division of the money arising from such sale, among the parties, according to their respective rights and interests.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

Mr. MORTON. I now ask for a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the late massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to postpone that order and take up the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to provide for the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the debts of the Pacific railroads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think that this resolution ought to be antagonized by the Pacific Railroad bill or by any other matter. My friend from Ohio suggested a few moments ago that there could be but one object in asking to print 10,000 copies of this message and the accompanying documents, and that that object was to circulate them. I agree with my friend, that is the object; it is to circulate documents and convey the information to the people. It refers to a very important, a very significant transaction, one which the people of this country ought to understand. I regret to observe this morning in reading the letters of Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks that they did not see fit to take notice of this transaction or transactions of a kindred character. They had much to say about the currency, about corruption in office, about civil-service reform, but they had no time and they had no place to say anything in regard to this massacre and this slaughter that has shocked the nation.

There are circumstances attending this slaughter which the country ought to understand, which are of a most significant, of a political, and I may say of a dangerous character. I think that this message ought to be printed with the accompanying documents and put into the hands of the people, and that it is quite as important at this time to attend to this as any other matter that can be brought before the Senate. There has been a great deal of time in the last few months in which to attend to the Pacific Railroad matter, and there will be time hereafter. But now this matter is before the Senate, and I hope it will not be shoved off by any bill to provide for a sinking fund for the Pacific Railroad or for any other purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the purpose of this resolution is admitted. It is merely to print at the public expense an account of a very deplorable transaction that took place in South Carolina—a transaction which, if it has been correctly stated, (and how that is I do not know, for I have seen no authentic account of it,) is one that every good man in the country deplores. There is no necessity of bringing it to the attention of the people of this country in any extraordinary manner in order to secure their condemnation of any such transaction, if, as I say, the transaction is what it has been reported to be, about which I know nothing, as I have already said, having seen no authentic account of that transaction.

But, Mr. President, here is a most extraordinary state of things. Whenever any violence takes place in one section of this Union there are Senators on this floor always ready to print large numbers of copies of accounts of that transaction at the public expense just before an election, while murders may go on again, again, and again, until the very neighborhood is red with blood in other sections of the Union, and not one word is said about them or any proposition made to print any account of them. The reason of this is very apparent indeed. You can have murders in Pennsylvania; you can have Molly Maguires in Pennsylvania slaughtering people; you can have violence in Indiana; you can have people hung up by the neck there without judge or jury; the same thing can take place in Ohio, as it has, and it excites no indignation whatever in the breast of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope the Senator from Ohio will allow me to say one word in regard to Pennsylvania.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. He has referred to murders in Pennsylvania. There have been most horrid murders there, and a great many of them, but the authorities of the State have gone to work as honest officials should do, and have arrested the murderers and have already condemned five or six of them to be hanged, and before they get through with them more than thirty will be hanged until they are dead in the counties of Schuylkill and Carbon alone. Whenever the people of the South will take the same rapid and legal measures to punish those who have committed murders in South Carolina, then I shall be glad to say they have done well; but I see no effort at all in that direction, except that the governor of the State has had a coroner's jury convened and that jury has said that the most foul and atrocious murders have been committed at Hamburgh on a number of harmless and unoffending negroes, and it is believed on all hands that it will be impossible to find any jury in the State that will convict them, for they were negroes and the murderers are whites who feared the equality that the musket and the drill will make between the races under the protection of law. In the State of Pennsylvania every man, of whatever politics he may be, has been vigilant in endeavoring to punish the guilty wretches, and they will all be punished by the most severe punishment that the laws of this country can inflict upon anybody. They will be hanged by the neck until they are dead, dead; all good men will feel that they are safe.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me? I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the murders by the Molly Maguires are considered political murders in Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No, they are not political murders. The murders were always committed by democrats upon men who are not democrats. [Laughter.] But democrats and republicans with equal zeal are striving to convict them.

Mr. THURMAN. That may pass for what it is worth. But now the Senator says that they are punished in Pennsylvania. What right has he to say that they will not be punished in South Carolina; and if they are not punished in South Carolina, whose fault is it? The governor is a republican; the Legislature is republican; every judge on the bench I am told is a republican; the attorney-general is a republican; and so far as I have been informed, and I believe it is true, every commonwealth's attorney in South Carolina is also a republican. If, then, the laws are not enforced there, whose fault is it?

Mr. GORDON. Will my friend from Ohio allow me to make this suggestion also, that I believe it is true (and the Senator from South Carolina will know whether it is or not) that every militia company, perhaps not every one but nearly every company in that State that belongs to the State militia is a black company and armed at the public expense.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question? Under the militia law of South Carolina is it not competent for the white people of the State to organize as well as the blacks?

Mr. GORDON. Altogether so; but unfortunately the white companies have not been allowed arms.

Mr. PATTERSON. In reply to the Senator from Georgia I will state that the militia companies in South Carolina are all colored, but we have military organizations in South Carolina that are white, that are not responsible to the State government at all. They call themselves rifle clubs.

Mr. MORTON. Are there many of them?

Mr. PATTERSON. A great many of them in the State, and they hold no allegiance to the State authority.

Mr. GORDON. I believe they arm themselves at their own expense.

Mr. PATTERSON. They arm and uniform themselves at their own expense.

Mr. THURMAN. How can that take place without the sanction of law? If that is an illegal organization——

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state to the Senator that they were organized under the incorporation law and call their captains presidents.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well; then let your republican Legislature repeal the law. That is all you have to do if these white companies are illegal. If they are formed for any unlawful or treasonable purpose, if they do not——

Mr. PATTERSON. If we did that we should repeal all the incorporation acts of the State and have no corporations.

Mr. THURMAN. Then upon my word I should very likely think that was about the caliber of the Legislature of South Carolina, that it cannot prohibit an illegal armed organization without repealing all the incorporation acts of the State. That is just about the caliber of the South Carolina Legislature of late years.

Mr. GORDON. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina at that point, with the permission of the Senator from Ohio, whether the law to which he refers does not make it a penitentiary offense for any companies to organize except in accordance with law; and if that be true, if these gentlemen are organized in violation of law, why is it that the courts of that State have not put them all in the penitentiary long ago?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think there is any such law as that. I never heard of it.

Mr. GORDON. I think the Senator is not informed——

Mr. PATTERSON. The question has been discussed in the papers. They claim the right to organize under the incorporation act.

Mr. THURMAN. The organizations to which the Senator from South Carolina refers are lawful organizations or they are unlawful. If they are unlawful they are subject to punishment. If they are lawful who can object to them?

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not say they were unlawful. I say they exist.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly; and would the Senator disarm all the white men in South Carolina? I am sure he would not. But we are getting away from the point. I want to know who is authorized to say that South Carolina will not enforce her laws just as much as Pennsylvania will enforce hers? The Senator from South Carolina says they have indicted these men.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator will allow me I will correct him there. The authorities of South Carolina are going ahead and trying to enforce the law. The coroner has had an inquest, and there has been a return made. The State authorities are going to try to punish these parties. I do not know whether they will succeed or not. They have never succeeded in punishing anybody for killing negroes down there yet.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, we have the acknowledgment that the authorities of South Carolina are proceeding to punish these men, or trying to do it. What can any authorities do except to try to do it until they actually get a conviction? But here is a fact that I call your attention to, that the executive, the Legislature, the courts, the attorney-general, the prosecuting attorneys, the sheriffs, in South Carolina are all republican, and if they do not execute the law in that State it is their own fault. But what are you to do about it?

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish the Senator from Ohio to go a little further and just say that the juries are not all republicans.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; and when any man says to me that because a juror is not a republican he will not render an honest verdict, I say he libels his State. I say there is not a State in this Union upon which any such libel ought to be cast. If that is the state of society in South Carolina, that men will not render judgments because of their political differences, there is anarchy there.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will say in answer to that, that men have been tried in South Carolina for political murders, and they have not been convicted in any case. Never has a man in South Carolina been convicted for a political murder, because of the failure of the juries to agree.

Mr. THURMAN. The presumption might be that there was no case for conviction.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, plenty of them.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the Senator's theory against the oaths of the jurors who tried the cases. I prefer to take the oaths of the jurors. But, sir, suppose there are prejudices that prevent convictions, is that the only State, is that the only section in the Union in which verdicts have been rendered acquitting persons accused of crime that rather surprise and astonish a man of a legal turn of mind? Have there been no other places, I should like to know, in which it has been found difficult to convict? If not, what is the meaning of the law in every State that allows a change of venue? What is the meaning of your own law, enacted by Congress in your enforcement acts and the like, in which you have put it in the power of the United States marshal to select a jury to convict instead of a jury to try?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall be allowed to go on and dispose of this resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I insist on the call of the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. My friend has spoken the time out, and now calls for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to lay the regular order on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce the regular order, which is the post-route bill, on which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] has the floor on his amendment. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] now moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of considering the consideration of the resolution presented by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. THURMAN. I thought the motion was to lay on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion is to lay the regular order on the table, so that we can take it up again presently. A postponement would be until to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. I take it that this vote involves political considerations; and therefore I shall observe my pair with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 18; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, and Withers—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bogy, Burnside, Clayton, Conkling, Davis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, and Whyte—21.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the resolution of my friend from Indiana.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to amend the motion by substituting the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary relating to the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not in order. The motion is to take up a specific resolution. When it is up the Senator can move to substitute another bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. Some two weeks ago I was paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE,] and the fact slipped my mind on the last vote. I desire to make that statement now. If he were here I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay."

Mr. MERRIMON. On this vote I shall observe my pair with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 18; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, and Withers—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bogy, Burnside, Clayton, Conkling, Davis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Stevenson, and Whyte—21.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

OSAGE CEDED LANDS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate number 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11; and agree to the same.

The Senate recede from its amendment to the bill number 12.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
FRANCIS KERNAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN R. GOODIN,
LAFAYETTE LANE,
JAMES W. McDILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator explain that?

Mr. INGALLS. The effect of the report of the committee of conference is to agree to the amendment of the Senate striking out section 8, which provided for an imposition of fifteen cents per acre on the land for the purpose of paying the expenses of the litigation of the suit; and also to strike out the additional section proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to the effect that the assent of the Indians should first be obtained to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Kansas what was done with the provision relating to sections 16 and 36?

Mr. INGALLS. The action of the Senate in striking out the provision was agreed to by the committee of conference.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no provision, then, made for the attorneys?

Mr. INGALLS. None.

Mr. THURMAN. And the land sells for $1.25 per acre?

Mr. INGALLS. One dollar and twenty-five cents.

Mr. MORRILL. What is the twelfth amendment? Let it be read.

Mr. INGALLS. It is the last amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment referred to will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The twelfth amendment was to add the following section to the bill:

SEC. —. This act shall not take effect until said tribes of Indians shall file their assent thereto with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOWE. I wish that might lie on the table and have the bill printed as it will read if the report of the conference committee be agreed to. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. INGALLS. There is objection to that.

Mr. HOWE. What is the objection, if I may be so bold as to ask?

Mr. INGALLS. Because it procrastinates action on the bill, which at this stage of the session is objectionable in my mind.

Mr. HOWE. That is a slight objection; but the question must be taken on the report of the conference committee, and I think the Senator ought to allow us to read the bill before we vote.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be very glad to explain to the Senator the effect of the report of the committee of conference if it is in any way a matter of doubt in his mind. I should be very much gratified if the report could be acted on this morning and the announcement made to the House, from which the bill emanated.

Mr. HOWE. I do not see the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in his place.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont is immediately behind the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin object to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. HOWE. I will object to the present consideration of the report, I think. I should really like to have the report printed with the bill as amended. I ask to have the report lie over for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to the present consideration of the report. It will lie over one day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let it be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Before the vote is taken I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. He said something about fifteen cents an acre on land for legal fees. How is that disposed of?

Mr. INGALLS. That is stricken out entirely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I feel a little interest in that. One of my good friends, I understand, is to get $40,000 to $50,000 out of that, my friend Judge Black.

Mr. HOWE. What will be the price of the land if the bill passes as agreed to by the committee?

Mr. INGALLS. One dollar and twenty-five cents an acre.

Mr. HOWE. And there is no provision for the payment of counsel?

Mr. INGALLS. None whatever.

Mr. HOWE. No provision for taking the opinion of the Indians?

Mr. INGALLS. None.

Mr. HOWE. And the bill still allows parties not on the lands to settle upon them hereafter and purchase at the same price?

Mr. INGALLS. The land is entirely occupied. There is not a quarter section of land that has not either an occupant or a claimant.

Mr. HOWE. As the bill was before the Senate, there was a provision in it which allows entries to be made hereafter at $1.25 an acre. Is that provision still in it?

Mr. INGALLS. The provision that the Senator refers to, I think, was in reference to entries hereafter made or to be made. There was a provision for the purpose of declaring the time within which such entries should be made. I will state to the Senator that that is entirely ineffectual, from the fact that there are claimants already upon every quarter section of the land.

Mr. HOWE. I will withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the report. I think I know all about it that I should know after the report was printed and the bill was printed. I will only ask the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report of the committee, and will say just two words as an explanation of my vote.

The objections that I have to voting for this report are that I understand the effect of it will be first to sell to a given number of individuals lands at $1.25 an acre which in fact are worth from $10 to $20 an acre. The other objection I have is that I understand it to be in direct contravention of a treaty of the United States which obliges you, if you can be obliged by treaty—upon which point I express no opinion—to sell these lands in a fair market at a fair cash price. There is another provision in it that is less objectionable, and that is that you propose to sell on time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that we had better have the bill, as amended by the conference report, printed.

Mr. HOWE. I wanted that done, but the Senator from Kansas objected. He has made statements which enable me, I think, to understand all the provisions of the bill which are seriously objectionable to me. I object to selling $10 lands for $1.25 an acre.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to ask a question for my own information. Do I understand the Senator that the treaty requires that these lands shall be sold as other public lands are, which would require them to be first offered at public sale?

Mr. HOWE. I believe that expression is not used, "as other public lands are."

Mr. INGALLS. That expression is used.

Mr. THURMAN. It struck me the other day when the treaty was read that that expression was used, and I should like to understand whether that does or does not bind us to offer the land at public sale, for other public lands are offered at public sale. If the treaty requires these lands to be sold as other public lands are sold, it would seem to require that they should first be offered at public sale. I have not looked into the treaty and do not know.

Mr. HOWE. It is some time since I saw the language of the treaty; but, from the language of the treaty when I read it, I came to the conclusion that the United States assumed the obligation of disposing of these lands at a fair price, in a fair market, and turning them into money, and dedicated that money to a specific use; and now this bill, as I understand, in utter disregard of that provision, proposes to sell the lands at an even sum of $1.25 an acre, and to do that on time. I thought it was a very remarkable thing that this Senate objected so strenuously to allowing these settlers, all hands of them, to pay $1.40 and allow the fifteen cents to be disposed of in another way; but when the Senate refused to allow them to pay $1.40 because the fifteen cents was to go to somebody else, they struck out the $1.40 and put in $1.25, declaring that we were absolutely unreconciled to taking from the settlers any more than $1.25 an acre unless we could have the privilege of putting fifteen cents an acre into the hands of some attorneys.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the provision making the assessment of fifteen cents an acre has been stricken from the bill, as the Senate struck it out.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the case.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire whether any other provision on that subject has been included?

Mr. INGALLS. None.

Mr. CONKLING. Nothing equivalent to that, and nothing which makes an assessment?

Mr. INGALLS. Nothing equivalent; nothing which makes any assessment whatever upon the land.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator the language of the treaty before him?

Mr. INGALLS. I am familiar with it.

Mr. KERNAN. If my colleague will yield to me I will read the language of the treaty, and as I united in this report I desire to say one word. The language of the treaty is as to this land in the first article:

Said lands shall be surveyed and sold, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the most advantageous terms, for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the date of that treaty?

Mr. KERNAN. September 29, 1865.

Mr. INGALLS. It was proclaimed in 1867.

Mr. KERNAN. Very likely; I take the date from the heading.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask whether the treaty makes provision as to what shall be done with the money.

Mr. KERNAN. It does; I will read it:

But no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized; and after re-imbursing the United States the cost of said survey and sale, and the said sum of $300,000 placed to the credit of said Indians, the remaining proceeds of sales shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the "civilization fund," to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education and civilization of Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States.

It will be borne in mind by the Senate that first the United States issued a patent for these lands to a railroad company. Subsequently and in 1869 there was a joint resolution passed by Congress authorizing entries by settlers on these lands; and it has been decided that the title remained in the United States, and that that patent was not valid conveying them to the railroad company. Large numbers of settlers acting under this resolution of Congress on the one side, and acting under this patent of the lands to the railroad company on the other, had in good faith entered on these lands, contracted or paid for them, and made improvements. Now it is said we should not confirm their title without having also the assent of the Indian tribe, for the reason that we are bound to sell these lands for the best price we could, as other public lands have been sold. Therefore it will be observed that if we do not confirm these titles we ought certainly make some compensation to these settlers, as it seems to me. We cannot say to them "Although you have gone on and bought from us and bought from our grantee, in form at least, we will now turn you out and the land shall not be sold unless the Indians consent or unless we sell them at public auction for cash as an ordinary trustee would." In my judgment the Indians have never understood that these lands were to be disposed of differently from other lands. The price has uniformly been, I believe, $1.25 an acre. The Government has been allowing these lands to be entered at $1.25 an acre. We inquired from those living in Kansas who know all about it whether this Indian tribe had ever made the slightest objection to the mode in which the Government has been disposing of these lands for years or allowing entries to be made for years. We were informed by a gentleman who is familiar with it, who has been a judge in that State, that there has never been a suggestion made that the Government was not dealing with the Indians fairly in regard to these lands. Therefore I assented to the report that we should not now refuse to confirm these titles or relieve these settlers unless the Indian tribe file an assent, because I could readily see that persons from any motive might now say to them "Do not you assent; although you have sat by and seen the Government doing this and have been entirely content apparently, do not assent now; let all these settlers be in great distress and you may exact something more from the Government." Therefore I do not think the law unjust to the Indians. I think the treaty has been carried out, as they understood it, by selling the lands in the ordinary way, at the ordinary Government price.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my colleague allow me——

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to say one other thing first, and then I will yield. Moreover, it seems to me under existing circumstances, after what the Government has done, having allowed men to enter upon these lands, buy them, and become grantees under patents from the Government on one side, and allowed others to go there and enter upon them and contract and purchase and pay for them under the joint resolution of Congress on the other, that if we have wronged the Indians we must protect the settlers who make improvements and let the Indians make their claims, and then we can deal justly with them. Now I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. CONKLING. My colleague has made a very clear statement, very clear to me except that he passed over the resolution of 1869 without stating with any fullness what that was. I ask the Senator to state that, and to state it in this view: How did that resolution coincide or conflict with the treaty?

Mr. KERNAN. I am sorry to say I cannot state it. It was discussed and talked about for the purpose of authorizing them to enter, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] doubtless can give the information. Therefore the bill comes back to the Senate precisely as the Senate passed it, I believe, with the exception of striking out the section requiring this assent. We have struck out all about authorizing the payment of counsel fees and left that between those who employed them and themselves.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas in explanation of a remark he made a moment ago. In reply to the Senator from Wisconsin the Senator from Kansas said that there was not a quarter section of this land which had not an occupant or claimant. What does the Senator mean by "claimant?"

Mr. INGALLS. I mean, of course, that there are a great many persons who purchased from the railroad companies when they, under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, held patents for the lands, and that in some cases where persons purchased from the railroad companies they may be actual occupants.

Mr. DAWES. But I ask in reference to the word "claimant." Does it apply to those who claim title to large tracts of land under the railroads, which title is to be confirmed at a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. INGALLS. Those parties are limited to one hundred and sixty acres of land. No person is authorized under the terms of the bill to secure more than one hundred and sixty acres of this land.

Mr. DAWES. How many of the one-hundred-and-sixty-acre tracts are there to which the Senator applies the word "claimant" in contradistinction from "occupant."

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know.

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator any estimate?

Mr. INGALLS. No estimate at all.

Mr. DAWES. For aught the Senator knows, half of this land may be held under the term "claimant" as contradistinguished from "occupant."

Mr. INGALLS. The word "claimant" is not mentioned in the bill.

Mr. DAWES. That was the remark the Senator made. He distinguished between one class of people, beneficiaries under this bill, and another by terming one "occupants" and the other "claimants."

Mr. INGALLS. The bill limits the amount of land that may be secured by any person to one hundred and sixty acres, and requires actual occupancy as a condition-precedent to the purchase.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long an occupancy?

Mr. INGALLS. Occupancy at the time when the entry is made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But not afterward.

Mr. MORTON. I supposed that this report would take but a moment or two when it was called up, yet I see the beginning of a long debate. If there is to be any further debate I must call for the regular order, being the resolution in relation to printing extra copies of the President's message.

Mr. INGALLS. I believe I have been occupying the floor with the consent of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who was entitled to the floor and by unanimous consent yielded to me.

Mr. MORTON. He cannot farm out the floor, I take it.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand that he is farming the floor out. He took the floor and I asked permission to make a report from a committee of conference which, I understand, is always in the nature of a privileged report. The Senator from Ohio yielded to me for that purpose, and by unanimous consent the report was received. It certainly would be a very strange proceeding at this time, after the debate has gone on, for an objection to be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moved to postpone the resolution for some purpose, and that question was pending, at which time he yielded to the Senator from Kansas for the purpose of making the report. The Senator from Kansas took the floor by the Senator from Ohio yielding on the motion to postpone, and therefore is entitled to the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the Chair is mistaken. My recollection is that the regular order was postponed, being the post-route bill, and thereafter by a vote of yeas and nays the resolution of the Senator from Indiana was taken up, upon which the Senator from Ohio had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moved to postpone for the purpose of taking up another measure. The Chair ruled he could not move to substitute until the resolution was postponed. Then the motion was to postpone, on which he yielded to the Senator from Kansas, and the Senator from Kansas holds the floor at the instance of the Senator from Ohio, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. I think we ought to get through with this Osage bill; and in order to afford an opportunity to do that I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Indiana on the table.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is not up yet.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, the resolution of the Senator from Indiana was taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was taken up, and then the Senator from Ohio yielded to the Senator from Kansas for the purpose of making a report.

Mr. THURMAN. For the purpose of continuing the Osage business, I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Indiana on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio yielded to the Senator from Kansas to make his report.

Mr. THURMAN. I did, and in order that we may get through with it I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Indiana on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the report? What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio having yielded to the Senator from Kansas, the report is before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. The report of the committee of conference is before the Senate by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate by consent of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORTON. And must either be adopted, or rejected, or laid on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair rules.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Ohio having the floor on a motion can yield it to another Senator upon an entirely different matter and a general debate go on upon the other subject in entire displacement of the matter before the Senate? That is practically what is undertaken here.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Indiana is entirely mistaken. I did not bring up the conference report. The Senate by unanimous consent agreed to take it up.

Mr. MORTON. I understand; but the Senator from Ohio had the floor—so the Chair decides—and yielded it to the Senator from Kansas to make this report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And by unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was the report taken up subject to a call for the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No one objected. If the Senator from Indiana or any other Senator had objected the Senator from Ohio could not have yielded for that purpose; but as no Senator objected, by unanimous consent the report was before the Senate; and the Chair could not rule otherwise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee of conference is before the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana now subject to a call as the regular order, into which this report is interpolated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was pending, and by unanimous consent was laid aside temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If laid aside temporarily, then the Senator from Indiana according to the usage has a right to call for it; but if it was laid aside altogether then it has gone back on the Calendar, and we have to take it up again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been the practice of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. This is exactly the state of the case: The resolution of the Senator from Indiana having been taken up and I being entitled to the floor rose to speak. The Senator from Kansas asked me if I would yield to him to make a conference report. I said I would do so. He then asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the conference report, and that unanimous consent was given without anything being said about the resolution of the Senator from Indiana being laid aside temporarily, or provisionally, or anything of the sort. The Senate was asked to give unanimous consent to take up the conference report, and that unanimous consent was given, and that is now the matter before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I did not hear anything about unanimous consent. The Senator from Ohio gave way, as I understood, for a matter that would take but a moment; but my friend from Ohio thinks he has successfully swapped my resolution off for this Osage business. I think he would swap it off for any other subject before the Senate. I hope that the regular order will not be put out of sight in this way. If this report can be disposed of without further debate, I have no objection to its going on, but if it is to take all afternoon and to displace the other matter, I am opposed to it.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not want to debate this report. The Senate are fully in possession of the facts in connection with it. The bill itself has been the subject of elaborate and protracted debate, and I am entirely willing that the vote upon the report of the conference committee shall be taken at once.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question at this present moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to call for the resolution of the Senator from Indiana?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the Senate took up the report of the conference committee, and it is before the Senate. Two matters cannot be before the Senate at once. The Chair understands that whenever the Senate by unanimous consent has determined to take up an intervening question it has not been the practice to lay it aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I understand the Chair to hold that the resolution of the Senator from Indiana is not subject to call at this moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not after unanimous consent to take up the report. The report is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I do not see but that the resolution of the Senator from Indiana is gone for the present time, and we must proceed to consider what we have before us.

I did not concur in the report of this conference committee and did not sign the report, because I believed that to pass such a law, without this tribe of Indians assenting to the new arrangement proposed in the bill, would be a plain and palpable violation of their rights of property secured under the treaty of 1865. I say nothing of the other topics in the bill but merely speak of this one. I do not mean to say that I assent to the bill in other respects as it now is, but on this particular topic I wish to occupy a moment of the time of the Senate.

In 1825 the Indians were in possession of this country and a great deal more, and we made a treaty with them then by which this particular reservation was secured to them forever. In 1865 they disposed of that reservation to us on the trust stated in the treaty just read by the Senator from New York, and that was that these lands should be "surveyed and sold, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the most advantageous terms, for cash." The bill says that they shall be sold to particular persons named in effect in the bill, because it is to those persons who have filed claims, leaving no discretion in the Secretary of the Interior at all. Second, it provides that they shall be sold on time, and not for cash. In the third place, the treaty provides that these lands shall be sold "as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws, but no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized."

The whole of the substance of this bill is that pre-emption and homestead claims shall be recognized instead of not being recognized. Therefore, if you wanted to reverse the reading of this treaty, it would only be necessary to enact this law; and yet we are asked by this conference report to say that this shall be done without the assent of the Indians, to whom we have plighted whatever of faith there is in the solemn treaty of the Government, to deal with this property in a particular way. My honorable friend from New York [Mr. KERNAN] says that he regards this price of a dollar and a quarter an acre as within the treaty on account of the words that they shall be surveyed and sold as other public lands are, and as they are sold for a dollar and a quarter these must be; but when it is stated that they shall be sold for cash and on the most advantageous terms, you must strike out those terms, or else you cannot agree to what the Senator from New York says. The idea of saying that they shall be sold for cash on the most advantageous terms for a dollar and a quarter an acre would be nonsense. There are no terms about it except those which refer to price. No time is to be given, no security needs to be taken, or anything to be done except to take the money for the land on the most advantageous terms that can be obtained. What is meant, then, by "other public lands?" The existing laws as to public lands in respect of sale in all the statutes, as distinguished from pre-emption, is that they are to be sold at auction to the best bidder. That is the existing law, and was at the time of the passage of this treaty.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont for information——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will wait one moment until I finish this particular topic.

Mr. THURMAN. It is right in the line of what the Senator is saying.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say one or two words more in exactly this connection in respect of this clause in the treaty, and then I will hear my friend with pleasure, for I wish to condense as much as possible in order to save time.

The next clause in the treaty is, as if to remove any possibility of doing what this bill provides:

But no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized.

There is a positive prohibition against any pre-emption or any homestead. Here is a positive enactment that with or without and in spite of any assent of this tribe of Indians to this new arrangement there shall be pre-emption and there shall be homestead at a price fixed by Congress, and not at auction. I do not know but that there is ingenuity enough in this body and in my friend from New York [Mr. KERNAN] to show that it does not mean any such thing, but that it really means that Congress in its discretion may sell these lands for a dollar and a quarter an acre to pre-emptors or may give them all away to homestead settlers.

Mr. CONKLING. Then came the act of 1869.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then came, as my friend from New York suggests, what I was just coming to, the act of 1869, which said that for two years from the passage of the act all bona fide settlers on those lands should be entitled within that space of two years to pre-empt these lands at the price of a dollar and a quarter an acre, subject to all existing outstanding legal rights. The matter was then drawn into controversy and was under discussion; and therefore, in order to cover these squatters who had gone on by right or by wrong and wished to get some status, this joint resolution proposed to give them some status, but Congress was careful then to say, "You must take your chances; we do not propose by this act of 1869 to create any rights in invasion of rights that already exist outside of our powers;" but that act was only to continue for two years. That time expired on the 10th of April, 1871, five years ago, since which time many of these thousands, if there are thousands, of pre-emptors have walked on to the land, proved up as an actual occupant at the moment of entry, so made their claim, and then gone back to their farms in different parts of Kansas and elsewhere.

Mr. CONKLING. They were not actually on the land, then?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. I never heard it claimed or suggested that on the 10th of April, 1871, any such number of people or squatters as is there now or anything like it, probably not a quarter of them, were on the land. In that state of the case we are asked to pass this law. It did appear to me, desiring heartily to relieve the difficulty that exists there, that the only plain and honest way to do it was to try to get the assent of the Indians to this arrangement. That being given intelligently, of course nobody would complain. As it stands now, in my opinion, we shall have plainly violated this treaty and invaded the rights of the Indians, and they with the other Indians of the country will have a just right to believe that we do not care anything about a treaty at all, and will violate it when we like. I am very sorry indeed to hear that such legislation ought to adopted. Now I will hear my friend from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I want, in the first place, to be informed whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, requiring the assent of the Indians, was stricken out?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was stricken out, and on that ground I declined to sign the conference report.

Mr. THURMAN. The next thing I wish to know is whether my information is correct that these Osages retain their tribal relations and are competent to make a treaty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They certainly do. They had their tribal relations then, as the Supreme Court decided that the treaty was valid. That was the ground on which, the representatives of the State of Kansas having transferred the land to the railroad, the Supreme Court defeated it, on the ground that this treaty gave it to the Indians; and these Indians are still existing as a tribe in the Indian country to which they are removed.

Mr. THURMAN. And therefore competent to give their assent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And therefore competent to give their assent. When I offered the amendment my friend from Kansas had no objection, because I think he saw the justice of it, and practically, certainly we had no division on the subject, as I am quite sure.

Mr. INGALLS. I trust the Senator does not quote me as not having any objection because I did not openly express it. The Senator is aware that the bill had consumed a great deal of time and that I expressed a willingness to have the vote taken without further delay, but I gave no assent whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. I certainly did not mean to put the Senator in a position he did not wish to occupy. I misunderstood what his attitude was; that is all; and I certainly make the correction with a great deal of pleasure.

That is about all I desired to say about this thing; that it did appear to me that it was so plain, obvious, and adverse a violation of this fair contract which we made with these Indians, who in pursuance of it and on the faith of it left their homes on that reservation and moved off into the Indian country; it was so grossly unjust for the sake of anybody or any cause that we should violate their rights in that way, without even asking them whether it was agreeable or not, that I could not possibly assent to it.

One word in respect to the apparent claim of an implied assent from the fact that these Indians have not objected. I think that was very well answered. I do not know that they have not objected. The settlers say they have not. That is all we have got about it. We have not asked the Department of the Interior. We have no recommendation that I ever heard of from the Secretary of the Interior to pass this bill. I do not know whether they object in the Interior Department or not; but that was perfectly answered, as it struck me, by the Senator from New York on another branch of the case about some of the settlers who held under the railroad and the State, that we might fairly imagine at least that the Indians might rest upon their rights in the belief that the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States would not flagrantly violate their rights without saying something to them about it. They had a right to repose upon the good faith of this nation and do not lose anything by not making a perpetual clamor about it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I did not suppose that I should be drawn into a discussion of this conference report, but the resolution before this Senate was switched off so handsomely that I feel it to be my duty to say something in regard to it. The subject involved, as shown by the Senator from Vermont, is very interesting; but the remarks which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] had made just before this report came up will now receive my attention for a few minutes.

The Senator said that when murders were committed in the Southern States we would publish documents at public expense, but when they were committed in the Northern States nothing was said about it. I can only say that there are murders committed in all the Northern States. We have bad men in the North, and murders are committed, sometimes in passion, sometimes in drunkenness, sometimes for gain, sometimes for revenge; but this class of murders is always committed in the Southern States, and it is not the thing to which the reference is made at all. This refers to a kind of murder distinguished from the murders by Molly Maguires or ordinary killings. It refers to political murders, murders that are brought about for the purpose of controlling the politics of States, murders not committed by common cut-throats and by felons, but murders committed under the direction of men who write for the newspapers, who are intelligent gentlemen, men who have occupied public positions, murders that have for their purpose political consequences, far-reaching consequences. That is the class of murders referred to by the President's message and to which my resolution refers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Murders that represent opinions.

Mr. MORTON. Murders that represent opinions.

I called the attention of the Senate this morning to the letter of Mr. Tilden. He ought to have reflected when he wrote that letter that life is short and that everybody could not read it; but I did get through with it. And there is Mr. Hendricks's letter also. While they talk about everything else, they forgot to say one word condemning this massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina, or one word in regard to these numerous slaughters that are political in their character and that have political results for their purpose. I make this statement, I make it deliberately, and I make it emphatically, that Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks dare not denounce the men who committed the murders at Hamburgh, South Carolina. They dare not denounce the men who committed the murders in Mississippi, at Coushatta, and at Colfax, and at other places that might be named, because their prospect of carrying four or five republican States in the South depends entirely upon the support, the influence, and the operations of that class of men who committed these murders at Hamburgh. Therefore they are silent, and they dare not denounce them, because they rely upon them and their operations for their success in carrying four or five southern States. My friend from Ohio did not know anything about the Hamburgh matter; had not seen anything authentic about it at all; had no opinion about it; it might be so and it might not be so. How much evidence will it take to satisfy that Senator that foul murder has been committed? The whole country, I think, understands something about it. We tried to get some definite information, and we did get some. We got the letter of the governor of South Carolina; we got the letter of the attorney-general; we got the evidence taken before the coroner's jury; and this furnishes authentic information. The Senator says he has it not. Well, we want to furnish it to him. That is the point; and we want to furnish it to his constituents. We propose to furnish this message and send it over the land, so that he will not be able on the stump in the campaign to say, "I do not know anything about it; I have not had anything authentic in regard to these murders." We propose to furnish him something authentic. As my friend is here, and I want him to have some information on the subject, and for the purpose of enlightening the Senate on this conference report, I will ask the Secretary to read Governor Chamberlain's letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the letter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, July 22, 1876.

SIR: The recent massacre at Hamburgh, in this State, is a matter so closely connected with the public peace of this State that I desire to call your attention to it for the purpose of laying before you my views of its effect and the measures which it may become necessary to adopt to prevent the recurrence of similar events.

It is, in the first place, manifestly impossible to determine with absolute certainty the motives of those who were engaged in perpetrating the massacre at Hamburgh. The demand which was made by the mob upon the militia company for the surrender of their arms, taken in connection with the fact that the militia are not shown to have committed or threatened any injury to any persons in that community, would seem to indicate a purpose to deprive the militia of their rights on account of their race or political opinions. It seems impossible to find a rational or adequate cause for such a demand, except in the fact that the militia company was composed of negroes, or in the additional fact that they were, besides being negroes, members of the republican party. Those who made the demand were, on the other hand, white men, and members of the democratic party. The lines of race and political party were the lines which marked the respective parties to the affair at Hamburgh. I mention this as a fact, and as apparently the most trustworthy index of the motives and aims which inspired those who brought on this conflict.

As affecting the public peace, however, the effect of this massacre is more important than the motives which prompted it. Upon this point I can speak with more confidence. It is not to be doubted that the effect of this massacre has been to cause wide-spread terror and apprehension among the colored race and the republicans of this State. There is as little doubt, on the other hand, that a feeling of triumph and political elation has been caused by this massacre in the minds of many of the white people and democrats. The fears of the one side correspond with the hopes of the other side.

I do not intend to overstate any matters connected with this affair, nor to omit any statement which seems to me essential to a full understanding of its significance. It is certainly true that most, though not all, of those who have spoken through the newspapers or otherwise here, on the white or democratic side, upon this matter, have condemned the massacre. Their opposition to such conduct has not, however, sufficed to prevent this massacre, nor do I see any greater reason for believing that it will do so in the future. That class which now engage in this cruel work certainly disregard the expressed sentiments of those who assume to speak, for the most part, for their communities, and go forward without fear of public opinion or punishment.

It is sometimes asked, Why do not the colored race return this violence with violence? Why do they suffer themselves to be thus terrorized, when their numbers greatly exceed those of their enemies in the localities where many of these outrages occur? The answer is not difficult. The long habit of command and self-assertion on the part of the whites of these Southern States, their superior intelligence as compared with the colored race, the fact that at least four-fifths of the property of these States is in their hands, are causes which contribute to give them an easy physical superiority thus far over the recently-emancipated race, which still exhibit the effects of their long slavery in their habit of yielding to the more imperious and resolute will and the superior intelligence and material resources of the white men.

Add to this that in almost every southern community there may be found a considerable number of daring, lawless, reckless white men, accustomed to arms and deeds of violence, over whom the restraints of the sentiments of the better and more conservative classes of society have little, if any, power, who are inspired by an intense and brutal hatred of the negro as a free man, and more particularly as a voter and a republican, and you have the elements which would naturally give rise to, and in point of fact do give rise to, nearly all the scenes of bloody violence which occur in the Southern States. Besides all this, another fact must be noted here, a fact which, in my judgment, marks and explains the world-wide difference between the effects of such occurrences as this at Hamburgh upon the mass of the white people here and the effects of deeds of blood and violence upon the people of other sections of the country, namely: that such occurrences as this at Hamburgh have generally resulted in what is thought to be political advantage to the democratic party here. From this fact it results that the white people here are induced, to a considerable extent, to overlook the naked brutality of the occurrence and seek to find some excuse or explanation of conduct which ought to receive only unqualified abhorrence and condemnation, followed by speedy and adequate punishment. In this way it often happens that a few reckless men are permitted or encouraged to terrorize a whole community and destroy all freedom of action on the part of those who differ from them in political opinions. The more respectable portion of the white people here content themselves with verbal perfunctory denunciations, and never adopt such measures or arouse such a public sentiment as would here, as well as elsewhere, put a stop to such occurrences.

In respect to the Hamburgh massacre, as I have said, the fact is unquestionable that it has resulted in great immediate alarm among the colored people and all republicans in that section of the State. Judging from past experience, they see in this occurrence a new evidence of a purpose to subject the majority of the voters of that vicinity to such a degree of fear as to keep them from the polls on election day, and thus reverse or stifle the true political voice of the majority of the people.

But the Hamburgh massacre has produced another effect. It has as a matter of fact caused a firm belief on the part of most republicans here that this affair at Hamburgh is only the beginning of a series of similar race and party collisions in our State, the deliberate aim of which is believed by them to be the political subjugation and control of this State. They see, therefore, in this event what foreshadows a campaign of blood and violence, such a campaign as is popularly known as a campaign conducted on the "Mississippi plan."

From what I have now said it will not be difficult to understand the feeling of a majority of the citizens in a considerable part of this State. It is one of intense solicitude for their lives and liberties. It is one of fear that, in the passion and excitement of the current political campaign, physical violence is to be used to overcome the political will of the people. I confine myself here to a statement of what I believe to be the facts of the present situation in this State as connected with the public peace and order, without any expression of my individual feelings and opinions. My first duty is to seek to restore and preserve public peace and order, to the end that every man in South Carolina may freely and safely enjoy all his civil rights and privileges, including the right to vote. It is to this end that I now call your attention to these matters. I shall go forward to do all in my power as governor to accomplish the ends above indicated, but I deem it important to advise you of the facts now stated, and to solicit from you some indication of your views upon the questions presented. To be more specific, Will the General Government exert itself vigorously to repress violence in this State during the present political campaign on the part of persons belonging to either political party, whenever that violence shall be beyond the control of the State authorities? Will the General Government take such precautions as may be suitable, in view of the feeling of alarm already referred to, to restore confidence to the poor people of both races and political parties in this State, by such a distribution of the military forces now here as will render the intervention of the General Government prompt and effective, if it shall become necessary, in restoring peace and order?

It seems proper to add that I am moved to make this communication to you by no motive or feeling save such as should animate me as the chief executive of this State, bound to do justice to all and to oppress none. I venture to say that I have given sufficient evidence by my whole conduct in this office, that, as governor, I am guided by my oath of office and my duty to all the people. I challenge any proof or indication, from any word or act of mine as governor, that I am capable of doing injustice or denying justice to any citizen of this State. But I do deem it my solemn duty to do my utmost to secure a fair and free election in this State; to protect every man in the free enjoyment of his political rights, and to see to it that no man or combination of men, of any political party, shall overawe or put in fear or danger any citizen of South Carolina in the exercise of his civil rights. In accomplishing these results, I now recognize, with deep regret, that there are many indications that it will be necessary for me to invoke the aid which, under the Constitution and laws, the authorities of the General Government may extend under certain circumstances.

And I trust you will permit me to add that I know no official duty more binding, in my judgment, on the Chief Executive of the United States than that of exercising the powers with which he is invested for the protection of the States against domestic violence, and for the protection of the individual citizen in the exercise of his political rights, whenever a proper call is made upon him. I understand that an American citizen has a right to vote as he pleases; to vote one ticket as freely and safely as another; to vote wrong as freely and safely as to vote right; and I know that whenever, upon whatsoever pretext, large bodies of citizens can be coerced by force or fear into absenting themselves from the polls, or voting in a way contrary to their judgment or inclination, the foundation of every man's civil freedom is deeply, if not fatally, shaken.

I inclose, for your information respecting the Hamburgh massacre, the following documents: the report of Hon. William Stone, attorney-general of this State; the report of General H. W. Purvis, adjutant and inspector general; a copy of all the evidence taken before the coroner's jury; a copy of the printed statement of General M. C. Butler; a copy of a letter addressed by me to Hon. T. J. Robertson; an address to the American people by the colored people of Charleston, and a similar address by a committee appointed at a convention of leading representatives of the colored people of this State, in Columbia, on the 20th instant.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor of South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, for the purpose of furnishing to the Senator from Ohio and others some more authentic information in regard to this Hamburgh massacre which would authorize them to form an opinion, and to show the importance of printing this document, and to let the people of the whole nation know the true character of this transaction, I will now ask the Secretary to read the letter of the attorney-general of South Carolina to the governor, which is one of the documents that we are asking to print.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Columbia, South Carolina, July 12, 1876.

SIR: According to your request of Monday last, I have visited Hamburgh for the purpose of ascertaining the facts connected with the killing of several men there on the night of the 8th of July.

My information has been derived chiefly from Trial Justice Rivers and from the testimony of persons who have been examined before the coroner's jury now in session, and from those who received wounds from the armed body of white men who had taken them prisoners. From this information the following facts seem to be clearly established:

During the administration of Governor Scott, a company of State militia was organized at Hamburgh, of which Prince Rivers was captain. This company was known as Company A, Ninth Regiment National Guard of the State of South Carolina. Arms were at that time furnished to it and some ammunition.

This company, previous to May, 1876, had for some time but few names on its rolls, drilled rarely, and scarcely kept alive its organization. But in May of this year the number of members increased to about eighty, and one Doc Adams was chosen captain.

On the 4th of July the company drilled on one of the public streets in the town of Hamburgh. The street on which they drilled was between one hundred and one hundred and fifty feet wide; but it was little used, and was overgrown with grass except in that portion which was used as a carriage-road. While the company was thus drilling Thomas Butler and Henry Getzen, his brother-in-law, came along in a carriage and demanded that the company should make way for them. Adams halted the company, remonstrated with Butler and Getzen for thus seeking to interfere with the company, and called their attention to the fact that there was plenty of room on each side of the company to pass.

Finding them unwilling to turn out of their course, Adams finally opened ranks and allowed them to drive through.

This incident seems to have angered Butler and Getzen, who made complaint before Trial Justice Rivers against the militia company for obstructing the highway. The trial justice on the following day issued a warrant against Adams, as he was the captain of the company, and had him brought before him for trial. During the progress of the trial Adams was arrested by the trial justice for contempt of court, and subsequently the case was continued until four o'clock Saturday afternoon, July 8.

At that time Butler and Getzen, with General M. C. Butler, who had been employed by Robert I. Butler, father of the former, as their attorney, repaired to the office of the trial justice, but Adams did not appear.

General Butler inquired as to the nature of the charges against Adams, and asked if the trial justice was to hear the case as trial justice or in his official capacity of major-general of militia. To this the trial justice replied that he was to hear the case as a trial justice, but if the facts showed that a military offense had been committed, Adams would have to be tried by a court-martial. General Butler then stated that he thought the case might be arranged, and, at his suggestion, time was given him to see the parties. After this the trial justice did not see General Butler at his office, but learned that he had gone over to Augusta. In the mean time the trial justice had been informed that some two or three hundred armed white men were in Hamburgh, and that a demand had been made by them that the militia should surrender their arms. After a consultation with Messrs. Jefferson and Spencer, Rivers sent for General Butler. He rode up to the back gate of Rivers's house; the two had a conversation, in which General Butler said that he had given orders to have the guns given up in half an hour, and the time was nearly up. Rivers asked if some other arrangement could not be made, to which General Butler replied in the negative.

Rivers then asked if he would not consent to have him receive the arms, box them up, and send them to the governor, to which General Butler replied that he would box them up and send them to the governor, and if he (the governor) should return them to the company it would be at his own risk. Rivers then asked if they would give a bond for the arms, to which General Butler said that he would stand the bond, and, turning to another person—I think R. J. Butler—asked if he wouldn't go on a bond also, to which he replied that he would. Rivers then asked for time before fire should be opened on the militia, so that he might have a conference with the militia officers. This was acceded to, and Rivers then went to the building known as the Sibley building, in the second story of which the company had its armory and drill-room, and where it was then assembled, and told Captain Adams what might be expected if he should refuse to give up the arms. To this Adams replied that General Butler had no right to the guns; that the company held them, and he proposed to hold them unless General Butler showed some authority to take them.

After this interview Rivers returned to General Butler, with whom was Robert J. Butler. He told them the decision to which the company had come. Then Robert J. Butler said that General Butler was his attorney; that he had come to settle the matter. If the company would apologize for the insult to his son and son-in-law he would do nothing more, but the whole matter was in General Butler's hands. General Butler said that, as the men would not meet him, he would have no more to do with them. General Butler was asked by Rivers if he would guarantee the safety of the town should the militia surrender their arms. He said that would depend on how the men behaved themselves afterward. This statement is confirmed by S. P. Pixley.

While these negotiations were going on, the armed body of white men in the town were concentrated on the bank of the river near the Sibley building. Soon after they were broken off firing began. Men who were in the building say that it was commenced by the whites firing upon the building. Adams gave his orders not to shoot until he directed them to. The company had very little ammunition, and all they had was a portion of that issued to the company when it was first organized.

After the firing had begun it was returned by the militia, and one of the attacking party, McKee Merriwether, was shot through the head and instantly killed. After this a piece of artillery, said to belong to the Washington Artillery, of Augusta, was brought over from Augusta, and four charges of canister were fired from it upon the armory, but without injuring any one. The persons in the armory escaped from the rear by means of ladders, and hid under the floors of adjacent buildings or wherever else they could find shelter.

The first man killed by the whites was James Cook, town marshal. He had been in the armory, but was not a member of the company. He had gone into the street from the rear of the Sibley building, and was at once fired on and fell dead instantly, pierced by five or six bullets. Afterward the whites began their search for the members of the company. They succeeded in getting about twenty-five colored men as prisoners, some of whom were never members of the company. As fast as they were captured they were taken to a place near the South Carolina Railroad, where a large party of armed men stood guard over them. None of those thus captured had arms in their hands.

Subsequently, and at about two o'clock a. m., six men took A. T. Attaway out of the "ring." He and his mother begged for his life, but in vain. He was told to turn round, and was then shot to death by the crowd. David Phillips was next taken out and was similarly killed. Pompey Currey was next called out. He recognized among the by-standers Henry Getzen and Dr. Pierce Butler, and called on them to keep the other men from killing him. He ran, and was shot at as he ran, one bullet striking him in the right leg below the knee.

Afterward, Albert Myniart, Moses Parks, and Hampton Stephens were killed. Stephens did not belong to the company. Nelder John Parker, who has been commonly referred to in the newspaper reports as John Thomas, was corporal in the company. When he was arrested and taken to the spot where the other prisoners were, he recognized among the party two gentlemen of Augusta, named Twiggs and Chaffee. He appealed to them for protection. They said he should not be hurt. He states that General M. C. Butler asked if he was one of the d—d rascals. The reply was in the affirmative. He was then shot in the back. Messrs. Twiggs and Chaffee then said if he was shot again they would shoot the ones who did it. They took him off and had him taken to Augusta. He was shot before Attaway was killed. He may recover from his wounds.

One Butler Edwards was taken as a prisoner. He says he was taken before General Butler, who at the time was in the street near the Sibley building. This was about twelve o'clock.

Threats were made to shoot him. General Butler directed that he be taken to the others. He recognized among the crowd one Captain Carnile and —— Dunbar, of Augusta; said he had a long talk with the former. He was among the prisoners who were let loose and told to run; as they ran they were fired at and he was shot in the head. He was not a member of the company.

Willis Davis, one of the members of the company, was taken to the place where were the other prisoners. The men stated that John Swaringen, of Edgefield County, had charge of the prisoners. He states that he saw General Butler before the men were killed, who asked him what he was doing and told him he would have enough of it before he got through. He was shot in the arm near the elbow when about twenty paces distant from the crowd. The ball is still in his arm and he suffers much pain. He also states that some of the young men from Georgia remonstrated against shooting the prisoners, but in vain.

Besides the killing and wounding of the men herein named, the party broke open several stores and houses, and in some instances robbed the inmates. They took from Mr. Charles Roll, the postmaster, and a very respectable white citizen, a gun which he had in his store and his private property. From an old colored man, named Jacob Samuels, in his employ, they took a watch and set fire to his house. They broke open the house of Trial Justice Rivers and did much damage, as well as robbed him of clothing. They obtained kerosene oil and attempted to set fire to a house, but were prevented by Colonel A. P. Butler from doing so. The ropes of the public wells were cut and some fences were torn down.

So far as I can learn the primary object of the whites was to take away from the militia their arms.

The man Parker, who was wounded, states that on Friday, the 7th instant, he had a long talk with one Harrison Butler (white) on Broad street, Augusta. Butler told him that if Rivers did not give orders for the militia to give up their arms they would take them anyway on the next day.

On Saturday rumors were abroad in Hamburgh that there were armed parties coming in to take the guns, but little credit was attached to them.

One of the white citizens of Hamburgh heard a conversation between David Phillips and General Butler in the afternoon. Phillips talked very "big," as the gentleman said, and General Butler told him that they wanted those guns and were bound to have them.

In the afternoon Colonel A. P. Butler went to the various stores in town and told the proprietors that they must not sell any liquor to his men. In spite of this, however, some of the men compelled one of the store-keepers to furnish them liquor. From the same person they obtained kerosene oil to use in setting fire to a house.

The whites were armed with guns and small arms of various kinds, and many of them had axes and hatchets.

It is proper to state that the intendant of Hamburgh, Mr. Gardner, was informed by General Butler, in an interview with him, that the arms of the company must be given up.

Trial Justice Rivers is now holding an inquest and taking the testimony of witnesses. Until their verdict is rendered, it will be impossible to tell who were engaged in the attack on the militia, and the subsequent killing and wounding of the colored men.

It may be possible that a careful judicial investigation may show some slight errors in some of the minor details stated in this report. But, making due allowance for such errors, the facts show the demand on the militia to give up their arms was made by persons without lawful authority to enforce such demand or to receive the arms had they been surrendered; that the attack on the militia to compel a compliance with this demand was without lawful excuse or justification; and that after there had been some twenty or twenty-five prisoners captured and completely in the power of their captors, and without means of making further resistance, five of them were deliberately shot to death and three more severely wounded. It further appears that, not content with thus satisfying their vengeance, many of the crowd added to their guilt the crime of robbery of defenseless people, and were only prevented from arson by the efforts of their own leaders.

Yours, very respectfully,

WILLIAM STONE,
Attorney-General South Carolina.

Hon. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it seems to me the statement of the governor of South Carolina and of the attorney-general furnishes very authentic evidence in a general way of the character of this transaction, and shows sufficiently the importance of spreading its true character before the American people. The Senator from Ohio asks why will not the State authorities of South Carolina punish these men? He says the officers of the courts, the judges, the governor, are all republicans. Does not the Senator from Ohio understand that there is now a terrorism in the State of South Carolina, and in almost every other State in the South, that prevents the punishment of any man for killing a negro; and I now challenge Senators on the other side of this Chamber to point to a case—I am advised by the Senator from South Carolina and other Senators on this floor that I may do it—to point to a case where a white man has been punished for killing a negro.

Mr. MERRIMON. It has been repeatedly done in my State.

Mr. WITHERS. And in mine.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is one in the penitentiary now and one has been hanged.

Mr. MORTON. It is possible that where a white republican kills a negro he would be punished for it. ["O."] My friends say "O." I point you to the State of South Carolina; I point you to the State of Mississippi; I point you to the State of Louisiana; I point you to any of these States where these great outrages have been committed, and I ask the question when and where has a white man been punished for killing a negro, and I might extend the question further, and inquire when and where a man has been punished for killing a republican? Sir, there is a terrorism that goes into the jury-box, which goes into the witness-box, it goes even with the republican officers and prevents the administration of justice, and with a mixed jury, made up of whites and blacks, made up of all political parties, the punishment of men down there for the commission of these crimes is highly improbable. With all that Governor Chamberlain can do, I express the opinion here to-day, and see if time does not verify it, that all the State prosecutions for these foul murders will come to nothing.

Mr. THURMAN. Then may I ask the Senator what he proposes to do about it?

Mr. MORTON. Ah, what do I propose to do about it? I propose to let the country know about it, and I propose to furnish authentic information to the Senator himself on the subject. He says he does not know anything about it, has not heard anything that amounts to anything, nothing definite on the subject. The Senator will never be satisfied, I am afraid. I propose to let the country know in regard to these things.

Mr. President, I can but repeat what I said a while ago. I believe that Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks did not dare in their letters of acceptance to condemn these outrages at Hamburgh and at other places in the South because, as I said before, that State is a republican State by 35,000, Mississippi by more than 30,000, Alabama by more than 10,000, North Carolina by more than 8,000, Louisiana by more than 15,000; and those gentlemen cannot carry those States without these republican majorities being overcome, and they can only be overcome by violence. Therefore these things are to be slurred over, they are to be passed by, and the perpetrators are to go unwhipped by public opinion. If such men as Tilden and Hendricks were to denounce these crimes, if they were boldly denounced on the floor of this Senate and not apologized for and not denied and Senators who say "I do not know, I have got no information;"—if the leading men of the democratic party everywhere would come out and denounce these things and demand that the perpetrators be brought to justice, then these things will stop; but they never will be stopped so long as men ignore them or so long as they are justified or excused.

Mr. President, there is no use in talking about these things being non-political. My friend might just as well attempt to conceal Mount Vesuvius by spreading his pocket-handkerchief over the crater as to deny that these murders were political. This is one of a series of atrocities. It is one just like many others that have occurred, all inflicted for the same purpose, and all to be covered up, justified, or excused by the same infamous falsehoods.

Mr. President, I believe I have had the Clerk read all that I desire to have read on this report of the committee of conference. When we get up the resolution, which is the main thing, I shall perhaps have something to say about it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana was so anxious to make his little campaign speech that he could not wait for his resolution to be taken up again, but on an Indian bill he saw fit to make his stump-speech that has just been delivered; and there was another singular thing about it, and not usual in this Senate, that his speech, as he announced it, was to be a reply to a speech that he said I had delivered but which was in an unfinished state. Without waiting for me to conclude what I had to say, he injects his speech right in the midst of mine.

Mr. MORTON. I think I ought to state in this connection as a justification of my course that my friend from Ohio first spoke out the morning hour and then called for the regular order, and after that had been laid on the table and my resolution was got up in regard to printing the President's message, my friend adroitly swapped it off for this conference report, after having spoken on it for about twenty minutes, and then shifted the argument on to something else. If my friend thinks that is all right, he is certainly not in any condition to find fault with me.

Mr. THURMAN. I think that is rather a lame excuse.

Mr. MORTON. Perhaps it is.

Mr. THURMAN. I had the floor. The Senator from Kansas asked me to give way to the report of a committee of conference, a thing that I never knew refused since I have held a seat in the Senate, and certainly not at as late a day in the session as this. I could not give him the authority to bring that up. I was only one out of sixty-odd Senators present, and the Senator had to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up his conference report, and that unanimous consent was given, the Senator from Indiana making no objection, and that is the way that bill came before the Senate; and yet on that bill, and without waiting for it to be disposed of and me to resume the remarks that I was making on his resolution, the Senator could not wait—so eager was he to get at this favorite subject of his that he could not wait for me to conclude my "few feeble remarks," but he had to jump into the lists with his armor on, and that same old lance and saber that have so often flourished in this same kind of encounter once more to stir up the northern heart and make them hate the people of the South, once more to preach hatred and vengeance toward the people of the South, be they guiltless or be they guilty. Well, Mr. President, I do not envy that feeling. I suppose, though, the Senator cannot help it; it is the force of habit. It has become a chronic disease of the Senator, and nothing in the world seems to afford him so much delight on the eve of an election as to find that some few black people down South have lost their lives in an affray. I do not say that he wished it; certainly I am far from believing he did; but if the thing does happen in the dispensations of Providence, he thanks the Almighty for the aid that He has furnished to the republican party; and so it happens now. The Senator knows as well as he sits in his seat that of all the men in this country those who most deplore these acts of violence are the democratic party, and especially the democratic party of the North.

Mr. MORTON. Your candidates should say so in their letters, then.

Mr. THURMAN. Why say so? I do not wish to be offensive, but I declare I could hardly help blushing for the Senator from Indiana when he was guilty of the small criticism that Tilden and Hendricks did not notice this particular Hamburgh matter in their letters of acceptance, as if they were to go out of their way in a paper like that, and without having heard the evidence on either side, with nothing but newspaper reports, without having had even the benefit of these documents which the Senator now asks to have printed and which were presented here on the 1st day of this very month and not seen by Tilden or by Hendricks, notice this occurrence that happened down in South Carolina. Why, sir, they would have made themsleves the laughing-stock of the community if they had done any such thing.

But let me ask my friend, if he makes such a criticism as that, how comes it that Mr. WHEELER, your candidate for Vice-President, took no notice of this thing? His letter was written on the 15th day of July, and these murders took place on the 8th day of July, and the telegraph had scattered the information all over the country before WHEELER wrote his letter. How comes it that he took no notice of it at all, and how small a criticism it would be for me if I were to say that Mr. WHEELER dare not condemn that massacre! No, Mr. President, that will not do. Why did he not take notice of Coushatta and the like; in other words, why did he not take notice of all the speeches the Senator from Indiana has been accustomed to make on southern outrages in the last four or five years? I might answer, why did not Governor Hayes take notice of them? Why did not Governor Hayes put into his letter of acceptance liberal extracts from the speeches of the Senator from Indiana? Why did he not make a campaign document by finding chosen excerpts of the horrible pictures drawn by the fertile imagination of the Senator from Indiana for the last three or four years? Why, on the contrary, did Governor Hayes hold out his hands, and use mild language like the mild-mannered man he is, although he has proven himself to be a brave soldier, (for I have generally found that the men who were the bravest soldiers have the mildest tongues?) Why is it, instead of hoisting the bloody flag and preaching vengeance and hatred in his letter of acceptance, that Governor Hayes speaks in language of mildness and of kindness to all the South? Not a word about Coushatta and not a word about Hamburgh, although for aught I know he had heard of it, though it was hardly possible, for his letter is dated on the very day this transaction took place at Hamburgh. He says not one word about these various occurrences which the Senator from Indiana has been accustomed to bring to the attention of the Senate so often, and so forcibly, and so earnestly.

But, sir, there is in Governor Tilden's letter of acceptance, which I have not had time to read in full because I only saw it this morning, a passage that I commend to my friend from Indiana and it embraces everything that a man writing such a letter could be required to say. It is a pledge which if delivered in his inaugural address or a message to Congress would satisfy the whole country that the man who delivered it had a sound head and a right heart. What does he say?

The nobler motives of humanity concur with the material interests of all in requiring that every obstacle be removed to a complete and durable reconciliation between kindred populations once unnaturally estranged on the basis recognized by the Saint Louis platform of the Constitution of the United States, with its amendments universally accepted as a final settlement of the controversies which engendered civil war; but in aid of a result so beneficent, the moral influence of every good citizen as well as every governmental authority ought to be exerted not alone to maintain their just equality before the law, but likewise to establish a cordial fraternity and good-will among citizens, whatever their race or color, who are now united in the one destiny of a common self-government. If the duty shall be assigned to me, I should not fail to exercise the powers with which the laws and the Constitution of our country clothes its Chief Magistrate to protect all its citizens whatever their former condition in every political and personal right.

What more can be asked than that? What more with any propropriety or dignity could Governor Tilden have said than that? Was it for him to go peddling around and mousing around upon newspaper reports, and without hearing the other side to go into the particulars of some outrage in the Southern States? Was that his duty? Does not every man see how miserable is the criticism of the Senator from Indiana?

But, Mr. President, let us get to something larger than that. Now I have heard the letter of the attorney-general of South Carolina. I had not seen it before, as I said in my opening remarks this morning, and although I have learned, by more than forty years' practice at the bar and some little experience upon the bench, always to hesitate to give judgment upon the testimony on one side alone, although I have thought the maxim Audi alteram partem, "Hear the other side before you determine," to be one of the soundest dictates of justice and jurisprudence, yet I am bound to say that if this statement made by the attorney-general of South Carolina be true—and I am sorry to say that it is most probably substantially so—then the transaction at Hamburgh was so atrocious that there are no words in our language sufficiently strong to condemn it. That is what I say of it. It is adding to brutality cowardice, the meanest and basest cowardice. In all ages and in all countries, since at least prisoners were entitled to life when they surrendered, and in all modern times, according to the laws of modern warfare, the shooting of unarmed prisoners is a crime too great to be described by words; and that is precisely this case if the statement made by the attorney-general of South Carolina is true. Sir, no man can abhor that crime more than I do. Years ago I said in the debate on the enforcement bill, and said it as strongly as I could put it to those misguided men down South, that they were the very worst enemies that the southern people had. I have repeated it again and again. Every act of violence they commit is seized hold of by demagogues at the North to inflame the North against the South and without any regard to the guilt or innocence of the mass of the southern people. What man in his senses believes that the mass of the white people in any State in the South desires a state of anarchy? They have the property; they have their wives and children there who require safety and protection. What man believes in his senses to-day that they want a state of civil war, of servile war, or a war of races; that they want insecurity for their wives and children, insecurity of property, a state of anarchy instead of a state of prosperity? No man in his senses believes it. But there are bad men there, as there are bad men elsewhere, and under the peculiar circumstances, the changed condition of that country, who can wonder that there are outbreaks? It is no justification of them, but who can wonder at the fact that there are outbreaks? Take this very State of South Carolina; I am assured that the entire organized militia of that State are colored men, that there is not one single militia company that is composed of white men.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Ohio is right in that statement; but it is not the fault of the colored people and it is not the fault of the State government, but the fault of the white people. The white democrats will not go into the State military organizations.

Mr. THURMAN. I think I have heard some other account of that.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is true.

Mr. THURMAN. I think we had some evidence before that when that militia law was passed the whites did go into it, and why should they not? They wanted arms, but their arms were taken from them and their companies disbanded. That is the evidence we had here some two or three years ago.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator state when that happened?

Mr. THURMAN. I recollect——

Mr. PATTERSON. When were arms ever taken by the State government from a white military company?

Mr. THURMAN. My impression is that it was about two years ago, and I am speaking simply from recollection.

Mr. PATTERSON. I live there, and I never heard of it.

Mr. THURMAN. There are a great many things perhaps that the Senator never heard of that nevertheless happened. How comes it that all the arms are given to colored people? Are the white people of South Carolina so rich that they are unwilling to take the arms that belong to the State, or that they go and purchase their own arms? Is that the state of the case down there?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am sorry to interrupt the Senator by saying that that is the truth. The white people in South Carolina prefer to buy their own arms and equip themselves, and are unwilling to go in under the State organization and be subject to the military law.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot undertake to argue a question of the state of affairs in South Carolina with the Senator from that State; but one thing I do know: that, if that is the case there, the white population of South Carolina are totally abnormal and do not belong to our race. But there is the fact: fifteen regiments of colored troops there are armed and supplied with ammunition by the State, and there is not one white militia company in the State. Do you wonder that, with such a state of affairs as that, and with the negroes in the majority, and with this sudden change which has taken the late servile race and put it on top of the race to which Calhoun and McDuffie and Lowndes and men of that stamp belonged, there is dissatisfaction? Do you wonder that there is bad feeling? Do you wonder that men may be excited to acts of violence that our sober judgment cannot for one single moment approve and every sentiment of justice and humanity requires us to condemn? But, sir, when these things do occur, are the whole southern people to be indicted and the whole northern people to be excited against the South as if the whole southern people were a set of monsters and not human beings? Why, sir, we were told a long time ago by one high in station, "Let us have peace." But, so far from having peace, there seems to have been no end of this crusade of vengeance and hate which is to be preached on the eve of every presidential election, and not only of every presidential election but of every important election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator allude to this crusade at Hamburgh? Is that the one he is speaking of?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator understands well enough what I allude to, and his question therefore was as mal à propos as it could possibly be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, which does the Senator mean?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator understands me perfectly well, and I have no doubt perhaps before we get through he will give some little proof of it.

Now, Mr. President, when in this world are we to have peace and fraternity in this country? If these things are to go on, how long will it take before we are once more a united people? Sir, we came into this centennial year with great blowing of trumpets and beating of drums, to welcome the one hundreth anniversary of the nation's independence and a reunited Republic from one end of the land to the other. We celebrated it by acts of fraternity. Troops went from South Carolina to join with Massachusetts, under the shadow of Bunker Hill, to celebrate that great victory and the first blows for the independence of the country. They were received in Boston in a manner that spoke in the highest conceivable language of the civilization of that city and of her fraternal and patriotic feelings. Troops went from Maryland to Philadelphia, to New York, and Boston, and were received in the same way. We invited the nations of the earth to come here to witness—what? Simply our material progress, simply our growth in the material arts and sciences? No, sir; but to witness a great, a prosperous, a united, and a patriotic people. We invited all the crowned heads of the world to attest by their own presence or that of their embassadors their friendship for the great Republic of the world, and to be witnesses of its prosperity, its union, and its glory. And some of them came, crowned heads; but what do they witness? Instead of a united and happy and contented people, they are told here from the Senate Hall of this Capitol that one-third of this people are a set of monsters in human form; that they have no love for this Union, and not only no love for the Union, but that the most common instincts of humanity and justice are blotted out of their hearts. That is the exhibition that you exhibit in your centennial year. Ah, Mr. President, if that is true, then I advise you to hide all your evidences of progress that are exhibited at Philadelphia, for no growth in the material arts, no mighty works of industry, nothing that you can show there will for one moment be more than dust in the balance against a country so infamous as that which Senators describe us to be.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one word. The Senator asks this question, "When shall we have peace and fraternity in the North and in this country?" I want to answer that: when murder shall cease because of race, when men shall cease to be killed because of their political opinions, when they stop the slaughters at Hamburgh, at Coushatta, at Colfax, at Vicksburgh, at Clinton, at Mechanics' Institute. So long as these things are continued there can be no peace and fraternity. But the crime is in talking about them, that is all—not the killing but it is the talking about it. Because we remonstrate, because we raise our voices against these crimes and urge security to the lives of all, it is said that we are keeping up sectional differences! God forbid. When they stop these killings, we shall stop our talk; but for us to stop our remonstrances before these crimes shall cease would be criminal on our part.

Mr. President, the Senator says that Mr. Hayes did not say anything about this. I want to read what Mr. Hayes said. I want to vindicate him from the assault upon him. Mr. Hayes in his letter of acceptance says:

There can be no enduring peace if the constitutional rights of any portion of the people are habitually disregarded. A division of political parties, resting merely upon distinctions of race, or upon sectional lines, is always unfortunate and may be disastrous. The welfare of the South, alike with that of every other part of the country, depends upon the attractions it can offer to labor, to immigration, and to capital; but laborers will not go, and capital will not venture, where the Constitution and the laws are set at defiance and distraction, apprehension, and alarm take the place of peace-loving and law-abiding social life.

He puts it very strongly; and how did Mr. Hendricks put it yesterday? The Senator has read what Mr. Tilden said. Why, he says, could Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks stop to notice the Hamburgh massacre, that particular thing, the massacre at Colfax, at Coushatta, at Vicksburgh, or at Clinton, or the general massacre in Mississippi? He says no. O, that would be beneath the dignity of those two men! These massacres have shocked the whole world; the whole country is talking about them and has been for months and for years; but they amount to so small a matter that these distinguished gentlemen could not afford to mention them! Ah, if the Senator himself would expend one-half the force in condemning these crimes that he does in condemning us for talking about them, he would have helped to stop them and would have materially contributed to that result. But instead of that we find apologies and excuses, and we find those who condemn the crimes are arraigned as the criminals while the criminals are let go, left unpunished, and left uncondemned.

The Senator says if the facts stated by the attorney-general of South Carolina are true, then these men did commit a great crime because they killed unarmed prisoners. Ay, there comes the rub. When will the Senator ever believe the facts as stated? How much evidence will convince him that the attorney-general has told the truth? There is where the trouble comes in. The Senator stated this morning that he knew nothing about it, had nothing authentic on the subject, and when the evidence is read he says if these things are so, then this was a very bad affair indeed!

In regard to Mr. WHEELER'S statements I find on referring to his letter that for his opinion in regard to the condition of the South he refers to his report. I shall have that report in a few minutes and it will show that he is equally explicit, I have no doubt.

Mr. THURMAN. I guess he does not say anything about Hamburgh in that report.

Mr. MORTON. No; Hamburgh had not happened when he made his report. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] had handed me the report. Mr. WHEELER in his letter refers to his report and says his opinions have not changed. I read now from his report:

First. That there has been, and is, on the part of the party calling themselves the white men's party, in Louisiana, a purpose to take possession by force and fraud of the State government, without regard to the question of who may have the numerical majority at a fair election.

That is a very important statement, and he re-affirms it.

Second. That, in the execution of this purpose, they have refrained, and will refrain, from the use of no instruments which they think designed to accomplish it, whether those instruments be murder, fraud, civil war, or coercion of laborers by employers.

And he expressly re-affirms that statement, and yet my friend from Ohio says Mr. WHEELER says nothing on the subject.

Third. While there are many men in their party of more moderate views, who do not themselves use or approve these unlawful means, such men desire the accomplishment of the same end, and are powerless to restrain their more violent associates.

And now I wish to say right here that there are millions of good people in the South. I want to believe that, and I do believe it; but the trouble is that they have not got the power, they have not got the courage to put down this violent element; they are controlled by it. I believe the violent element in the South is in the minority today; I have no doubt of it; but it has power to silence the majority; it has power to brave and control their politics; and such is its power, such is its terrorism that it is felt right here on the floor of the Senate and there are men here who dare not express the sentiments of their hearts because of this power and of their dread of this violent element in the States from which they come. This I have no doubt of at all, and this terrorism goes to Indianapolis and it goes to Albany, New York, and it prevents candidates for the highest offices in the land from expressing their condemnation of these crimes. As I said, they dare not condemn the authors of these crimes because their hopes of success in four or five republican States in the South depend on these very men and those of like character.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator read a passage from Mr. Hendricks's letter in connection with the subject he is commenting on?

Mr. MORTON. I thank my friend for calling attention to it. I was coming to it.

Mr. WITHERS. I would be glad if the Senator would do it.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Secretary to read it. I believe I will mark all that pertains to the subject. It is toward the close of the letter, is it not?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I will mark the part and ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

All the people must be made to feel and to know once more that there is established a purpose and policy under which all citizens, of every condition, race, and color will be secure in the enjoyment of whatever rights the Constitution and laws declare or recognize, and that in controversies that may arise the Government is not a partisan, but within its constitutional authority the just and powerful guardian of the rights and safety of all.

The strife between the sections and between races will cease as soon as the power for evil is taken away from a party that makes political gain out of scenes of violence and bloodshed, and the constitutional authority is placed in the hands of men whose political welfare requires that peace and good order shall be preserved everywhere.

Mr. MORTON. He does refer to scenes of violence and bloodshed, but how? Condemning the bloodshed? No, but condemning the party that he says tries to make capital out of it, condemning those who talk about it, those who repudiate it, but for the bloodshed itself he has no word of condemnation; and his remedy is to turn over this Government into the hands of the very men in part who have perpetrated these crimes. This bloodshed was in his mind. Mr. Hendricks did not forget Hamburgh; he did not forget the one hundred other slaughters in the South in the last two or three years. But all he has to say about them is to condemn the men or the party that want to make political capital out of them! That is, he condemns the men who denounce it, condemns the men who make a noise about it, condemns the men who bring it to the attention of the country. That is all the condemnation he has about it. It would have been easy for him to say in referring to Hamburgh or if he did not even mention the name in referring to these general slaughters in the South where these things have occurred—to say "I condemn them; they have been committed by bad men who ought to be punished, and it will be my purpose to bring these men to punishment if I should get the power." But no word of that kind escapes his lips; and so with regard to Mr. Tilden. He talks in a general way about enforcing the laws and says he will use all his constitutional power to enforce the laws. But what constitutional powers has he got according to his construction? All that Grant has done has been denied to be constitutional; all that the republican party has done in suppressing these disorders has been said to be unconstitutional. Every step we have taken has been condemned.

I sympathize with my friend from Ohio in one respect. I sympathize with the sad necessity that compels him to defend these things, that compels him to excuse them, to apologize for them in a roundabout way; and whenever a word is said about them to be under the necessity of getting up and making a counter attack, attacking the republican party, and talking about "the bloody shirt." These murders and crimes are committed, and then they are to be shouted out of sight by the cries of "carpet-bagger," "scalawag," "bloody shirt," and all the slang-whangery of vulgar blackguardism. We are to forget these infamous crimes and lose sight of them under the cry of slang that is brought against us whenever we mention them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference on the Osage land bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken; and resulted—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnum, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Dennis, Eaton, Ferry, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Sherman, Wallace, Withers, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill, Norwood, Saulsbury, and Wadleigh—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Oglesby, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, West, Whyte, and Windom—26.

So the report was concurred in.

PETITION.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of W. F. Carrington, of Virginia, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph N. Lewis, praying to be re-imbursed for certain moneys expended by him in and about the seizure of the American bark Amelia at Port au Prince, Hayti, while he was acting as United States commercial agent at that point in 1855, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of Joseph N. Lewis.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of the better protection of the frontier of that State and its re-imbursement of certain moneys expended for the protection of her citizens and their property from incursions from the adjacent Mexican territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the memorial of the common council of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, in favor of the erection of a monument at Yorktown, Virginia, commemorative of the closing battle of the war of the Revolution, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the Senate to the bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN H. BAGLEY, jr., of New York, Mr. WILLIAM HARTZELL of Illinois, and Mr. E. S. SAMPSON of Iowa, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. OMAR D. CONGER, of Michigan, a manager at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, in place of Mr. MARK H. DUNNELL, of Minnesota, excused.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 361) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PAPERS RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Jackson Tibbetts and others, employés of L. J. and J. D. and T. W. Call, late contractors of the Fox River improvement, praying that the amount forfeited to the United States by the contractors by the annulment of their contracts be applied to the payment of wages due them, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to print extra copies of the President's message in relation to the Hamburgh massacre.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Printing, to whom the resolution of the Senator from Indiana was referred, I objected to this publication by Congress of the message and accompanying papers not because I had any disposition whatever to cover up anything that had been done, any outrages that had been committed at Hamburgh, in South Carolina. I objected to it because I believed it to be an attempt to print a political partisan document, designed for political purposes, at the public expense, and to be paid for out of the public Treasury. I have not the least objection that the message of the President of the United States, with all the documents accompanying that message, shall be published by the thousand and the hundreds of thousands by any political party that may desire to publish them at their own expense; but when an attempt is made to publish for partisan purposes this message of the President of the United States, with the accompanying papers, I feel it my duty as a member of the committee to object to it; because it is taking from the public Treasury money that ought not to be used for such a purpose.

What is the character of the paper that it is proposed to publish? It is a message of the President of the United States sent here in obedience to a resolution of this body calling for the information in his possession in reference to a massacre said to have taken place at Hamburgh, in South Carolina, transmitting ex parte statements in reference to the affair. The usual number of that message, with the accompanying papers, has already been published. So far, therefore, as the Senate of the United States or Congress is concerned, and so far as the paper may be useful in order to aid in any legislation which may be necessary and proper to remedy any wrongs that exist there, that purpose has been complied with. But now, after the usual number of copies has been published, after the papers are upon our desks, the proposition is made by the Senator from Indiana to publish an unusual number in addition, 10,000 copies of the papers, to be paid for out of the public Treasury. I do not hesitate to say that the design is to manufacture and circulate at the public expense papers which it is supposed will be of some advantage in the presidential canvass to the republican party. What are the papers accompanying the President's message? The President says he sends:

No. 1. Letter of the 22d of July, 1876, from Governor D. H. Chamberlain, of South Carolina, to me.
No. 2. My reply thereto.
No. 3. Report of Hon. William Stone, attorney-general of South Carolina.
No. 4. Report of General H. W. Purvis, adjutant and inspector general of South Carolina.
No 5. Copy of evidence taken before a coroner's jury investigating facts relating to the Hamburgh massacre.
No. 6. Printed copy of statement by M. C. Butler, of South Carolina.
No. 7. Printed letter from the same to the editors of the Journal of Commerce.
No. 8. Copy of letter from Governor Chamberlain to Hon. T. J. Robertson.
No. 9. An address to the American people by the colored citizens of Charleston, South Carolina.
No. 10. An address by a committee appointed at a convention of leading representatives of Columbia, South Carolina.
No. 11. Copy of letter of July 15, 1876, from the district attorney of Mississippi to the Attorney-General of the United States.
No. 12. Letter from same to same.
No. 13. Copy of report of a grand jury lately in session in Oxford, Mississippi.

It will be seen by an examination that these papers are mere ex parte statements in reference to the Hamburgh affair; that all the papers accompanying the President's message which relate to the unfortunate Hamburgh imbroglio are but mere partisan ex parte statements. It may be that they are true; I do not say whether they are true or not; I have not the evidence before me; I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts to say whether these statements are true or not true; but I have this to say, that I have no doubt there are many exaggerations of the affair contained in these statements. I have no doubt that a full investigation of them will prove, as is proved on all such occasions, that much exaggeration exists in reference to this affair.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a minute? Will the Senator believe the account if I give it to him in a democratic newspaper?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will furnish myself with all the reading I want. I have got pretty nearly old enough to select my own reading.

Now, I say if there was any violation of law at Hamburgh, and I have no question there was; if there was any cruelty, and I have no question there was; if there was any inhumanity, and I have no doubt there was, that inhumanity ought to be ferreted out and punished to the full extent of the law. I am not here to defend any violation of the law either in South Carolina or any other State. The whole tenor of my life has been against it. The democratic party of my State and of every State of this Union, so far as I know, have set their faces against all violations of law, and they have complained justly and most bitterly against the numerous violations of law that have taken place under republican rule. They are the last men, therefore, who would encourage any violations of law. That there may be individual democrats that are guilty of crime I do not deny, just as there are individual republicans that have been sent to the penitentiary for their crimes.

The character of these papers are mere ex parte statements, which cannot convey to the country a true idea of the condition of affairs at Hamburgh and the true circumstances that led to that unfortunate massacre of the colored people at that point. And yet it is proposed to take these ex parte statements and to publish them at the public expense, and strew them broadcast over this country as a partisan political document to be used in the approaching campaign. Is that fair? Do democrats come here and ask that documents may be printed at the public expense to advance the interests of the democratic party? It may not cost a very large sum of money, but it is one of the items that helps to swell the public expenditures, which the people in these days of inquiry will recognize and condemn.

I wish to call attention to the character of one of these documents, and I refer to the letter of the President of the United States to Governor Chamberlain, which accompanies his message. I want to direct attention to this document and to ask my republican friends if in their judgment, if in their honest opinion, it is a document which ought to be published and sent out to the country, and if they will not place their President in an improper light before the American people. In reply to the letter of Governor Chamberlain the President of the United States says:

The scene at Hamburgh, as cruel, bloodthirsty, wanton, unprovoked, and as uncalled for as it was, is only a repetition of the course that has been pursued in other southern States within the last few years, notably in Mississippi and Louisiana.

You will observe that the President of the United States in answering a letter specifically directed to him in reference to a particular transaction takes occasion in reply to that letter to hold up before the American people that there is a spirit of lawlessness in Mississippi, in Louisiana, and in other southern States. Does it comport, I ask, with the dignity and character of the Executive of this nation to become the persecutor, I will not say a partisan accuser, but an accuser of the people over whom he presides? He is the President not of a party. He is the President of this whole Republic, as much the President of the democrats of this country as of the republicans. It is true he was not elected by their votes, but he is charged with the duties appertaining to the executive office, and is the Chief Magistrate of the whole country; and it does not, in my judgment, comport with the high character of the President of the United States to become the accuser of the people of any State, especially when there was no case before him calling for the voluntary statement made in referenct to these States. He goes on:

Mississippi is governed to-day by officials chosen through fraud and violence, such as would scarcely be accredited to savages, much less to a civilized and Christian people.

Does the President possess the evidence of that? Where is the evidence? There has been none laid before the Senate of the United States. There have been ex parte statements. There have been newspaper accounts of an election in Mississippi. There have been dispatches, I have no question, sent from private individuals, but that is not evidence that ought to govern the action of any person and that ought to govern the action especially of an Executive of this country. The President assumes, upon the ex parte statements that have been made in reference to that election, that they are true without proof. He assumes it upon the mere declaration of political partisans and demagogues, and not upon any evidence furnished to the Executive or the Senate of the United States. He goes on:

How long these things are to continue or what is to be the final remedy, the Great Ruler of the Universe only knows. But I have an abiding faith that the remedy will come and come speedily, and earnestly hope that it will come peacefully. There has never been a desire on the part of the North to humiliate the South.

I will not speak on that point. There are gentlemen in the country who believe the contrary, who at least believe that the republican party in some of the Northern States have had a disposition to oppress the people of the Southern States because they differed with them politically. But this question I shall not raise in this discussion, because I wish to notice another thing which is said in this letter.

Nothing is claimed for one State—that is not freely accorded to all the others, unless it may be the right to kill negroes and republicans without fear of punishment, and without loss of caste or reputation. This has seemed to be a privilege claimed by a few States.

Says the President—

Notice that declaration. The President emphatically says that it has been a privilege claimed by a few States of this Union "to kill negroes and republicans without fear of punishment, and without loss of caste or reputation." That is not a charge made by the President against individuals. It is a charge made against southern States of this Union. What State, I ask, has manifested any such spirit? It is the first time that I have ever heard the charge preferred against any State of this Union as desiring to kill negroes and republicans. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] this morning said he had no doubt there were hundreds and thousands of good men in all the Southern States. That, I confess, was a great concession to be made by the Senator from Indiana; but the President of the United States in his letter to Governor Chamberlain openly proclaimed to the world that there are a few States of this Union over which he presides as the Chief Magistrate where the privilege is claimed "to kill negroes and republicans without fear of punishment, and without loss of caste or reputation." Is that a document that ought to go out to be published at public expense and spread broadcast through this land? What will be the estimate of the American people of their President when that document is spread before them? If the republican party can afford to publish that document, which will hurt their President alone, the democrats cannot and will not object, but let them publish it at their own expense. Do not let them come and ask for appropriations out of the public Treasury to publish a document of that character which is designed to have a political bearing, and for no other purpose that I can see.

So far then as the contents of these papers are concerned, in my opinion, they are not worthy of publication. These papers misrepresent the public sentiment in the South. Southern gentlemen I know on this floor have felt some hesitation in entering into discussions upon these questions. All they say is misunderstood and misconstrued because they come from the southern section of the country; and yet we are all familiar enough with the history of the South to deny that there is any such inhumanity, any such want of civilization, any such barbarism, any such atrocity as is sought to be imputed to them in these papers. What has been the effect of this constant misrepresentation of the people of the South? What has been its effect upon the prosperity of the South, upon the happiness of the people of the South? You have by this very policy of misrepresentation stirred up to some extent animosity between the races. You have disturbed at times the public peace in the Southern States by constant, invariable denunciation of southern white men when there is an election to come on and by representing the southern white men as hostile to the negro. There has been, I have no doubt, a disturbance of the friendly relations which ought to exist between the races and which would have existed between the races if this policy had not been pursued by our republican friends in the management of their campaign interests. But it is not alone the friendly relations of the people of the South that have been disturbed. You have affected the material prosperity of the Southern States. You have to a certain extent by this course of procedure disorganized the labor system of the Southern States, and you have by that means impaired the prosperity to a certain extent of that section of the country. But it is not only the Southern States that have been affected. Just in proportion as you affect the material interests of one section of the country you affect the material interests of every portion of the country. When the productive industries of the South are disorganized by your policy, when the labor system of the South is disorganized and the products of that section of the country reduced, the material prosperity of the people of the northern section have to some extent also been impaired. Hence you see to-day in all the Northern States the industries of the country are languishing; and I assert here as my firm conviction that much of the languishing condition of northern industry is owing to the policy that the republican party has pursued toward the southern people.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is that?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say you disturb the friendly relations of the races, disorganize their labor, destroy their prosperity. They are unable to become purchasers in northern markets, and therefore the northern people begin to feel the reactionary influence of that policy. You may read to-day in the downfall and bankruptcies of your merchants in the North, in the closed manufactories and workshops, and in the distress of starving families and the demand of hundreds and thousands of people in the North, some of the results in part of the policy which you have pursued toward the South—a policy of denunciation and oppression, at variance with the true interests of the whole country, and which will in its reactionary influence prove as ruinous to the North as to the South, and the first fruits of which is already beginning to be realized.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion to him? So far as the relations between the colored people of the South and the white people are concerned, with reference to their relations as employers and laborers, the relation is satisfactory. So far as I have been able to ascertain no complaint whatever is made in that regard; but it is said by the southern people that outside of politics the relations are harmonious.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Minnesota cannot inform me of anything about the condition of labor or anything else in States that have a colored population.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it, "or anything else."

Mr. LOGAN. Could he inform you on any subject?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose he could inform me on some subjects; but I am not so certain that the Senator from Illinois could. [Laughter.] I say the Senator from Minnesota cannot give me any information that I do not possess in reference to the relations existing between the races in States where there is a large colored population. I do not live in such a State; yet I live in a State where there is a very considerable colored population. About one-fifth of the entire population of my State is colored, and I say that I know that even in that small State there have been men who have instructed some of the negroes not to work for the white people. In my own town I have heard of the declarations of colored people that they would not work for the white trash. Fortunately a large portion of the colored people have too much sense to be governed by any such persons as would give them that kind of instruction. But there are in every community of colored people some who are not sufficiently intelligent not to be influenced by such advice and instructions. In the Southern States while the relations between the races are perhaps as harmonious as could be expected, under the circumstances, when men have gone down through those States for political purposes seeking to array them in hostility against the whites, trying to indoctrinate them into every idea of prejudice against the whites, I am pretty sure that there is a large class of the laboring population that are governed by the advice of men who are their very worst enemies.

I said, however, before I was interrupted that the effect of this constant agitation, of this constant declaration that the southern white people were hostile to the colored people, that the southern white people are cruel to the colored people, that the southern white men are inimical to the colored people among them, has had its effect upon the industries of the country both North and South. There are hundreds of thousands of people to-day out of employment, and my firm opinion is that the policy which has been pursued injurious to one section of the country has had its reactionary influence and is now being felt in the northern sections of the country. It is time that this state of feeling should be put aside. It is time that cordiality and good-will should exist between the people of every section of this country. I am sorry to see that on all occasions, whenever an opportunity is afforded in this Chamber, declarations unjust and hostile to the South are made. I regretted exceedingly yesterday when I picked up the letter of the President of the United States to Governor Chamberlain to find that he had indulged in language which is, in my opinion, calculated not to promote the harmony of this country, not to promote the peace and good order of society, but calculated to represent the President himself as a partisan of the worst kind when, in my judgment, though elected by one party he ought to regard himself as the Executive of the whole people.

Mr. President, are we never to see the end? Is this thing to go on continually, and are even the letters of the candidates for President and Vice-President to be criticised and misrepresented because they did not condescend in their letters to notice a local crime? The Senator from Indiana in his criticism this morning has tried to make the impression on the country that the candidates of the democratic party were afraid to denounce the affair at Hamburgh, and yet there is denunciation of violations of law both in the letter of Governor Tilden and of Mr. Hendricks. I say to the Senator from Indiana they are engaged in a great work. They could not come down to deal with the individual commission of crimes. They have called the attention of the country to the condition of your civil service; they have called the attention of the country to the wasteful extravagance that has been practiced under republican rule; and they have pointed out the remedy. They have called the attention of the country to your financial condition, and they have suggested the necessity for its improvement. They are in earnest for reform and retrenchment. They are dealing with the interests of a great people, and they have not concealed their sentiments upon any of the absorbing topics that will enter into the coming campaign. They have spoken out with a manly frankness and boldness that defies a single criticism, except that which was uttered by the honorable Senator from Indiana that they did not come down and express their opinion about the affair at Hamburgh. That was the highest compliment the Senator from Indiana could have paid the letters of the candidates for President and Vice-President on the democratic side. The only fault he could find with those letters was that Tilden and Hendricks did not disgrace themselves and disgust their party by expressing their abhorrence of the commission of an individual offense. All else in their letters is conceded impliedly at least to be right, that being the only criticism volunteered in reference to anything contained in the letters.

In reference to the candidates of the republican party I have not one word to say. I scorn that partisanship which seeks to deal with individual character. If I can find nothing in the republican party to condemn during the coming campaign I shall certainly make no assault either upon Mr. Hayes or Mr. WHEELER. I have no question that they are gentlemen of character and reputation, and I should be a blackguard myself if I would attempt in any respect to detract from the character which they possess. I hope that in this campaign individual character will be left alone. There is enough, I will say to our republican friends, in the administration of affairs by the republican party to engage all the talent of the democratic party. They will find enough there to condemn, and will be sure to do it. Public duty demands it. The duty which they owe to the country demands that they shall expose the peculation, the fraud, the venalities, the corruption, the extravagance, the maladministration that have existed in this country for the last eight years and have brought it almost to the verge of ruin. We shall go out before the people and hold up to them, backed up by proofs irrefutable, not by newspaper statements, but by proofs irrefutable, the fact that there has been a maladministration of affairs such as never disgraced the country from its foundation to the present administration.

Now, Mr. President, I shall leave this question; but in conclusion I protest against the publication of political documents, partisan documents, designed for partisan use and partisan purposes only, at the public expense. If this resolution passes among the complaints which the democrats will have of the republican Senate will be that they voted, deliberately voted, to take money from the public Treasury in order to publish a partisan political document to circulate in the approaching canvass.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator takes his seat will he answer just one question in reference to the point he mentions now? Does he base his objection to the publication of this document on the ground that it is an unnecessary expense or on the ground that he disbelieves the statements in the document?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator had listened to me I said that so far as the facts disclosed are concerned I had no means of knowing whether they were true or false; that these are ex parte statements. I expressed the belief that there was a great deal of truth mixed up with much of error, but that they were ex parte statements and should not be published by the Senate as the true facts in the case. In reply to the Senator I will say that I have no objection to the publication of these papers if the Senator from Illinois and his party chooses to publish them at their own expense. I am not only willing that they shall publish 10,000, but a hundred thousand or a million copies if they see proper. What I object to is that it is proposed to be done at Government expense.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the point. The point is whether it is the want of truthfulness of the statement which the Senator objects to or whether it is the expense of publishing it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object to both. I read statements of the President of the United States in which he charged upon a few of the States of this Union that they claimed the privilege of killing negroes and republicans without fear of punishment. That is not a charge against individuals, because if the President had said there were in the Southern States individuals who have such an impression his message would not have been subject to that criticism, but he prefers the charge against several States as claiming the privilege, if the Senator will mark the distinction, of murdering negroes and republicans "without fear of punishment." I say that is not a statement that ought to go out to the country from the Senate of the United States. The Senator from Illinois believes as much as I do that such a statement as that ought not to be published to the country as emanating from the White House. The White House ought to be content that the bloody shirt can float from this Capitol. I do not want to see the Presidential Mansion made the point from which the bloody shirt shall wave. Rather let the ensign of our freedom, the Stars and Stripes, float from the Presidential Mansion; but tell me not that the home which Washington filled, which Jefferson filled, which Jackson filled, which Polk filled, which a long line of illustrious Presidents has filled, has become the center wheel from which is to flaunt the bloody shirt that has waved from this Capitol for the last several years.

Mr. LOGAN. Do I understand the Senator now to say that he objects to the President's message because it is not truthful? Is that the point?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Do I understand that the Senator wants information?

Mr. LOGAN. I say then one of the points of objection made by the Senator is that the President's message is not a truthful message. Is that it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator may put what construction he pleases upon it. I have made all the comments I desire to make. I have no disposition to occupy the floor any longer. If the Senator from Illinois desires to discuss this question he can proceed.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no desire to make any remarks at all. I merely desire to know the position the Senator occupies; that is all.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I had no intention whatever to take any part in this debate and would not have done so had it not been for a remark which the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] saw proper to make, that is to say, that there were Senators on this floor who dared not denounce crimes committed in the South. To that point and that only I care to address myself. Since I have been a member of the Senate I have never uttered a word calculated in the slightest degree to estrange the sections of this Union, nor have I done so anywhere. I have never in all the course of my life tolerated crime, either directly or indirectly. I will say to the Senate, as every man acquainted with history knows, that at the subsidence of a great civil war bad elements and bad men are spewed out upon society. This is true everywhere. It was true at the North at the close of the war; it was true at the South at the close of the war. In 1865, when the last of the confederate army surrendered, of which I was a member, I had a conference with the commanding officer at Shreveport, General Veitch, who was a citizen of the same State with the Senator from Indiana, in which he understood from me what my feelings were in regard to the preservation of law and order, and I said to him that I would go to my home and aid all in my power to protect the people against lawlessness and to defend law and order. I went home, and at my own instance I went to Union men, as they were then called, men who had been opposed to me during the war, who had been during the war known as Union men, but who were good and true citizens of the community in which I live, and I said, "Let us hold a meeting of the people; let it not be a meeting of the people of one party or another party, but a meeting of the whole people; and let us make a joint call upon all the people of the country to come up and unite in a solemn pledge to defend law and order." We held that meeting. It embraced the best men of the county. I was the chairman of the committee which reported the resolutions. Those resolutions were unanimously adopted; and from that day to this we have had law and order where I live, with no other exceptions than fall to the lot of communities generally.

I will say further, that when a citizen of the State represented by the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. LOGAN] was cruelly and brutally murdered in the county of Grayson, the people of Grayson County, irrespective of party, made up a purse and employed counsel to prosecute the two men who committed the murder. I happened to be one of those counsel and in the worst of the time we have had since the war closed, about 1867 or 1868, when this affair occurred, during the days of reconstruction, in a densely crowded court-house, when I knew there were desperadoes present in the court-room, I and the other counsel employed dared to stand up before the jury of the country and prosecute those two men, and they were hung. Before every jury of the people where I appeared, and before the people of Texas wherever I have appeared, I have in unmeasured terms denounced mob violence and violations of law and order.

In so far as the facts connected with this immediate case at Hamburgh are concerned, I am not sufficiently advised to pronounce an opinion; but if it be true, as has been here asserted by Senators who have spoken, that prisoners were murdered, it was a dastardly and cowardly act, and I have no words at my command sufficiently strong to denounce such a crime. Whether the statements made here be true or not true I do not know, because I am not sufficiently acquainted with the facts; but I repeat that, if the statement as made be true, then the English language furnishes no words sufficiently strong to condemn such conduct. So far as I know, no such investigation has been had as will enable us to determine the truth or falsity of these reports with certainty. Still, if it does prove true, the criminals should be brought to condign punishment.

Furthermore, I will say that the State in which I live has been the last foot-hold where desperadoes could plant their feet; northern desperadoes driven from the North as well as southern desperadoes driven from other portions of the South. A northern man traveling in company with two other northern men was murdered in my own county by one of his own party, and the murderer was convicted and sent to the penitentiary for life for his crime. We got this refuse population, spewed up by the war, not only from the Southern States, but from the Northern States. They were thrown upon our State, and we, the people of Texas, a few years ago were held responsible for that which it was absolutely impossible, in the very nature of things, for us to have prevented. It was the last place they could have gone to. They went there, but, thank God, most of them have been driven away, by the public sentiment of a law-abiding people, across the Rio Grande into Mexico, and out into t e wild country of the Indians. This very day we have organized in the State of Texas, under a democratic administration, a police force for the very purpose of hunting down and ferreting out those desperadoes yet in the State, wherever they may be found. I refer to the message which the governor of my State delivered at the last meeting of the Legislature, in which he denounced this lawlessness and crime in the most unmeasured terms. I have examined many of the papers which have come to me from my State, and those speaking of this Hamburgh matter place it as I do, and say that if the facts be as they are reported it was unjustifiable to the last degree, and a sin in the sight of God and man, which no good man can indorse; but, like myself, they have as yet no certain, reliable information. I wish here to say that I indorse crime nowhere. I condemn crime at all times and under all circumstances and, I might almost say, in season and out of season. I remember some seven or eight years ago, in the days of reconstruction and when lawlessness was at its worst, I was addressing a jury, and the court-house was crowded; while I was prosecuting a man for the crime of murder, a bullet was thrown against the breast of a juryman, and he picked it up and showed it to me. It was an indication of what might be expected; but that man was prosecuted to the gallows and suffered the penalty of the law. I say what Senators do not know, as I do, that the good men of the country in the Southern States, and more especially of such a State as mine, which was the last resting-place, as I have said, for desperadoes, have had to show more courage since the war by far than they showed during the war; but the good men have got the upper hand, and through all that land to-day they rule and control it save in the exceptional cases I have stated, and it is because men had the nerve to dare do their duty.

Mr. President, if there has been a political murder committed within the limits of the State of Texas I have no knowledge of that fact.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether it is within his knowledge, or known to him by report, that in the county of Limestone within the last year forty negroes were killed? It is so reported in the newspapers.

Mr. MAXEY. I happen to know something about the Limestone affair and I will state what I do know. There was then under a republican administration a police formed, some of whom were such as God Almighty never permitted to curse any country before, and I hope never will again. That force went into the county of Limestone and entered the house of an old citizen, Colonel Gathings, who resided near by in an adjoining county, and at the hour of midnight robbed that old man of $3,000 in gold. That is what took place in Limestone County and that is the true state of the case. My colleague will verify me in regard to the fact.

Mr. CONKLING. What followed that?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The question I asked was whether forty negroes were not killed in Limestone County.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no knowledge of any such thing as that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is so stated in a Texan paper, a republican paper to be sure, the Waco Register. The number is not stated in this paper, but it is stated that more were killed than at the Hamburgh massacre.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why should they not be killed if somebody was robbed of $3,000?

Mr. BOUTWELL. This paper states—

In a county just adjoining to this, in Texas—

Which I understand is Limestone County—

there was a massacre of equal atrocity to the Hamburgh massacre and in which many more were killed, which comparatively few of the people of the North ever heard of at all we suppose.

Mr. MAXEY. I know something of the editor of that paper and I think I know the circumstances connected with this matter. I do know that a tax was levied upon the people of Limestone County that amounted almost to the confiscation of their property. It was levied by a military commander and collected to pay for what they called the expenses of keeping up the police in the county of Limestone. I have not time to go through the whole of that transaction; but I will simply say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there are two sides to the question, and so far as the side of the white people is concerned, I can very well understand why they were enraged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What became of the forty negroes, I should like to know?

Mr. MAXEY. I never heard of the forty-negro matter.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I supposed that from the Senator from Texas we could ascertain the truth without having any one side presented. The report in this paper is that there was a massacre in the county adjoining that in which this paper is published, which, I know, is Limestone County, and a larger number were killed than in the Hamburgh massacre.

Mr. MAXEY. Does it say anything about the number killed there?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; but I understand from other sources that the number was forty.

Mr. CONKLING. The statement is that a larger number were killed than at Hamburgh.

Mr. MAXEY. I became acquainted with the editor of that paper here. He is the postmaster at Waco, and upon the recommendation of his republican friends I helped to get him his place.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I suppose you believe in his statement.

Mr. MAXEY. He is a strong partisan, and I suppose he made, from what the Senator has stated, a strong partisan statement without specifying any particular number. I never saw the number of the paper referred to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not wish to press the honorable Senator from Texas; but I believe he did state to the Senate that he knew all about the affair. He has given us an observation that sounds very much like an excuse for what may have taken place without informing us exactly as to what did take place.

Mr. MAXEY. That matter grew out of a difficulty in which there was a colored man who was a complete desperado and considered so by all men. It resulted from the shooting down in the county of Limestone in cold blood of a citizen, and from that this difficulty sprung. This police force was sent there and the property of almost every citizen was taken to pay the expense of sending the police there.

Mr. HAMILTON. I beg to correct my colleague in the statement about this affair. This massacre is said to have occurred about eight or nine months ago. The police were sent up to Limestone County in 1871.

Mr. MAXEY. That is the affair I supposed the Senator from Massachusetts was referring to.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am not prepared to state positively about what is stated in the Waco Register; but I have had from many sources the statement made to me that that massacre was most deplorable. A colored man, a clergyman and a lecturer, was traveling through the country for the purpose of enlightening his countrymen, as I have understood. I have not been at home since it occurred. He was charged with some offense, I do not know what, in the county of Limestone, and was pursued by a crowd, I think a vigilance committee, I have always so understood, and surrounded in his house at night. He, understanding perfectly well what his fate would be, was armed and refused to surrender; but he was persuaded finally, after a parley, to give up his arms, and on giving up his arms, he was shot by five or six persons and killed on the spot. Then a raid was made upon the family with which he associated and where he stopped, I believe. Always in excitements of that sort crowds of negroes gather like sheep in some prominent quarter. They gathered there, were surrounded and assailed, and on that occasion about forty of them were killed, women, children, and men, as I have understood.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who did it?

Mr. HAMILTON. A vigilance committee of white men, white-liners, or something of that kind, it is stated.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask if that statement is made there in the Waco Register?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have never understood, if my colleague will pardon me, that one solitary man of those men has ever been arrested or tried or punished, and if it is so, I hope my colleague knows something about it.

Mr. MAXEY. Does my colleague know in an authoritative way anything in regard to that matter?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have had it from a number of individuals; from the gentleman who edits this paper while here; I have had it from a gentleman who was run out of Limestone County about that time, Mr. Howard, and proceeded here to Washington.

Mr. MAXEY. I have only to say in regard to what my colleague states that I supposed when the Senator from Massachusetts interrupted me he was referring to a matter which was investigated and known as the Limestone troubles in 1871. I presumed that he was making reference to that, and I answered that point. So far as the matter to which my colleague now refers is concerned, I never heard of it before. It took place, if at all, since I have been here, and it is news to me. I have this to say, however, about it, that if the statement as made by my colleague is true, and for that I do not vouch nor does he, because he does not pretend to have authoritative testimony on the subject, then I denounce that as an unwarranted, unjustifiable, unholy, and criminal murder.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Before the Senator leaves this subject I wish to make one further inquiry, and that is whether he does not rely upon the statement made by the editor of this newspaper, who, I understand the Senator, holds the office of postmaster upon his recommendation?

Mr. MAXEY. I can only say in reference to that affair that we have very few republicans down in Texas that we could "bank on" very highly. It is very different from what it is anywhere else. We have a democratic majority of 100,000, and we have to take the best material we can get for republican positions, and we get no democratic positions from here. The editor of that paper is about as good as we can get I suppose at the town of Waco. I know nothing about his statement personally, but I am informed that he is a strong partisan, and that he gives strong partisan coloring to anything that he thinks will be to the advantage of his party. He is an officer holding a valuable office in the town of Waco, in the county of McLennan, and I presume, like most in Texas in like position, he understands somewhat how to make the most of these troubles.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is quite important that the Senate should understand whether this is a trustworthy statement.

Mr. MAXEY. I refer the Senator from Massachusetts to my colleague, who is much better acquainted with him than I am.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Without wishing to interrupt the Senator from Texas——

Mr. MAXEY. There is a limit to all things. I have stated all I know about this man. I have known him since he has come here seeking office. He was represented to me as being a worthy man, and I supported him with my colleague to secure the office of postmaster at Waco.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If he is a postmaster, I presume he is to be believed.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not know whether he is to be believed or not further than I have met him here, as I have stated, in the city of Washington, when he was seeking an office, and having met him with such recommendations as I thought justified me, and knowing that no man of the democratic party, however respectable he might be, could get an office, I united in his application and he was confirmed; and that is all there is about it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator will allow me one question——

Mr. MAXEY. Go on. Let us hear what you have to say.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is simply this: Whether when this affair took place in which forty negroes were killed and, as the colleague of the Senator says, not one of the murderers to his knowledge has been punished, the governor and administration of Texas were not entirely in the hands of the democrats?

Mr. MAXEY. I will state that the editor, as I understand it, has made no such statement. You may put this and that together. It is not to be presumed that every man in the State of Texas reads that paper—and I do not know the number who do—knows the number who were killed at Hamburgh. Certainly I do not. He speaks in general terms of the massacre at Hamburgh, and he says, as is stated—for I have not seen the article and have only heard it as it has been read—that there was a massacre equal to that in a county adjoining his, stated in equally vague and general terms, without specifically stating the facts. I do not believe that there was such a massacre, as is stated, of forty colored people. I do not believe that part of the statement. There may have been some difficulty there, and some persons may have been killed, but as to forty being killed, I not believe it. Nor does Mr. Chase say that number was killed there; but it makes no difference whether one, five, ten, twenty, or forty were killed, if the facts are that they were murdered in cold blood, as has been stated by my colleague, upon his information, then I denounce that as an unwarranted, unjustifiable, and unholy crime. But as I have again and again stated, I have no knowledge or information of this affair further than has been stated here. If it occurred at all, it has been since I have been here in attendance on the Senate. And I would go as far toward prosecuting, were I in the State of Texas and living in that portion of the State, those who were engaged, if such were the case, in such an unholy deed as any man within the length and breadth of this land, north, south, east, or west.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question? The Senator says he has never heard of this. I ask him how far Limestone County is from his own residence in Texas?

Mr. MAXEY. I suppose three hundred miles. Limestone County is not one of our most populous counties. Speaking from memory, I should suppose it was about three hundred miles from my residence. I was never in Limestone County in my life, except passing through on the cars. I only know the county by the map and seeing it named in the newspapers, and from what could be seen passing through on the cars.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is there a democratic paper published in that county?

Mr. MAXEY. I think so. There are one hundred and forty-seven or more counties in the State, and I do not assume to know all the papers that are published in Texas; but there are democratic papers in most of the settled counties. If Senators, whose questions seem to be more to endeavor to throw me off my guard, which is difficult, rather than to seek real information, will permit me to go on without further interruption, I will proceed with what I have to say.

I rose for the purpose of saying that if crimes are committed anywhere within the limits of the State of Texas, the only State for which I am in any sense responsible as a private citizen, to the fullest extent of the ability which I have I dare to denounce crime there and to prosecute crime there, as I have done when there was danger in such a course; for, Mr. President, seven or eight years ago, when the whole country there had been flooded with the murderers and desperadoes from the North as well as from the South, it required some nerve in a law-abiding and peaceful man to stand up and denounce and prosecute crime; but now we have in the main got possession of the country, and, in so far as the recent acts of desperadoes are concerned, the one referred to especially I know nothing of. I have heard of some, however, through the State since I have been here. I do know that a company has been recently organized by the democratic Legislature of the State of Texas for the very purpose of hunting down crime; and I know that it is placed under one of the most gallant and daring officers, Captain McNally, that ever commanded a company, a man who is in favor of law and order anywhere and everywhere. If that is not a step in the right direction, what is? There may be sporadic cases throughout Texas, and it is only that class of cases that can be referred to, because in that vast area of country, as large as five of the largest States in the Union, a young and growing State, there are means and facilities of murderers and desperadoes getting out of the way and out of the clutches of the law that do not exist in the older States; and I ask if it is just, if it is right, to charge upon the whole people of a State like that these crimes, committed by men whose deeds of violence are lamented as much and deplored as much by the people of Texas as they are by the people anywhere? It is not right, it is not just so to do. But so so far as the great general welfare and prosperity of that country are concerned and the condition of that State is concerned, I am here to speak, and not to deny that sporadic cases of crime exist, such as can be found in the city of New York if you will, or the case of one of the foulest murders in Boston, or the case not long ago in Newark, New Jersey.

Everywhere so long as man is fallible, so long as man is fallen and erring, crime will be committed; and I ask—and I make that point—is it right, is it just, is it fair to charge crime upon the whole people of New York because of the Nathan murder or the car-hook murder, or upon the people of Newark the other day for that crime committed there when several men were killed, or the people of Boston because of the crime that was committed there lately by this strange boy and this other one? I ask if it be right, because of cases like that, to charge upon a whole community who are doing all in their power to extirpate crime and bring the offenders to condign punishment? Is it right to charge crime upon a whole people because of such cases? And, sir, if we obey the golden rule, if we had that feeling in our hearts which the late President of the United States but a few days before his death expressed when he said "charity toward all and malice toward none," if we would do unto others as we would have them do unto us, we should not consider it just, fair, or right to make such charges against the whole people of the South who under these infortuitous circumstances have been struggling as they have been. Think of it! Their property gone, their labor system changed as it was at the close of the war, their farms devastated, their homes desolated, all they hold near and dear on earth almost lost, everything except the life of those who survived, but little property left in all that country, and in that condition of things the entire control of almost all these States was taken from the people who had theretofore had control of them and given to strangers, strange rulers put over the people and a system adopted such as had never been known, the system of reconstruction, to any civilized nation so far as I know. Under all these adverse circumstances, with an enormous tax of from two and a half to three cents a pound laid upon the little cotton which they were enabled to raise and every other species of tax that the State authorities could devise, under all these circumstances I ask if you should charge upon these people every crime that was committed, not by them but in their midst, when they were struggling against poverty, when they were struggling to keep want from the door, when they were struggling to feed wife and children, when they had not the power, when the administration of the laws was not in their hands, but in the hands of strangers.

I ask if it is just that these men, good and true, such as the Senator from Indiana admits to be good and true, should be charged and held responsible for crimes committed by murderers and desperadoes and the foul scum of the earth thrown to the surface by the war, preying upon all alike, respecting neither one side nor the other, looking alone to gain. It was the money they wanted, and for that they would kill a democrat as quick as a republican. It matters not who possessed the means, it was the money, the gain that they were after, and those of us who live in that country know that to be true.

So far as these political crimes are concerned of which so much has been said personally I have no knowledge. Within the entire extent of my acquaintance in Texas, which is somewhat extensive, I have not knowledge of a single instance of that kind. I do know, however, that when I am at home republicans meet me there as friends and neighbors, the same as democrats. I do know that until a very recent day and upon his own voluntary action the cashier of the bank in my town, in which I am a stockholder and a director, is a republican, and there was personally not a more popular man in all that country. We make no distinction where men are respectable. We want people there, honest, good, upright people; and when we get them there, if we have the ability to do it, and we do our best to do it, we will make democrats out of them; but we will let them exercise their own free will and do as to them may seem best.

Now, Mr. President, I answered in regard to what I supposed was the allusion made by the Senator from Massachusetts to the troubles in Limestone County in 1871. I am told by my colleague that it was not that, but it was another one that he referred to. I have stated all that I care to say about that. I state here again that there are crimes, as I judge from the public prints which are sent to me, which have been committed throughout the State, such as occur in every State, and I say in addition that the civil authorities of that State are doing all in their power to suppress these crimes and have taken the extraordinary step which I have just now mentioned of organizing a police company under a captain of known nerve, of known prudence, and known intelligence, who are required to act in concert with the sheriff as his posse in hunting down criminals wherever they may be found.

I say further, so far as I know—and if I understand the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota, who has recently been South, he does not dispute that—the relation of employer and employé between the white men and the colored men throughout all the length of my acquaintance in Texas is kind, just, liberal; that the colored people there, who are not land-owners but hold the labor, are treated well by the white people; and that common sense would indicate that it was the duty of the white people as well as their interest so to treat them. This is shown by the fact that we are constantly progressing in wealth and in prosperity. More than that——

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what are the evils then that lead to these extraordinary atrocities that seem to occur in many of these States? If the private relations are all correct, what is it that leads the white men to kill the black men and now and then other white men, so much?

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Vermont is too good a scholar to ask that question. I stated in the outset that the student of history would look in vain to a country in which at the close of a great civil war everything was left in peace and in quiet. I say—and it is according to the logic of man's nature—that the inevitable result at the close of a great civil war is to spew out on society bad elements. It has been the case I think always and everywhere. It was the case in the North that bad men were turned out at the close of the war; it was the case in the South and in my own State, as I have already said, which is the extreme southwestern State of the Union, the extreme land in that direction belonging to the Federal Union. We got more than our share, for it was the last resting-place for the foot of these men, and when driven from the North by your strong laws, as you ought to have driven them, when hunted down and you could not catch them and they escaped, they found their last resting-place in Texas.

Mr. PATTERSON rose.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg the Senator not to interrupt me, for it is very disagreeable indeed to be interrupted at almost every sentence.

When they found Texas the last resting-place where they could put the sole of their foot with any hope of evading the law and the State had bad men thrown into it from the North, from the East, from the West, and from the South, it was that class of men who have no personal interest or care for the rights of white or colored men who were the worst enemies to the law. They were the worst enemies to the people, white and black, in that land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What did they do?

Mr. MAXEY. Sir, I am speaking of the days of reconstruction before the democratic party had any control of the State, as thank God it does this day; I am speaking of the days of reconstruction when lawlessness of every description went unwhipped of justice, and for which we are not responsible, for we in nowise controlled the State; the best men of Texas were disfranchised, not permitted so much as to vote or hold office; and for that condition of things and all that took place until the democratic party acceded to power in that State, I do not in any way hold the democratic party responsible. I only have to say, as I have said before, that everywhere during all those dark days I stood up with the good men of the State with all the power that was in me and I battled for law and order and I advised the people of that country, distasteful as the government under which they then lived was, to observe and obey the laws and wait for better times, and I have no doubt that when the Senators who have been assailed here by the suggestion that they dared not stand up and vindicate the law, who can answer for themselves and not I for them, speak, they can give the same account. And I say that I was not alone, but that good men and true all over Texas fearlessly upheld law and order as far as was in their power, and so continued until crime ceased to go unwhipped of justice.

Mr. MCMILLAN and Mr. PATTERSON rose.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Before the Senator from Texas takes his seat, will he allow me to ask one question?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, one at a time, and we shall get through better.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator has said that after the close of the war a lawless element was thrown out upon the North and upon the South. Now, I should like to inquire from the gentleman what instance he can name in regard to any lawless element thrown upon the North from the Army? I do not understand that the result of the war brought upon the North any lawless element, but that the soldiers of the Army came home honest, faithful, law-abiding men; that they entered into their communities and took their part as citizens and have faithfully performed it; and I have never heard in the North of any lawlessness or of any disturbance or of any demoralization resulting to northern soldiers from the war. On the contrary, I have known instances where men have come through that great scene of conflict better men, better citizens, and have discharged their duties faithfully ever since; and that applies to all the northern soldiers. I never have heard of any lawless element resulting to the North from that war.

Mr. MAXEY. I am very glad, indeed, that the Senator from Minnesota has interrupted me, for it opens out a train of thought that I am glad to place on record. I have said on occasion, perhaps not here but down in my own State, that since this war has closed I have met the bold and brave soldiers of the North upon terms of fraternity and good-fellowship. We have struck the right hand of friendship and fellowship together, and I say to-day that if we could have left this matter of estrangement between the North and the South to the two armies that fought the battles, it would have been closed years and years ago. But, sir, you could scarcely find a man who served in high command in the Federal Army, I presume, who would say that in all his command there were no bad men. If there was such a company, it was a company of saints which was never heard of before from the days of Hannibal down to the time of which the Senator from Minnesota speaks. I speak of my own country, and I say I believe a braver, a bolder, a more gallant or daring set of men never shouldered the rifle than the soldiers of the confederate army, and yet in that army we had bad men; and that I presume to be the case with every army ever organized from the days of Hannibal down to the last gun that was fired at the surrender at Appomattox.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My point was not that there were not bad men, individuals, in the Army from the North, but that the war resulted in no demoralization of the northern Army.

Mr. MAXEY. That is a philosophical question about which the Senator and myself greatly differ, and I presume all the world and all history will agree with me about that. War is in its nature demoralizing; its tendency is in that direction; and hence it is that almost arbitrary powers are given to commanders, and the organization of an army is essentially different from an organization in civil life. The reason for it is that discipline is an absolute necessity in an army.

Mr. PATTERSON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. MAXEY. Perhaps the Senator might make a point that a confederate general from Texas had spoken certain things against the soldiers. I think not, and the man does not live on earth who can find such a thing in any remark I ever made here or elsewhere.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senator will not attribute to me such a motive. That idea never entered my brain at all.

Mr. MAXEY. I am willing to conduct a dignified debate. I am not willing to be catechised by everybody who seeks to ask a question. I will answer in courtesy everything that is properly put; but there is a limit to all things.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In justice to myself as well as the gentleman, I wish to disavow any such motive. Such a motive never entered my head when I made the inquiry. I do the Senator the honor to say that for him I have the highest respect, and I know he would not make a statement of that kind. It was only in justice to the northern soldiery that I put the inquiry, and it was for the purpose of disabusing the minds of the Senate or of the country, if the remark goes to that extent, that any such result as the Senator indicated had been the case; and I do hope the Senator will not attribute to me such a motive as he has. It does both him and myself injustice.

Mr. MAXEY. I thank the Senator for his correction, and I am glad to take it. I never desire to do any one injustice; it is the last thing in my nature to be unjust to anybody; but it seemed to me that these constant interruptions had some purpose in view. I will say to Senators that I am sufficiently old in the practice of the law to answer a great many questions without being thrown out of harness; but there is no lawyer here but knows that if he is constantly interrupted it breaks the thread of his thought, and he cannot possibly do himself or his theme the justice he otherwise could. I only ask to present my own side of the question; and, when that is done, if I have said anything that any one excepts to, I shall be ready to reply to that. But I think it is but justice that I should state my story in a plain, straightforward way for the benefit of the Senate and the country, and then whatever may be said in reply, let it be said.

I now wish to add that in so far as my intercourse with the members of the Senate is concerned, I have been treated with the utmost courtesy by every member of this body, republican as well as democrat; and the Senator who made the remark this morning to which I refer, the Senator from Indiana, and in answer to which I rose, has always treated me with the most perfect courtesy. I have not a lingering feeling of hate or malice toward a human being in the entire North. We fought this war, so far as I was concerned, squarely and fairly like brave men; and, when the last shot was sounded, and the confederate flag was lowered, and I took my parol to observe and obey the laws in force in the State where I reside, I did so in good faith; and from that day to this I have never directly or indirectly done anything by any remark of mine calculated to produce discord or dissension between the sections of the country. On the contrary, Mr. President, I would rejoice to-day to see in all the length and breadth of this land of ours, North and South, East and West, that same fraternal concord, that same unity and harmony of sentiment that existed when our revolutionary forefathers, at the close of seven long years, triumphed and gained the liberties of the American people. We are one people; our destiny is one; we are bound together in one common Union. It does seem to me that everything calculated to bring about discord and dissension in the land is but a bomb-shell thrown in to produce consternation and destruction. I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota, and he has recently been South in the State of Mississippi, that so far as I know, and my acquaintance is extensive, there is not a prominent man in all the length and breadth of the State in which I live or in the State of Louisiana, where I am next best known, or in the State of Arkansas, lying next adjoining—in those three States there is not a prominent man I know but entertains the same feelings that I do, hoping, trusting, and praying that this war of hate will be buried forever, and that in this one-hundredth year of the independence of American freedom we can again meet as we met at Yorktown, at the close of the war of the Revolution, in one common brotherhood, knowing no North, no South, no East, no West, looking alone to the preservation of the glory of our common flag, the prosperity of our whole people, and a happy destiny for our common country.

Mr. PATTERSON. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask his attention to a question. I understood the Senator from Texas——

Mr. MAXEY. Before the Senator asks his question, I beg to do an act of duty. The floor was yielded to me by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] as an act of courtesy; I told him for ten minutes. I told him what I then thought would be true. I had no expectation in the world of occupying more time than was needed simply to state what I wanted to state, that so far as I was concerned I was a law-and-order man and dare to be so everywhere. The Senate know the reason why I was not able to carry out my agreement with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understood the Senator from Texas to give as an excuse for these crimes in the South that a lawless body of men had been spewed up all over the South by the war; that they are responsible for these acts. Now, I hold in my hand The News and Courier——

Mr. MAXEY. I hope the Senator will put it in his speech and not in mine. That is not a fair way of asking a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to ask a question.

Mr. MAXEY. Ask it directly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will go on anyhow. I hold in my hand The News and Courier, the democratic organ of South Carolina, published in Charleston, and in that I find a list of nearly one hundred gentlemen returned by the coroner's jury as implicated in the Hamburgh massacre. I should like to have the Clerk read the names.

Mr. MAXEY. Why ask me about it? I know nothing about it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want the Clerk to read the names and then I want the Senator from Texas to tell me whether these gentlemen have been spewed up by this revolution. Because, as far as I know these gentlemen, they represent the very best blood in South Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As they call it.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator is talking about South Carolina matters. Let him answer for South Carolina matters.

Mr. PATTERSON. There are some gentlemen in that list from Georgia. I do not know them; but I would ask Senators from Georgia if they are gentlemen?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the list will be read. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will allow the list to be read.

Mr. HARVEY. I yield to the reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the list?

Mr. PATTERSON. A list of persons returned by the coroner's inquest for whom warrants have been issued for being implicated in the Hamburgh massacre.

Aiken men—R. J. Butler, Dr. Shaw, Rev. John Mealy, Thomas Butler, A. P. Butler, Henry Getsen, William Briggs, John Butler, Harrison Butler, Luther Reese, Dunbar Lamar, Pierce Butler, Crayton Matheny, Cornelius Benson, Aaron Tyler, Charles Coffin, Thomas Shiver, John Crawford, Robert Gardner, Jack Vandiver, Charles Kernaghan, Walker Matheny, Frank Taylor, (colored,) Isaiah Marshal, (colored,) George Vincent, Arthur Johnson, Dr. Hugh Shaw, George Busel, John Busch, Leroy Hammond, James Hammond, James Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Daniel Glover, Robert Morgan, John Lamar, Samuel Page, Luther Ramson, Thomas Plunkett, Frank Kramer, John Oliver, Benjamin Vandiver, and Pleasant Spinall.

Edgefield men—M. C. Butler, Benjamin Tilman, Charles Glover, Frank Settles, Joseph Merriwether, John Swearingen, James McKie, Tol Glover, George Adams, James Lanham, William Glover, John Roger, and Augustus Glover.

Georgia men—Thomas W. Carwile, William Robertson, James Clark, Dish Ramey, John Smith, Garland A. Snead, Joseph D. Twiggs, Robert Chafee, Kinloch Chafee, Leopold Myers, William Pemble, John Bridges, Captain Conway, Murty Tarver, John Damish, —— Hezzie, —— Hezzie, George Hood, James Glover, William Antignac, Nick Bullinean, Polk Thomas, Daniel Hertz, Jacob Hertz, Mike Conner, Babe Bowers, Sam Whaley, John McNaer, John Kirkpatrick, and John Twiggs.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not know anything about the persons named from Georgia; I do not know all the persons named in South Carolina; but I do know a good many of them personally and I know a good many of them by reputation, and I have no hesitation in saying that they were never spewed up by any revolution. They represent the very best families and the very best blood in South Carolina, as they claim, and they are, some of them, very good people, I will say. I was unwilling to let such a statement go to the country as was made by the Senator from Texas without a contradiction of that kind.

Mr. HARVEY. As far as the question of time is concerned between myself and my friend, the Senator from Texas, I will make that all right by making a ten-minute speech myself, and in doing so I will talk but very little if any about the last war, but a little about what he styles the present war of hate; and in that connection probably it as well to inquire how the last engagement, the last collision occurred in the war to which he alludes. How were the people who were murdered at Hamburgh engaged at the time? It seems from the history of the case that they were marching along as a militia company under the State law of South Carolina, engaged in celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of the natal day of the Republic of which they are citizens as much as the Senator from Texas, the Senator from Delaware, or myself, or any other Senator here. They were as much entitled to celebrate that day in the way they saw fit as either of us. They were marching peacefully along the street of the town in which they live. They were not bearing the "bloody shirt" that the Senator from Delaware talks about so much. They were bearing what Daniel Webster called "the gorgeous ensign of the Republic," a banner which they had the right to bear. They were not "on bloody deeds intent." They were behaving themselves as peaceful, good, citizens of the State of which they were natives and citizens.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him aquestion? Does he speak of matters of his own knowledge or from hearsay?

Mr. HARVEY. I am speaking from knowledge acquired from the examination of good authority, the proper authority to give us information on this subject. And in this connection I will say that the republican party is not responsible for this war of hate. The Senator from Texas said that in his State there were not many republicans that it would do to bank on. It may be that these republicans in South Carolina would not in his estimation do to bank on. But, sir, I will say to him and to every Senator here that it is my opinion that the republican party will not much longer permit republicans, even though they may not be considered worthy to be banked upon, to be shot down in their own homes, even by the descendants of Calhoun, McDuffie, or Butler, or any others of the best families of South Carolina. I say it will not be permitted. This war of hate will be stopped.

The professions of the democracy of regard for the political rights of negroes reminds me of the story which was told of the old field marshal of France who, returning from the wars in Spain, brought with him a number of works of art obtained by him in a very questionable way, or rather it would be more proper to state in an unquestionably bad way. It seems that in the course of time he was exhibiting these pictures to some visitors. In passing one he remarked that he felt a great regard for that picture for the reason that it had at one time saved the lives of two estimable persons. The visitors wondered very much, of course, how this picture had had that effect, and were afterward informed by an aid-de-camp of the marshal that the old marshal threatened to have the owners shot if they did not give it up. [Laughter.] That is just the kind of regard that the democracy entertain for the political rights of the negroes. They say in effect to them, by these occurrences, by their character, by their sequences, "Give up your right of making a free political choice and you will be protected, you will not be shot down like dogs." You can see evidence of that every time these occurrences are alluded to. We are reminded that they occur in States where the officers are republicans. The Senator from Ohio emphatically reiterated that assertion this morning. What is the inference to be drawn? It is this, that whenever you will yield, whenever the colored and white republicans of a State will yield their right to a free choice of officers and of the party that they prefer, then they may have peace. Even Mr. Tilden as quoted by the Senator from Ohio is reported as saying something like this: that we may have peace on the basis set forth in the platform of the Saint Louis convention. I have no doubt he thought we might have peace on the basis of the platform which he helped to make in Chicago in 1864. [Laughter.] But it is not for Mr. Tilden or anybody else to dictate to the people of the United States on what basis or on the platform of what convention they may have peace. They will have peace upon whatever platform they choose to support.

I said in the beginning that this had been alluded to as a war of hate. It is a war of hate on the part of the lawless element connected with the democratic party. I do not say in the South alone, for that lawless element is given to acts of violence, not in the South alone, but even in the North. During the war the draft riots in New York occurred, which were alluded to the other day. The Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] making the best defense that was possible to make for the democracy and for the governor of that State in connection with that affair, endeavored to set forth and make the Senate believe that that riot was instigated by the fact that the law ordering the draft contained a provision by which men paying $300 could be exempted from the effects of the draft, and he used words which were intended to imply that even republicans might have taken part in that riot. I am well satisfied that such was not the case; and for this reason: republicans, no matter how unable to raise $300, no matter how poor, how wretched, even how ignorant, have no political instincts which impel them to murder inoffensive negroes, men, women, and children; and that was the most prominent characteristic of the New York mob. That was the way in which it vented its rage, showing plainly its political character and its political affiliations.

It is no use to talk in this connection about the hatred of the republican party and of republican Senators to the South. I certainly entertain no such hatred. I have friends and kindred there. I hope for the prosperity of the South. I am willing and anxious to do everything I can to bring it about; but I assert without fear of contradiction that there cannot be prosperity North or South when a minority of the people endeavor, through deeds of violence, through intimidation and murder, to bring about a revolution. These things must be brought about by appealing to ideas and the prevalence of opinions. It cannot be done in the way that a certain element in the democratic party of this country is endeavoring to bring it about.

I know that there are many honorable and high-minded gentlemen in the democratic party, men for whom I entertain personally the highest regard, but I think they are a little too sensitive when they resist the effort that is made to make it known to the world who the parties are that are engaged in this violence, this war of hate, this attempt through murder to bring about a political revolution. It is true, these men, being as the Senator from South Carolina says of the first families of that State, may feel somewhat hurt to have it known throughout the world that they have beeen guilty of cowardice and of atrocious acts of which Sitting Bull and the Sioux Indians would be ashamed; but it ill becomes gentlemen who have here endeavored to prevent the country from knowing these facts to stand between the perpetrators of such atrocities and the indignation that public opinion will visit upon such acts.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, we have had a very heated partisan discussion. With a view of furnishing a little time to cool off, which is probably proper, I propose that the Senate shall do an act of justice to a very old man, just pass by unanimous consent his bill and then I am done——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you are done.

Mr. McCREERY. Do you object?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOOTH in the chair.) Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir. Mr. President, I wish to do an act of justice to a great many old men and to the memories of some who have gone to their graves through the action of the political associates of the honorable Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREERY. I deny that, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, the plea of "not guilty" is a proper one, I admit. Everybody puts it in.

Mr. CONKLING. And a majority can decide it. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course a majority can decide it, and the majority will decide it, Mr. President, as they will decide all things in the end; but in order to let them decide it honestly, it is worth while to know a little something of the grounds upon which they proceed.

The Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Delaware, and the Senator from Texas have assailed this side of the Chamber and, through it, the republican party as keeping up a war of hate which these Senators very much deprecate and wish we would not do. They have carefully omitted to state where the hate comes in. It is very easy to say "hate." If you bring a murderer to justice and confront him with a jury of his countrymen he can say to the judge and the jury, "This is a prosecution of hate." If you denounce wickedness and crime, it is very easy for those who would be glad to escape from the responsibility to say, "This is hate: why do you not let us alone to work out our own salvation in our own way?" and then everything would be peaceable; there would be fraternity and concord from Maine to the Rio Grande and from the gates of New York to the Golden Horn. If you would only stop passing constitutional amendments which secure liberty to man; if you would only stop passing constitutional amendments which secure equal rights to citizens; if you would only stop passing constitutional amendments which secure impartial suffrage, supposed to be the corner-stone of well-regulated republics, then there would be peace, because there would be no occasion then for our misguided friends, as I will call them, to resort to the means they do to counteract that species of laws.

Mr. President, what is the use in this intelligent country and in this intelligent Senate of Senators rising here and dodging the question continually about the state of affairs in many of these southern States? They say the rebellion has spewed out wicked men, violators of laws, criminals, persons who owe no allegiance to any of the sentiments which govern well-regulated communities, and therefore there is disorder, violence, bloodshed. Now if you will look at the instances you will find in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases in a thousand that wherever any man in the Southern States has committed a crime against municipal law, has stolen a chicken or robbed a bank merely from his animo furandi, from his personal wickedness, the law goes calmly on; white-liners, ku-kluxers, white-leaguers, republicans, colored men, all go to the court-house, and the simple and solemn ceremonies of justice in a regular and constitutional way lay their hands upon the accused, give him a fair trial, and punish him if he be found guilty. But when you step outside of that and come to the innumerable slaughters that in so many of these States, as Senators themselves say, have disgraced humanity, what do you find then? Prosecutions, indictments, trials, verdicts, judgments, sentences? Not by a long deal. I venture to say on the other hand that there is not one instance in a thousand, reversing my first proposition, where injury has been done to a citizen of the United States, be it small or great, from a political motive—and by that I do not mean merely a party one although it comes to that, from a motive entering into the conduct of that person in respect of what he is to do in participating in the Government—there is not one case in a thousand where the committor of such a crime has been brought to justice at all.

The Senator from Ohio asks, speaking of South Carolina, "Why not; where is the republican governor; and the republican judges, where are they, the republican sheriffs, coroners, and so on; where are the instrumentalities of justice in South Carolina? Why are they not brought to bear?" That is a very pertinent inquiry. The Senator had intelligence enough to answer it but he did not. The answer would not have been convenient at this particular crisis of public affairs. We have seen within our very short memories that when a republican administration, not of the State but of the United States, under the Constitution and the laws, brought the power of the Union to bear upon such criminals as fall within the national laws, all of what are called the respectable orders of society in South Carolina, those who drew their blood from the Pinckneys and the Butlers and the Chestnuts and the McDuffies, and all those men of high estate, were called upon and cheerfully responded to raise a large sum by assessment to interpose all obstacles that ingenuity could to these people being brought to trial at all; and not having in that high-blooded State sufficient legal capacity and strength to carry out this defense, they sent into the North for recruits, and there were rallied to their legal banners the great, justly great, men Reverdy Johnson and Henry Stanbery, and they appeared, paid by the subscriptions of the first families of South Carolina, to defend the persons accused of these crimes. When they went there, I have as good reason to suppose from the public reports they believed, as Senators here appeared to believe, that this was a political and unjust prosecution carried on by the republican party for party ends, and that no such horrible state of atrocity and crime existed as was represented, and that they were really going there to defend patriots who, if they had trodden over the line of strict law, had done it in justifiable self-defense or under great provocation; and yet when those eminent democrats, thus retained and thus paid, appeared and heard the undisputed testimony, they threw up their briefs and retired in sorrow and disgust, and left these descendants of the first families and their associates to take the penalties of the law.

Now in respect of these recent affairs the Senator inquires why does not the State jurisdiction take hold of them. Yes, sir, why does it not? Under the United States jurisdiction there is a section of the law to which he misreferred, but it is still in the law. He referred to it as being in the enforcement acts, but it is not; but there is a law of 1862 which makes a juror liable to challenge in the courts of the United States, and of course not in those of the States, if he had borne arms in rebellion against his country and was unwilling to take an oath that he had been true to the Union he had sworn to support when he first became entitled to vote at all; and on that test the friends and fellows of the Ku-Klux could not conveniently get into a jury to acquit their associates. But when you come to the State laws there is no such exclusion, and under the State laws unless you pack a jury, which republican administrations are not inclined to do, you will get some one in the twelve in most cases who will have shared by sympathy or otherwise in the motives, the fundamental motives, of the parties accused, and you can get no verdicts. You cannot get verdicts in a local trial in the county where occurrences of this kind occur if one-half or one-twelfth even of your jurors are people who sympathize with the objects that their misguided fellow-citizens had in view.

Then there is another thing that has occurred in more than one State, as we have the evidence, I believe; and that is, if a grand jury is impaneled to inquire into such offenses, its members immediately receive letters from the first people of the State giving them notice that if they bring in indictments their heads will fall into the basket and their bodies will rest in unhonored graves if they are buried at all. That is rather disagreeable to the administration of justice, as I look at it, and therefore in a place like this you cannot always get an indictment even from a body of men every one of whom finds that the case is entirely proved, from the mere bodily fear that they themselves will be assassinated if they dare to execute the law.

Mr. President, the administration of justice in every State does not depend alone or chiefly, except in the merest technical sense of form, upon the judge, upon the sheriff, upon the governor, or the Legislature; it depends upon the sentiment of the intelligent body of the community and the land-holders in the county where the offense is to be tried. Every thinking man knows that. Take the prohibitory laws against the sale of liquor in New England, where we fondly imagine—perhaps we are wrong—that the people are as law-abiding as they are anywhere in the world; it is hard even in a question of that kind which does not much enter into politics but produces local feeling, it is very hard indeed in some places to find a jury that will convict for violation of laws of that character if the general sentiment of that particular community is against the law.

So putting it on a broader sphere and on a higher plane of cases, if you find a man indicted for a crime against a fellow-man of violence, not of mere robbery for private gain—I am not speaking of that at all; I am speaking of the class of crimes that have been spoken of in this debate and admitted to exist to a very large extent—when you come to a community where a jury is impaneled, that jury or some portion of it will almost invariably be affected by the prejudice—which is the word used by the honorable Senator from Ohio later on in his remarks—of the controlling classes in that community, and in such communities the controlling classes are necessarily the men who hold the landed estates and have the largest experience and intelligence about public affairs; and when you see such men relying by self-imposed taxation or assessments to defend such criminals, the effective purposes of justice, except under national administration, are almost hopeless. That is the state of it, Mr. President.

But what was this South Carolina affair which the Senator from Ohio has so much deplored, and has regretted, as I suppose the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Delaware have done, as an evidence of the hate of the republican party to the South? I suppose they so regard it, for that is all the reason they have given. They say they wish this period of hate and misconduct on the part of the republican party would only stop, then there would be peace; and the only fact they have given us is this horrible state of things followed by this great regret. What was it, sir? It simply was that a colored company of militia assembled to parade, as I believe is the right of everybody in every State, if the company is lawfully organized; and a couple of young gentlemen, as they were called, some of the first families, wanted to ride through their ranks in a buggy, just as fifteen years ago it would have been perfectly lawful to do. The poor, misguided, uneducated colored militia company supposed that they had some rights as a military company to occupy the street as well, and they did not let them drive through, whereupon the next day——

Mr. PATTERSON. They did drive through. The company opened ranks and let them go through for the sake of peace.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But having been delayed until their cigars went out, or until they got dry again, or whatever it might have been, they then complained of the captain or some officer of this military company before a justice of the peace for some kind of an assault or some nuisance that interrupted the public highway when their lordships wished to drive along; and a warrant was got out for the arrest of this colored captain, or whatever officer he was. The colored people in that region may have had some suspicion from what they had noticed before about arrests of their race that if their captain was arrested on a warrant from this justice, the moment he was taken into custody the next moment he would die. That was the way justice was frequently administered; and they naturally had a little reluctance to seeing their captain disposed of with such summary justice as that, to be shot the moment he laid down his gun and handed him over to the sheriff so that it would be safe to shoot him when he could not shoot back. They were a little reluctant that he should surrender himself on the warrant of the magistrate. What did they do? Did they threaten to kill anybody? No; but they did assemble the company again under arms in the street and near their armory; and in that company this man took shelter. Is there any evidence at all that the sheriff was resisted? No! He did not go into the ranks to try to get the man. Not a bayonet was poised or a musket loaded, so far as we know. Then appeared the other Butler on the scene; and hastening over into the convenient and friendly State of Georgia, which was the nearest at hand, he told some of the young men that there was trouble brewing, for a considerable number of whites also had begun to assemble over in Hamburgh, and that the young men had better go over and see what was going on. That is the mildest way of putting it. So they did go over; and a large organized mob, under the command of somebody, assembled there.

Mr. PATTERSON. Taking a cannon with them, too.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And taking a cannon with them. Then this negro company retreated, without firing a shot, without injuring the property or liberty of any human being, into their armory which for the purposes of that case and at that time was their castle as much as your house or mine is ours; and this mob trained their guns upon them and threatened to destroy the whole lot if they did not surrender. Then there was turbulence, a little violence, and some shooting, I believe. Finally the colored company on a parley engaged to lay down their arms, which they had only raised in self-defense, and surrender them if they could be protected. They did lay down their arms and surrendered—laid down their arms to a body of men who had no more right to demand it than it has that you shall leave that chair at this moment and threaten to shoot you if you do not. And as they emerged one by one from that place of refuge of their own to which they had resorted, they were shot down by this organized body of the white respectable and responsible citizens of the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

Does anybody suppose that that sort of thing would happen in a normal condition of affairs; that it had no other origin or motive or cause than the simple circumstance that these two young white men had attempted to break the ranks of a colorel company and had got up a difficulty? By no means. The point was to convince the colored population of the State of South Carolina that they held their military organization and their arms at the sufferance of the whites, and that at their demand at any time they must lay them down, and that it was very desirable in this particular year that that lesson should be taught and taught effectively in order that reform and good government might come in as my democratic friends say. That was the object of it as of every one of these troubles that have arisen; not one of them has sprung from any of the private crimes or difficulties that sometimes follow a state of war, from thieves, and robbers, and bad men being let loose on society, but merely from the circumstance that it was the fixed determination of the whites that the colored republicans should not be allowed the right even of self-defense, much less the right to vote as white people vote. That was the difficulty.

Why should we not believe that? Is there any one of these States that the Senator from Texas thanks God that the democratic party have got in the control and have sent him to the Senate and so on, where it is different? Is it not the fixed policy of the whites of the State of Texas—and by "the whites" at large I mean the white democratic party—to overthrow everything that reconstruction has accomplished? Did we not in respect of the State of Texas provide by a compact irrevocable that one clause in the constitution of that State as to one of the chief corner-stones of the Republic, free public schools, should never be changed? We certainly did; and yet how long was it after the democratic party got control of that State before they did, in spite of that very constitution itself in every respect, call a convention that it did not authorize and in a way it did not authorize, and changed its constitution in order in substance and effect to abolish that free system of public schools which the Legislature were bound to keep up by taxation?

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state in regard to the constitution of Texas adopted by the democratic party, to which the Senator from Vermont refers, that ample provision is made for schools and a large school fund. In a speech I made on a bill presented by the Senator's colleague I incorporated that much of the constitution as pertains to the subject, as well as the governor's message on the subject, and no distinction is made in regard to the distribution of the school fund among the children between school ages on account of color, race, or previous condition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But will the Senator tell me that this new constitution does not in effect and in substance violate the compact that the State of Texas entered into when it was re-admitted in 1869?

Mr. MAXEY. I think it clearly does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator's judgment of the law and that of my own and that of his own colored constituents differs very essentially. I will ask to have read here a memorial of the colored citizens of the State of Texas that I have no doubt except for color are just as respectable and just as intelligent as any other citizens of the State of Texas, and see what they say upon the subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, your petitioners, would respectfully represent that the present constitution of the State of Texas provides that free schools shall be maintained in this State for at least four months in each year, and that by the terms of the act of Congress permitting Texas to resume the exercise of the rights and privileges of a State in the Union she is forbidden to abrogate that article in her constitution.

And we, your petitioners, would further represent that, notwithstanding the solemn and binding nature of the compact thus entered into between the Government of the United States on the one hand and the State of Texas on the other, the present State government has by nonfeasance practically destroyed our system of free schools.

And your petitioners would further represent that the proposed new constitution now pending for adoption silently ignores the existence of a compact between the General Government and the State of Texas in relation to the subject of education and fails to make provision for an efficient system of free schools.

And your petitioners would further represent that, in addition to other funds, the new constitution proposes to appropriate that portion of the public domain granted to the State of Texas for the purpose of establishing an agricultural college to an institution to be used for the education of white youths exclusively:

Wherefore, to the end that a sacred and beneficent compact made in the interest of civilization and good government may not be wantonly and presumptuously violated, and that we may be protected in our rights as citizens of the United States, we pray your honorable body to take such action in the premises as will cause the State of Texas to keep in good faith her part of the aforesaid compact; and we, your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Done in convention of the colored people of the State of Texas and in the city of Houston this the 14th day of January, A. D. 1876.

Attest:

V. W. CUNY, President
JAMES P. BALL, Secretary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will yield although as the Senator knows I very much dislike interruptions as they interfere with the thread of my remarks; but I think it is fair that the Senator should be heard.

Mr. MAXEY. I will send for the constitution. I made a speech upon a bill presented by the Senator's colleague for the disposition of the public lands for the use and benefit of common schools throughout the country, and in that speech I copied so much of the constitution of the State of Texas as embraces the provisions in regard to the common schools. That I have sent for; I have no other copy about me. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and when I get it I will ask permission to read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I will suggest to my honorable friend that what his colored constituents here complain of is not his speech, but the constitutional revolution, as it was, that has taken place in the State of Texas. The moment the democratic party got possession of the government, in order not to wait for the termination of the republican officials fixed by the constitution, they made a new constitution which should turn them all out at once and changed the constitution that Congress agreed to with these irrevocable conditions about public schools, &c., to something different, that this new ruling power that the Senator thanks God for thought would suit them better.

Mr. MAXEY. It is precisely to show what the democratic constitution says on that subject that I have sent for the record.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I put against the opinion of my friend the opinion of his constituents. I suppose they are both equally entitled to respect. There is some difference evidently between them. And while I am on this subject I should like to ask my friend from Texas what information he has upon this clause of this memorial which I have borrowed out of the files of the Judiciary Committee for a moment in order to illustrate this debate, and which is now under consideration there:

And your petitioners would further represent that, in addition to other funds, the new constitution proposes to appropriate that portion of the public domain granted to the State of Texas for the purpose of establishing an agricultural college to an institution to be used for the education of white youths exclusively.

I pause for a reply.

Mr. MAXEY. I have already stated to the Senator that so soon as I can get the constitution I will read it, and that will speak for itself better than I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator then has at present no information, knowledge, or belief on the subject.

Mr. MAXEY. I have stated to the Senator that I have sent for the RECORD in which all that is copied.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Until the RECORD comes——

Mr. HAMILTON. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me I will state that among the proceedings of the Legislature of Texas, which is now about adjourning, I noticed only a day or two ago a proposition to establish an agricultural college for colored people. The agricultural college now in operation there is exclusively for white people. As I understand from what is going on in the Texas Legislature they propose in order to save matters to establish a college for colored children. It has not been done yet, however. It is under consideration in the Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to my honorable friend from Texas, [Mr. HAMILTON.] I did not suppose that as to any of the southern States almost where the democratic party has got into power anybody would dispute the fact that a steady reaction against the provisions of the constitutions adopted under the reconstruction acts was going on, not only steady but studied and persistent, either according to the forms of their existing constitutions or against them, they do not care which. Now here is another memorial from the State of Texas on the subject of the nature of that convention that undertook in this way to change the irrevocable provisions in the old constitution of 1869 about public schools and many other things, to the better interest of democratic good government—that is the government of the white man for the white man, and of the democrat for the democrat—here is a communication sent to the Judiciary Committee by the Attorney-General of the United States officially covering an official communication transmitted to him from the then governor or ousted governor of the State of Texas—I do not know which he was at the moment—asking the Government of the United States to interfere for the protection of the republican form of government of the State of Texas and to assist the authorities of the State then in office or then lately in office to resist a change in her government which was contrary to the constitution of 1869 and in spite of it and which overthrew the offices and the people who under that constitution had been elected. It is too long although it is very interesting reading to those philosophical students of history to whom my friend from Texas has referred, as showing the state of public sentiment in that State and the great causes that move people to feel bound to overthrow constitutions that a republican government has imposed on people lately in rebellion, the moment the ex-rebels can get into power and in defiance of the act of Congress and of the compact which they accepted by vote, the irrevocable condition which they accepted by vote—the moment they get into power they turn their backs on the constitution and the law as mere figments of the imagination and set up for themselves according to their own notions.

Mr. MAXEY. Now if the Senator will permit I will read what the democratic constitution is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it. I could not get it at the library and I am glad to get it even at second-hand.

Mr. MAXEY. It is as follows:

ARTICLE VII.

EDUCATION—THE PUBLIC FREE SCHOOLS.

SECTION 1. A general diffusion of knowledge being essential to the preservation of the liberties and rights of the people, it shall be the duty of the Legislature of the State to establish and make suitable provision for the support and maintenance of an efficient system of public free schools.

SEC. 2. All funds, lands, and other property heretofore set apart and appropriated for the support of public schools; all the alternate sections of land reserved by the State out of grants heretofore made or that may hereafter be made to railroads, or other corporations, of any nature whatsoever; one-half of the public domain of the State; and all sums of money that may come to the State from the sale of any portion of the same, shall constitute a perpetual public-school fund.

SEC. 3. There shall be set apart annually not more than one-fourth of the general revenue of the State, and a poll-tax of $1 on all male inhabitants in this State between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, for the benefit of the public free schools.

SEC. 4. The lands herein set apart to the public free-school fund shall be sold under such regulations, at such times, and on such terms as may be prescribed by law; and the Legislature shall not have power to grant any relief to the purchasers thereof. The comptroller shall invest the proceeds of such sales, and of those heretofore made, as may be directed by the board of education herein provided for, in the bonds of this State, if the same can be obtained, otherwise in United States bonds; and the United States bonds now belonging to said fund shall likewise be invested in State bonds, if the same can be obtained on terms advantageous to the school fund.

Which are now above par.

SEC. 5. The principal of all bonds and other funds, and the principal arising from the sale of the lands hereinbefore set apart to said school fund, shall be the permanent school fund; and all the interest derivable therefrom and the taxes herein authorized and levied shall be the available school fund, which shall be applied annually to the support of the public free schools. And no law shall ever be enacted appropriating any part of the permanent or available school fund to any other purpose whatever; nor shall the same or any part thereof ever be appropriated to or used for the support of any sectarian school; and the available school fund herein provided shall be distributed to the several counties according to their scholastic population, and applied in manner as may be provided by law.

SEC. 6. All lands heretofore or hereafter granted to the several counties of this State for education, or schools, are of right the property of said counties respectively to which they were granted, and title thereto is vested in said counties, and no adverse possession or limitation shall ever be available against the title of any county. Each county may sell or dispose of its lands in whole or in part in manner to be provided by the commissioners' court of the county. Actual settlers residing on said lands shall be protected in the prior right of purchasing the same to the extent of their settlement, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres, at the price fixed by said court, which price shall not include the value of existing improvements made thereon by such settlers. Said lands and the proceeds thereof, when sold, shall be held by said counties alone as a trust for the benefit of public schools therein; said proceeds to be invested in bonds of the State of Texas, or of the United States, and only the interest thereon to be used and expended annually.

SEC. 7. Separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored children, and impartial provision shall be made for both.

I will state here that the Senator from Mississippi who sits in front of me [Mr. BRUCE] states that they have the same system in Mississippi and that it works well there.

SEC. 8. The governor, comptroller, and secretary of state shall constitute a board of education, who shall distribute said funds to the several counties, and perform such other duties concerning public schools as may be prescribed by law.

That is the constitution; and the fund therein referred to, as shown by the report of the superintendent of public instruction, is:

Permanent school fund	$2,500,000
School lands located, acres	30,000,000
School lands unlocated, acres	31,000,000

All of which is the permanent, perpetual school fund of the State. Upon that, Governor Coke, a democratic governor, says in his last annual message:

With universal suffrage we must have universal intelligence if we would perpetuate free government, and a system of public education will alone accomplish it. The public sentiment of the enlightened and civilized world has crystallized in favor of public education, and the people who fail to recognize the fact and act accordingly will find themselves laggards in the general march of improvement. Every State in the Union is striving to perfect a system of public education, and Texas must not do less.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator finished with the constitution?

Mr. MAXEY. That was the constitution I was reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now will the Senator be good enough to send me that RECORD?

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator that the book I hold in my hand is the official copy from which I cut out the portion which I inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt the accuracy of my friend's quotation; but I did not notice anything about the agricultural college in it. There is a homely adage up North that talk is one thing and cider is another. Now we will look at these two constitutions and see which is the talk and which is the cider. I will not weary the Senate by going through all this mass of change, which if the State had held its plighted faith to the United States it would not have attempted to make at all, but I will take one single item and the only item that was good for anything in the first constitution for the next twenty-five years in that great empire State in order to keep up a system of free public schools, and that was this:

The Legislature shall set apart for the benefit of public schools one-fourth of the annual revenue derivable from general taxation.

There was a positive requirement that an absolute quarter of the general revenue of that State should be appropriated to public schools. Now what does the Senator's democratic constitution say? I beg of him to listen to it.

SEC. 3. There shall be set apart annually not more than one-fourth of the general revenue of the State, and a poll-tax of $1 on all male inhabitants in this State between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, for the benefit of the public free schools.

That the Senator regards as democratic improvement for free and universal education that his good governor says, where talk is so cheap, is one of the things necessary to the prosperity of a republican State, as it is. The constitution that the rebel State of Texas accepted upon its honor and good faith as the price of liberty and justice, and under which the honorable Senator took his seat from that reconstructed State, declares that one-quarter of her general revenues should forever be appropriated to improve the intelligence and diffuse education in that State; and now comes the democratic revolutionary convention and in forms and ways denounced by the very constitution itself proposes that the Legislature shall not appropriate more than a quarter of her revenues for public schools. Do you not see the difference?

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; my friend can wait now until I am through, I think. I have not quite got done with him.

That, Mr. President, is the difference. A republican Congress for liberty and justice and republican prosperity in a State said to that people: "You shall devote a quarter of your public revenues for your great need of rescuing from the ignorance and the vice applying both to black and white among the poor that necessarily results from your old slave laws, to the general and free diffusion of education and intelligence among the children of that State;" and the reconstructed rebel State of Texas said "Yes, we return to fraternity on those terms," but they no sooner return than they turn their backs on their plighted faith and tell their Legislature that they need not appropriate a fourth of the general revenues for the purposes of schools. They say that not more than a quarter shall ever be appropriated, instead of saying as the old constitution did, that every year whenever a poor man, white or black, was taxed on the little property he had, a quarter of that tax should go to the education of his and his neighbor's children; and this reformed, enlightened, progressive empire-republic of Texas comes to us now and says through the mouth of my distinguished friend that this change in her constitution, accomplished by revolution as it was—but that is nothing to this point—is substantially an advance in favor of the free diffusion of intelligence in that State! Why, Mr. President, I am amazed that anybody should undertake to defend a change in a constitution of that character.

What is this permanent school fund, making the best of it, or her governor's report? Two million and a half of dollars or whatever it may be. Suppose it was in good bonds and well invested, what do you get a year from it at 6 per cent.? One hundred and twenty or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars or whatever it may be for a State larger than the whole of New England and the great State of New York to apply to schools, and for all the rest you have got to depend upon asking the good-will of a democratic legislature who, seem to have been so dissatisfied with the constitution that made it a duty that they were ready to violate the constitution itself to get rid of it. If that is democracy, I beg to be excused from subscribing to it.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With great pleasure.

Mr. MAXEY. He has stated but a very small and a very trifling portion of the school fund which is perpetually set apart, two millions and a half of dollars in bonds of the United States. There are 30,000,000 acres of located lands and 31,000,000 acres unappropriated, besides the poll-tax on all persons between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I know. Now let us see. There is land, 30,000,000 acres of unappropriated land.

Mr. MAXEY. Thirty millions located land and 31,000,000 unlocated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Sixty-one millions then of unappropriated lands.

Mr. MAXEY. No, sir. Thirty millions have already been appropriated and belong to the school fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is caviling about a term. I repeat if he will be good enough to believe that I understand myself——

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator that I never cavil about anything. I say 30,000,000 acres of land are already segregated from the public domain and belong to the school fund. It is appropriated land. Thirty-one million acres have not been located.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am quite certain I understand the Senator, and understanding him, I repeat that you have got 61,000,000 acres of unappropriated lands, that is, lands that are not appropriated to the raising of any money or that do not raise any money. I am not upon the question of whether they are segregated or non-segregated, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. MAXEY. They are authorized to be sold and the proceeds put into the fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So they are undoubtedly, and so are all the lands of the State authorized to be sold, and so are all the lands of the United States. As I said before—for I do not speak in ignorance of the constitution of Texas, the Senator will give me leave to say, as I said before he spoke of it at all, this provision for the schools in respect of public lands, for the next twenty years, the next five years, the next three years, the next two years, is absolutely inefficient and almost valueless because the greatest necessity for education is now, and where now the greatest necessity is you have land.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to say a word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON. Referring to the school fund of Texas, I beg to remind my colleague that the constitution of 1869 required all the school lands belonging to the counties to be put under State control. Each organized county of the State had four leagues of land located and patented. Those lands were required by the constitution of 1869 to be turned over to the State to be used for the school fund, because the framers of the constitution had no confidence in the management of that land by the counties. There would be no uniformity; it would be impossible for one hundred and fifty counties, having each a school system of its own, to have any uniformity at all. Now, under the constitution recently adopted in Texas those lands, I understand, are required to be turned back to the counties with authority to sell and dispose of the proceeds in any manner they see proper, and at any time, and without any system at all. Further, the lands set apart for the University of the State are authorized by the constitution to be sold. I undertake to say that the school fund will not have one acre of land in ten years, nor any of the proceeds of those lands. They will be squandered absolutely, and they intend to squander them. That is my conviction. I will state to my colleague that during the rebellion, and at the very beginning of the rebellion, a large portion of the most valuable lands in the State were sold on credit and the payment received in confederate money after the surrender, when it was not worth two cents a bushel.

Mr. MAXEY. In reply to my colleague on that subject I will state——

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a little hard on a poor fellow like me.

Mr. MAXEY. The constitution which the Senator has before him shows that the proceeds of the sales of the county land are to be used for school purposes. It is a trust fund and cannot be used otherwise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, if I can have a little word in this debate, I should like to say one or two things. I was coming to what my friend from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] has now drawn attention to; but I had not quite finished on the other branch of the subject, which I will now finish.

The appropriation of land instead of money by this new constitution for these schools is for the time being an absolute denial of any funds at all to carry on schools; because you cannot sell your lands in a minute, and you cannot get your pay in a minute when you do. We have seen here to-day that even in the rich and prosperous State of Kansas among her best lands and her best settlers it is necessary on the sale even of small quantities to give time, one, two, three, or four years. I repeat what I said before, that the time when Texas needs education most is just now. The only evidence she has given of reconstruction since the democrats have come into power has been the election of my honorable friend, [Mr. MAXEY,] and that I admit to be a good evidence; but every other act that she has done that affects public affairs in the general sense of the subject we are now speaking of has been going backward with steady persistence. I submit to the candor of my honorable friend from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] whose knowledge of the law and whose statesmanship and whose acuteness I admire, that he cannot take the old constitution and the new one and say that the new one is promotive of the objects of education as compared with the old, but the reverse.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that whenever that memorial comes up or a report upon it from the Judiciary Committee comes up, I propose to be prepared to reply to it. In this debate it does not properly come in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose not. Nothing properly comes in except the denunciation of our friends on the other side of what they call republican hate. That is all that seems to be proper in this debate. When we cry out against the invasion of the rights of American citizens; when we the responsible agents of the Constitution undertake to inquire into how the liberties of American citizens are protected, we are only replied to by the words "republican hate" and "bloody shirt;" and when, in answer to Senators on the other side, we go into the nature of their institutions and the tendency of their politics, they say, "O, no, we are not ready now, we will take that up some other time." Well, Mr. President, I propose to take it up now, inasmuch as it is a fit and proper element necessary to the discussion of the general question into which the Senators have gone as to the condition of these States to which we have referred. When the physician is called to a disease, as you all agree that this Hamburgh affair is, which is only one of a hundred, the first thing that the good physician does is to inquire into the habits and the life of the patient, how came he to break out with this violent disorder, what sort of a constitution had he, who were his associates, what was his manner of life, what led to this sudden and violent disease that has appalled all his neighbors and killed so many of his friends and associates. Is that not fair?

I allude to this Texan matter now because the Senator took up the State of Texas in order to show that there prevailed peace, good order, prosperity, equal rights, and public instruction since the democratic party got into power. In answer to that, as well as a fit and proper element in this discussion, I propose to show as the truth really is, and the Senator upon his intellectual knowledge of the English language cannot read these two constitutions and deny it, that this democratic revolutionary constitution goes steadily backward in respect to public instruction; goes backward, I suppose, from a policy and a purpose, and that policy and that purpose is one that has been stated by democrats in public debates in some others of the southern States to be in order to restore the ancient order of things in substance although not in form, and that every triumph that the rebellion expected to achieve, except independence, could still be accomplished in another way, and that in respect of labor and education and all the old relations of an aristocracy to a serfdom, the old baronial system, as Governor Smith, of Georgia, called it, could be restored without getting themselves within the reach of the claws of the American eagle. That is the thing to which I wish to call public attention in order that the intelligent freemen of this country may ask themselves whether they wish to commit the Government of this country to such hands for such purposes.

Now, Mr. President, I come to this public-land business. The old constitution of Texas provided:

> The public lands heretofore given to counties shall be under the control of the Legislature and may be sold under such regulations as the Legislature may prescribe, and in such case the proceeds of the sale shall be added to the school fund.

What does the revolutionary democratic constitution provide? It provides:

> SEC. 6. All lands heretofore or hereafter granted to the several counties of this State for education or schools are of right the property of said counties, respectively, to which they were granted, and title thereto is vested in said counties, and no adverse possession or limitation shall ever be available against the title of any county. Each county may sell or dispose of its lands in whole or in part in manner to be provided by the commissioners' court of the county.

Then it goes on—

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know the Senator will be good enough to excuse me. I am very tired.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator has fallen into a legal error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont declines to yield.

Mr. MAXEY. I only wanted to explain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The new constitution, as the Senator from Texas behind me [Mr. HAMILTON] has stated, takes these lands away from the control of the Legislature where the general intelligence and the general responsibility of the whole State could apply them impartially to all the counties according to the necessities of education among the rich and poor alike. The revolutionary constitution says: "We reverse that and we give to every county, be it a county of all planters who will control everything, all the lands in that county to be disposed of when and in the manner they please." They may keep them one hundred years, and a school-house will never open its doors in that county at all unless the Legislature chooses under this new constitution to appropriate a little money——

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to correct a legal error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont declines to be interrupted and the Chair must protect him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Vermont will give way, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will give way if the Senate wishes to adjourn.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the Senator to withdraw that a moment. We ought to have an executive session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will withdraw my motion for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 5, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MANAGEMENT OF SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a resolution on the subject of the management of soldiers' homes, which was some days ago ordered to be printed and recommitted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to continue their investigations into the management and control of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers during the vacation of Congress, and to ascertain what reforms in the same are necessary, and that said committee be authorized to make such investigations through subcommittees, who may visit said homes; and that such subcommittees be authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all such other acts as may be necessary for a full and complete inquiry into the management and control of said homes, and make due report of the same.

Mr. HALE. I object. I have given notice heretofore that I would object to all propositions for the sitting of committees during the recess.

Mr. TERRY. Then I want it distinctly understood that the objection to this investigation comes from the other side of the House.

Mr. HALE. And I want it just as distinctly understood that it comes from this side of the House and from me; and that I shall continue to object to all propositions to allow committees to sit during the recess.

INVESTIGATION OF ELECTION IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Senate for printing the report of the special committee to investigate the late election in Mississippi be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the following resolution of the Senate was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 4,000 copies of the report of the special committee to investigate the late election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILLS FOR PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MILLIKEN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on War Claims bills of the following titles; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4061) for the relief of Mary E. Purnell; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4062) for the relief of the estate of Mrs. Mary Scott.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, on account of indisposition, having been temporarily detained from the House during the latter part of yesterday's session, I now ask unanimous consent to be permitted to record my vote on the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution on the subject of non-sectarian public schools.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is certainly no objection to the gentleman's voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL. I then record my vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLER. I make the same request, as I was absent from the House on committee-work. I vote in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that all gentlemen who were not present yesterday and desire to vote on this question may be permitted to do so. This is stripped of all political consideration. Of course they are to record their votes to-day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I agree, provided it shall not change the result.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I record my vote on the proposed amendment to the Constitution known as the Blaine amendment. I left the House soon after the close of my remarks yesterday, not supposing at so late an hour this question would come up. If I had been here I should have sought to strike out the last clause, which may possibly be construed as denying the necessary power to enforce the amendment. But hoping it may be so modified in the Senate I vote "ay."

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] was absent yesterday by leave of the House, and if present he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MONROE and Mr. DANFORD also recorded their votes in the affirmative.

DISTRICT INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Michigan, (Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS,) who is absent from the House on account of sickness in his family, had in his hand yesterday a bill which he desired to report back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask by unanimous consent that that bill be now received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 3765) providing for the erection of the industrial school for girls in the District of Columbia, reported back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds by the gentleman from Michigan, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

M. P. JONES.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4063) to re-imburse M. P. Jones for money deposited in the United States depository, Portland, Oregon, for public-land surveys; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN J. ANDERSON.

Mr. STONE. I ask, by unanimous consent, to take up Senate bill (S. No. 628) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White, and put it on its passage; and I ask the indulgence of the House for one moment to give an explanation of it.

Mr. RANDALL. After that I give notice I shall demand the regular order of business.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order of business now.

Mr. RUSK. So do I. I wish to ask for a committee of conference.

COINAGE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty minutes after twelve o'clock. The pending business in the morning hour is the consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, being the bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines, and for other purposes, on which the previous question has been demanded by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.]

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Missouri must see by this time, as this is confined to the morning hour, that it is a very easy thing for its passage to be prevented. I believe it to be a bad bill. Many believe it is a bad bill and will not consent to its passage. Now, what does the gentleman gain by forcing it every morning hour where the gentleman is limited to sixty minutes and evidently cannot make any progress with it? It only takes up the time of the House to the exclusion of other business in the morning hour.

Mr. BLAND. In answer to the gentleman from Maine, I wish to say that when this injustice of demonetizing silver was perpetrated upon the people of this country filibustering was not resorted to. The bill, sir, was not read at that desk. Gentlemen who represent the money-sharks of this country surreptitiously carried the bill through without its reading at the Clerk's desk, and I would be pusillanimous indeed to give up because I am threatened with filibustering performances. Do gentleman suppose the people of this country will submit to such filibustering as this on a bill in their interest, and not in the interest of the money-sharks of this country? Let them filibuster and take the consequence. Let them continue this fraud if they can by filibustering in this House. I for one am willing to go before the country demanding the previous question at every opportunity. I insist on it now.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BLAND. I am threatened with filibustering. I shall demand the previous question from now until the end of Congress.

Mr. PIERCE. The statement made that the bill was surreptitiously carried through Congress is not true. It was nearly three years before Congress and was printed thirteen times.

Mr. BLAND. It was a fraud perpetrated upon the people of this country. It was never read at that desk. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes order will be preserved.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Pending the demand for the previous question, I move the House adjourn, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PIERCE, Mr. FORT, and Mr. BLAND took the floor and made remarks which were inaudible, the Speaker pro tempore beating his gravel all the while.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is strongly impressed with the idea that he can make more noise than either of the gentlemen who occupy the floor out of order. [Laughter and applause.] It is only a waste of breath, as not a word of what they are saying can be heard by the reporters.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Pending the motion to adjourn, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next, and on that motion demand tellers.

Mr. BLAND. I hope gentlemen passing through the tellers will be watched——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is out of order.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BLAND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 20, noes 116; no quorum voting.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, does it require a quorum to decide a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To adjourn over, a quorum is certainly required.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 34, noes 62.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 4, nays 186, not voting 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. O'Brien, Pierce, Washington Townsend, and Young—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Bell, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Davy, Dibrell, Durand, Durham, Eames, Eden, Evans, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Fort, Foster, Franklin, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Goode, Gunter, Hale, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Haymond, Henderson, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Holman, Hooker, Hopkins, House, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurd, Hurlbut, Hyman, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, Lamar, Franklin Landers, Lane, Lapham, Lawrence, Levy, Lewis, Luttrell, Lynch, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, MacDougall, McCrary, McFarland, McMahon, Meade, Metcalfe, Miller, Milliken, Mills, Morgan, Morrison, Mutchler, Nash, Neal, New, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Phelps, Platt, Poppleton, Potter, Powell, Pratt, Purman, Randall, Rea, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Robinson, Miles Ross, Rusk, Sampson, Savage, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Singleton, Sinnickson, Slemons, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Southard, Strait, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Teese, Terry, Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Throckmorton, Tucker, Tufts, Turney, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Waddell, Wait, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Ward, Warren, Erastus Wells, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Benjamin Wilson, James Wilson, Woodburn, and Yeates—186.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, William R. Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Candler, Chapin, Conger, Cox, Crapo, Culberson, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Douglas, Dunnell, Egbert, Ellis, Ely, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goodin, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Hoskins, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Knott, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lord, Magoon, McDill, Money, Monroe, Norton, Oliver, Payne, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Piper, Plaisted, Rainey, Reagan, James B. Reilly, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Seelye, Smalls, Sparks, Spencer, Springer, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Martin I. Townsend, Robert B. Vance, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—95.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SAMPSON said: My colleague from Iowa, Mr. MCDILL, is necessarily absent from the House. I desire also to state that the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, is absent from the House on a conference committee.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. PIERCE. I object.

The names of members voting were read, and the result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MCCRARY. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw his motion to adjourn, and let an effort be made to come to an understanding for reasonable debate and a final vote upon this bill. It appears to me this is no time in the session and this is no question on which we ought to waste the time of the House in filibustering.

Many members called for the regular order.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 31; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered; and Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. BLAND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 148.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 30, noes 88.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 2, nays 186, not voting 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. O'Brien and Washington Townsend—2.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Bell, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Williams, Wilshire, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—97.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I am authorized by the Committee on Banking and Currency, which is authorized to report at any time, to report a bill for the partial repeal of the resumption act.

SURVEYS IN SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITIONS.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me to allow me to ask unanimous consent for the passage of a joint resolution which I introduced a short time ago, being a joint resolution (H. R. No. 145) authorizing the Secretary of State to publish a history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions by the United States during the present century?

The object of the joint resolution is to authorize the Secretary of State to have prepared and laid before Congress a volume not to exceed eight hundred pages octavo giving an account of the several surveys and scientific expeditions that have been ordered by the United States during the present century.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the limitation as to the appropriation?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is limited to $7,500; and I hope the gentleman will allow me to say that in addition to the great interest which such a history of the expeditions authorized by the United States it may enable us to save a good deal of money by preventing the overlapping of surveys of territory which has already been surveyed, and I ask the gentleman to hear the joint resolution read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

That the Secretary of State be authorized and directed to cause to be prepared and published a brief history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions ordered and prosecuted by the United States during the century just closed, including in said history the various foreign and oceanic expeditions, the surveys of the coast and of the lakes, and the several topographical, scientific, and military surveys of the interior; and that the same be reported to Congress as soon as practicable. And to enable the Secretary to carry into effect this resolution, the sum of $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the reference of the joint resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will see that it is too late in the session to refer such a resolution if it is designed to pass it.

Mr. RANDALL. It may be the entering-wedge to a large expenditure of money, and I ask the gentleman to have it referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has already been referred to the gentleman's own committee.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to say to the gentleman that Lewis and Clarke's exploration of the whole Northwest is entirely inaccessible now and no copies can now be obtained for libraries or for any other purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. My experience shows that the dangerous step in reference to these matters is the first step. If the gentleman from Ohio is willing that the joint resolution shall be referred to a committee, I am ready to consent that the committee shall report it back at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was referred to the gentleman's committee, as I have already stated.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to move that the House adjourn?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at this time. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania agree that his committee shall have leave to report it back at any time?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want it referred to my committee. I think the Committee on Public Lands is the proper committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that reference if the gentleman will allow it to be reported back at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that if it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, then, that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, with leave to report it back at any time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COX. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] who desires to make a report in order that he may leave the House.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, submitted a report in writing; which, with the views of the minority, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. COX. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] to submit a report.

Mr. CAULFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted a report in writing from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice; which, with the views of the minority, was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the reports shall be presented at the same time and printed.

Mr. RANDALL. They will of course be printed together, but the majority report is already made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the understanding be that the report is not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. JOYCE submitted the views of the minority.

SURVEYS OF THE POWELL, CLINCH, AND EMERY'S RIVERS.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent that all the reports of the surveys of the Powell, Clinch, and Emery's Rivers, which were submitted by the Secretary of War, and which the House failed to order to be printed, shall now be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And recommitted to any committee?

Mr. TERRY. No, sir; simply printed as a public document.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the reports were ordered to be printed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA PAY OF CONGRESSMEN.

Mr. COX. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] to submit a report from the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, submitted a report, which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

The Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution:—

"Whereas there are no statutes nor uniform precedents fixing the compensation of members of special committees for attending the same sitting outside of the District of Columbia: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to consider and report how or upon what basis said compensation shall be estimated and determined"— would respectfully report that in the opinion of this committee the Speaker should not be required to appoint the special committee mentioned in said resolution, for the reason that no compensation should ever be allowed to any member of Congress above his annual salary, and this committee knows of no instance where extra compensation has been made when members of Congress have served on committees outside of the District of Columbia; their actual and necessary expenses have always been paid, and this committee deem that such should continue to be the rule.

Mr. FORT. I ask the adoption of the report of the committee.

The report of the committee was adopted.

Mr. FORT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL CENTENNIAL REGATTA.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 162) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to detail officers for a grand international centennial regatta on the Schuylkill River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. COX. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred House bill No. 3074, to repeal in part the resumption act of 1875, to report the same back with a substitute, (H. R. No. 4064,) which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to repeal the resumption-day clause in the resumption act of 1875:

Be it enacted, &c., That the resumption-day clause in section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, which clause is in the words following, to wit:

"On and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50"— be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. COX. I would state for the information of the House that the Committee on Banking and Currency, consisting of members from both sides of the House, have come to an accommodation as to this debate, to allow one hour and a half, if the House please, for debate on this substitute, and one hour and a half for debate on another measure which I propose to follow this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is that other measure?

Mr. COX. It is a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint commission to consider the monetary system, which was introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.] If agreeable to both sides of the House, at the end of an hour and a half I propose to call up that concurrent resolution and to have an hour and a half of debate on that also.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the vote is taken on the other?

Mr. COX. To have the vote taken on the first bill at the end of an hour and a half. If the House please, I propose to call the previous question on the first bill at the end of an hour and a half, and to call the previous question on the concurrent resolution at the end of another hour and a half.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What distribution of time does the gentleman from New York propose?

Mr. COX. I propose to divide up the time on both sides of the House, an hour and a half on the first bill and an hour and a half on the concurrent resolution. I do not myself propose to occupy more than five minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and myself will divide up the time equally between his side of the House and this side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Three-fourths of an hour on each side?

Mr. COX. Three-fourths of an hour on each side on each proposition.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to allow two hours' debate on the first bill. I must object to anything less than two hours, and that I think is little enough.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to allowing two hours on the first bill, and an hour on the other.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] may be read.

Mr. PAGE. Before that is read, I would like to ask if the Speaker should not divide the time, not according to the side of the House, but among the friends and the opponents of this bill? There may be some gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who are opposed to this repeal, and I think the time should be equally divided by the Speaker between the friends and the enemies of this measure.

Mr. COX. The arrangement will be satisfactory to gentlemen on that side, for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will have charge of the time.

Mr. FORT. I reserve any point of order or objection to the concurrent resolution until it is read.

Mr. COX. I will send the concurrent resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint commission to consider the monetary system.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts, not exceeding three in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, and to take evidence, and whose duty it shall be to inquire—

First, into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver; the causes thereof; whether permanent or otherwise; the effects thereof upon trade, commerce, finance, and productive interests of the country, and upon the standard of value in this and foreign countries;

Second, into the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country, and, if restored, what the legal relation between the two coins, silver and gold, should be;

Third, into the policy of continuing legal-tender notes concurrently with the metallic standards, and the effects thereof upon the labor, industries, and wealth of the country; and,

Fourth, into the best means of providing for facilitating the resumption of specie payments.

And said commission is authorized to employ a stenographer, and shall report on or before the 15th day of January, 1877, with the evidence taken by them and such recommendations for legislation as they may deem proper.

Mr. FORT. I desire to reserve whatever point of order may lie against that concurrent resolution requiring its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The concurrent resolution is not now before the House for action; it has been read simply for information.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] reporting this bill to allow amendments to be offered to it?

Mr. COX. The committee have instructed me to deny all requests for the offering of amendments in the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And you do not propose to fix any time for resumption?

Mr. COX. The committee propose simply the measure introduced, without amendment. It is for the House to decide, in voting upon the previous question, whether it will allow amendments or not. That is not for the committee or myself to decide.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And it is not proposed to adopt any means looking to resumption?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House in voting upon seconding the demand for the previous question will decide whether it desires to amend the bill or not.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish to offer as an additional section an amendment to this bill, making preparations for resumption of specie payment. I desire to know from the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] whether he will allow such an amendment?

Mr. COX. I am not authorized by the committee to make any such arrangement, and with all respect for my friend from Illinois, I cannot agree to it without the consent of that committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to offer a substitute. I would like to know from my colleague whether he will allow me to offer a substitute?

Mr. COX. I must give my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] the same answer that I have given to the gentleman from Illinois. I have no objection to having the gentleman's amendment read for the information of the House, but I do not propose to yield for any amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the House will understand that, in presenting these two measures, it is not intended that the one should be an amendment or substitute for the other. The bill now pending provides simply for the repeal of the resumption-day clause in the act of January 14, 1875. The other measure is a concurrent resolution. It is not in any sense a substitute for this bill. It has no relation to the substance of the bill. It is no more germane to it than is an inquiry germane to a conclusion. One raises a commission; the other is a consummated measure.

Mr. Speaker, in bringing this measure before the House I am fully aware that it is presented at the end of a long and tedious discussion in the committee reporting it, as well as in the House, press, and country. This discussion has aroused not only partisan feeling during this presidential year, but a great deal of ratiocination and sophistry among fiscal minds. For many months it seemed impossible to solve any of these troublesome problems, at least during this session of Congress.

The concurrent resolution for the appointment of a commission to consider questions connected with the currency is in the line of precedents, in France, in Germany, and in England, as well as in this country, that men who are experts should be associated with legislators in order to give this coin and resumption question a careful, thorough, and exhaustive study before further legislation is demanded.

Upon one thing I think all should agree, that the act fixing January 1, 1879, as the day for specie resumption is hopeless of execution and a standing threat to our prosperity. What possible good to the business interests of the country has it effected? What practical purposes has it subserved in arousing dormant or dead energy? Our best business men have answered and have said to our committee that resumption on that day is a chimera. We had before us many practical men and bankers. I recall one whom we questioned. He was a Mr. Hall, of Boston. He was the head of the bankers' convention of the United States which met a year or more ago at Saratoga. The question was asked him, "Can we resume at the day fixed?" He answered, as almost every intelligent, thoughtful man has answered, "No, sir; there has not been proper preparation therefor, and it is impossible to reach resumption at that time." Go outside of the politicians and ask the question, and you will find the same honest response. Let us deal fairly with our people. The attempt or pretense to do a hopeless thing arouses needless apprehension, helps speculation at the expense of industry, and cannot impress the people with either our sense of wisdom or our regard for their interests.

Mr. Speaker, this financial problem is a hard one to solve. We may have to make sacrifices many and great before we reach the real solution of specie resumption. Although all parties may seem to look toward that grand goal of prosperity when there shall be no irredeemable paper, yet one thing is as sure as anything of record in the American archives, that since the act of January 14, 1875, not one single rescript, order, effort, or paper can be found connected officially with the Government which helps resumption to a real conclusion. All our public conduct negatives the idea that we can reach specie resumption on the 1st of January, 1879. The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have before me, gives no uncertain sound. It is a confession of impotency in that direction. The President of the United States himself—why, did he not himself when he signed this act providing for the resumption of specie resumption look upon the act as a make-shift and an illusion? He said:

I venture upon this unusual method of conveying the notice of approval to the "House in which the measure originated," because of its great importance to the country at large, and in order to suggest further legislation which seems to me essential to make this law effective.

It is a subject of congratulation that a measure has become law whichfixes a date when specie resumption shall commence, and implies an obligation on the part of Congress—if in its power—to give such legislation as may prove necessary to redeem this promise.

Where is the proposed legislation, the "further legislation," to make the law essentially effective? How has Congress redeemed the promise and performed the obligation? Was it "in its power?" If so, why has not the legislation been suggested here or in the Senate by the friends of the Chief Executive? O, but it may be said that the late Secretary of the Treasury has shown us the path to resumption! Has he? If so, it will be found in his last report; and if in that report, it ought to have been supplemented with essential legislation. That report is before me. On its twentieth page the Secretary tells us that he must have the accumulation of a large amount of gold to avert the possibility of failure! Of course such an amount, he tells us, can only be procured with difficulty. This we know, for do we not export it in large quantities as well for our bond interest as otherwise? Does he not remind us that it would embarrass our own trade and commerce and that of other countries? Do we not know what he means? But let me quote with emphatic italics:

The act in question not only makes express provision for resumption at a fixed date, but commits the Government to the use of all such means as may be needful to that end. If experience shall show that the means provided by Congress need to be supplemented by further legislation for the easier and more certain accomplishment of the end, it must be assumed that Congress will not suffer the great purpose to be impeded for want of such additional legislation. The act confers large powers on the Secretary of the Treasury, touching the issue of United States bonds for the purpose of procuring the supply of gold necessary to execute such of its provisions as go into immediate operation, and to provide for the redemption in gold of United States notes outstanding on and after the 1st of January, 1879. In this respect the power conferred on the Secretary is ample; but if, for any cause, it should be found impracticable to accumulate in the Treasury a sufficient amount of gold to carry out the provisions of the act, the Secretary is left without the choice of other means to accomplish the end. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether the process of accumulating a large amount of gold by a given time could go on without meeting opposition from the financial powers of the world. It is safe to say that so large an amount of gold as would be required to carry out the purpose and direction of the act cannot be suddenly acquired. It can be done only by gradual processes, and by taking advantage of favorable conditions of the money market from time to time.

The loss of interest on large sums hoarded in the Treasury for a considerable period in advance of January, 1879, is a consideration not to be disregarded, although it should not be permitted to outweigh the benefits to result from full and complete execution of the act.

But the House is already familiar with these recommendations. We know their inner significance. They show how impossible it is in the nature of the business interests of this western hemisphere and the other to collect the amount of coin sufficient to reach resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879. No provision has been made for it and no provision can be made for it. The act a part of which we would repeal, is an act for resumption with resumption left out. Not one step has been taken to make good the often-repeated promise. The promise has been broken so often that it is a hinderance, not a help; as such it should be repealed. The act a portion of which we now propose to repeal was passed, as we all know, hastily. It was passed, as it was confessed at the time, as a party necessity, under the whip and spur of the previous question. Yet the vote upon it was not altogether a partisan vote. The record I have here before me. It is on page 318 of January 7, 1875. It shows that some of the best business men on the other side of the House, men like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. PIERCE and Mr. HOAR,] and others whom I could name on that side, are among the 106 noes against the 125 ayes. Such sagacious men disfavored this measure at the time. But it was driven through to meet a party emergency; but no such emergency either at Cincinnati or elsewhere has been able to re-enforce it either by the Senate or by the House, and not even by the urgent entreaty of Ex-Secretary Bristow or President Grant.

My friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] proposed at the beginning of this session a joint resolution which is before me. I ask to insert it:

DECEMBER 15, 1875.

Mr. HALE submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Whereas the country is suffering under the evils of an irredeemable currency, which causes uncertainty in business and stimulates speculation, to the prejudice of legitimate business and labor; and whereas both political parties in the United States stand committed against repudiation and in favor of a speedy return to specie payments; and whereas Congress established a like policy in the act of March 16, 1869, which was followed by the act of January 14, 1875, providing for the resumption of specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879: Therefore,

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this House prompt legislative measures should be taken to render said act of January 14, 1875, effective by placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury whatever power may be necessary to that end."

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

I could not report this back because there was a motion to reconsider; and pending that the committee could not consider the resolution. Whether it was intended in earnest or simply for rhetorical purposes, perhaps to enable his distinguished colleague [Mr. Blaine] to make a speech on the specie question in the early part of the session, I do not know. Nevertheless it was referred to our committee, and we waited for the judgment of this House or the gentleman to take "prompt legislative measures to render the act of January 14, 1875, effective by placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury whatever power may be necessary to that end." We waited in vain.

No, sir, nothing has ever been proposed to that end. Nothing acceptable has been brought forward or sent to us by the Senate.

I do not speak out of order when I say that the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has been perhaps one of the best-abused committees of this Congress, have considered every possible condition, every proviso, all sorts of substitutes and amendments, if possible to re-enforce this act which would give us specie ostensibly on the 1st of January, 1879. But all in vain.

At the last meeting of our committee we endeavored in part to solve finally the difficult problem of the session. For months fruitlessly we endeavored to report an affirmative substitute for the repeal of the inconsequential act of January 14, 1875, which only seemingly prepared for resumption. When we failed in that, and when from no party there came any project for the re-enforcement of that act, we had leave to report at any time for the action of this House. I have favored any report which would bring the House to a vote on the repeal. The chairman of this committee is not therefore responsible for any delay or failure. He asks leave to say as much to this House, which has graciously honored the committee by an unusual privilege, giving as his reason for this action that the law proposed to be repealed is a futile menace and a delusive hope, impossible of execution, and no help, but a "hinderance" to specie resumption.

What then remains? To strike out of this bill the day fixed; to strike out of the bill the hopeless menace to our business, so if possible to give an impulse to prosperity. Let us at least, if we can do nothing more, brush away the rubbish, so as to build on sure foundations for a prosperous future in which coin shall play its indispensable and capital part in the exchanges and business of our country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I intended only in opening this debate to take five minutes of the time of the House. I yield now to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] who will follow in favor of the proposition. After that I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who will parcel out the same time to the opponents of the measure.

Mr. GOODE. It will be impossible, Mr. Speaker, in the space allotted to me by my friend from New York to discuss this question. Nor do I deem it necessary to do so. The bill is a very plain and simple one in its provisions. It provides simply for the repeal of that portion of the third section of the so-called resumption law which fixes the 1st day of January, 1879, as the day for the commencement of the resumption of specie payments; that is all. It is conceded now, sir, I believe on nearly all hands that this so-called resumption law cannot be carried into effect at the time indicated.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, informs the House that additional legislation is necessary before it can be carried into operation; and the President, in his last annual message, confesses his inability to suggest what that legislation shall be. Notwithstanding this so-called resumption law originated in a caucus of the republican party and was forced through Congress as a measure under the operation of the previous question——

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORT. As a republican I must here distinctly state that no caucus ever was held on that measure, and that it was not originated in a republican caucus.

Mr. GOODE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have been entirely misinformed I have always understood, and never heard it disputed until now, this measure was agreed upon in a senatorial caucus of the republican party.

Mr. FORT. It may have been in the Senate, but not so far as the House is concerned.

Mr. GOODE. I repeat, it was agreed upon in a senatorial caucus of the republican party. So much for that. But now, Mr. Speaker, I say, notwithstanding it had its origin (I accept the amendment) in a senatorial caucus of the republican party, we find in a recent convention of that party, held in Cincinnati, it has been utterly repudiated. So far from the committee on resolutions indorsing this proposition, we find them making no allusion to it whatever, and content themselves with a few vague, indefinite propositions as to the duty of resumption at the earliest practicable moment. It will be found by reference to the proceedings of that convention that this resolution offered as a substitute for the fourth resolution of the committee was voted down by a large majority:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Congress to provide measures for carrying out the provisions of what is termed the resumption act of Congress, to the end that resumption of specie payments at the time fixed by said act cannot be further delayed.

I say that proposition, sir, offered as a substitute for the fourth resolution of the committee, was voted down by a large majority, and General Hawley, of Connecticut, chairman of the committee, declared in a speech made by him to that convention that he would be unwilling to go before the people in the pending campaign as the advocate of this bill known as the resumption law.

Now I desire to know, if it has been publicly repudiated by the party which brought it into existence, if it has been contemptuously ignored in the house of its friends, if in addition to this it has been denounced by the democratic party in Saint Louis as an obstruction and hinderance to resumption, I want to know why, if there is none so poor to do it reverence, it is there should be any hesitation on the part of this House as to its repeal?

Mr. Speaker, as was said by my colleague on the committee, what is it as long as it remains on the statute-book but a standing menace to all the business interests of the country? Ever since it has been in operation we find the process of contraction has been going on. It was in proof before our committee, the Committee on Banking and Currency, that since this law went into operation more than $50,000,000 had been withdrawn from circulation; that two hundred national banks had gone into liquidation, and that twice two hundred were preparing to follow suit. What has been the result? Why, Mr. Speaker, wherever you look, in whatever direction you turn your eye, you find business is stagnant, industry paralyzed, enterprise inactive, production suspended, and labor unemployed; agriculture is suffering everywhere over this country and languishing for the want of necessary capital; the workshop and the factory are closed, and thousands of mechanics dependent on their daily labor for their daily bread are found begging in the streets, not for bread, but for that work on which their bread depends. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man on this floor or elsewhere in an earnest desire for a resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable moment. I want a sound, honest, stable currency, not dependent on the whims of parties or the caprices of politicians. One of the greatest curses that could possibly be inflicted on any people is an irredeemable paper currency. The national faith and the national honor are pledged, irrevocably pledged, to the redemption in coin of the legal-tender notes of the United States. But, sir, in my humble judgment there can be no return of specie payments until there is a return of prosperity to the country. This consummation so devoutly to be wished must come, if it come at all, as it will come inevitably, from the development of our material resources, from the revival of our industries, from the restoration of hope and of confidence to our people.

Sir, if there is anything to be learned from the lessons of experience and of history, they teach us that the shortest road to resumption lies in the correction of governmental abuses, in the reduction of governmental expenses, in the practice of honesty, simplicity, and economy in public as well as in private life. I desire to quote here the expressive language of Mr. Tilden, which I had the pleasure of reading a little while ago:

There is no royal road for a government more than for an individual or a corporation. What you want to do now is to cut down your expenses and live within your income. I would give all the legerdemain of finance and financiering—I would give the whole of it for the old homely maxim, "Live within your income."

And I say, Mr. Speaker, if we will continue this good work, if we will go forward in the line which has been marked out by this democratic House of Representatives, if we will continue the good work of strict economy and official retrenchment; in a word, sir, if we will practice the old-fashioned virtues of our sires and live within our means, the day of resumption cannot be far hence. Here is the royal road—honesty, simplicity, economy, retrenchment. Here lies the royal road not only to resumption of specie payments, but to the prosperity, the welfare, and the happiness of our people.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that in accordance with the arrangement which has been made the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] now holds the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. COX. I expect to get the floor at the end of the hour to call the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that that was agreed to by the common consent of the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the legislation proposed by the Committee on Banking and Currency is submitted to the House wrong end foremost. The proper action of this House would be, first to appoint the commission which has been provided for in the resolution that comes from the Committee on Banking and Currency to ascertain the financial difficulties under which the country lies, and after that to apply the remedy. But the Committee on Banking and Currency in its wisdom has thonght proper to provide, first, that there shall be a repeal of the resumption law, and that, after that, there shall be a commission to inquire whether or not it ought to be repealed. Thus they have reversed the proper order of things, for it would have been the part of wisdom to have endeavored to ascertain the causes of the financial difficulties and then to have applied the remedy.

But the action of that committee, composed as it is of a majority of the democratic party, shows to the world the utter incapacity of that party to manage the financial affairs of the country or even to suggest the means whereby the difficulties under which we suffer might be alleviated or might be cured. That party has been in power here for eight months past. It has had some twenty or thirty caucuses—I do not know how many—on this financial question. It has had all kinds of propositions offered to it by the democracy, and to-day it stands before the world acknowledging the fact that it is unable to propound a single proposition that will aid toward the resumption of specie payments. That party complains that nothing has been done to carry out the law of 1875. If it has not been done, upon whom does the fault lie? It has to-day its majority here in the House and its majority in the committee. And yet it comes before the world and confesses that it is totally unable to grapple with and manage the financial question. And after all its nominee for President of the United States, in his letter, which is laid upon our desks to-day, acknowledges the wisdom of the suggestions of the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury, who, in the message of the President and in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, propose a measure which, if it could be enacted into a law, would lead surely and in a short period to the resumption of specie payments.

In that message and report it was suggested that the surplus legal-tenders of the United States might readily be funded in United States bonds at a low rate of interest and long date, and that these bonds would absorb all the excess of the legal-tenders that might be floating around and unneeded in the business of the country, and that it would appreciate the legal-tender so far that in a very short time it would be nearly at par and require but a small amount of gold in order to effect a redemption. Mr. Tilden in his letter acknowledged the wisdom of these suggestions, and after uttering some "glittering generalities" he recommended to his party that after they have procured the repeal of the resumption law they should adopt the policy which has been shadowed out by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. And this shows that there is no originality in the democratic party, either in the assembled wisdom of that party here or in their chosen candidate for the Presidency of the United States. They accept republican ideas, and then put them forth as their own.

Now, with regard to the question of resumption of specie payments, we never know where to find the democratic party. At one time it is in favor of resumption and at another time it is opposed to it. In its platform in 1872, at the Baltimore convention, under the leadership of its great standard-bearer who said "the way to resumption is to resume," it declared that it was in favor of an early and speedy return to specie payments. In the democratic platforms of 1874 in the State of Pennsylvania, and I think in some of the Western States, it was also in favor of returning early to specie payments; but in 1875 the democratic politicians in the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and perhaps in Indiana, had changed their minds, had receded from the high position that they had taken, and acknowledged their inability to propose anything that would aid resumption and declared against it; and in the platform which was gotten up by the democratic party at Saint Louis it was inconsistent and antagonistic in its utterances. It was opposed to the changing standard of value such as is found in the legal-tender currency, and yet at the same time it was opposed to the act of Congress of 1875 that proposed to bring about a resumption of specie payments and do away with that changing standard which all the country knows is continually unsettling prices and making it impossible for any individual to tell what he will have to pay or to receive at the termination of his contracts. Under the imperious demands of that irresponsible body demanding the repeal of the resumption clause the democratic party is acting to-day and urging the passage of this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with this uncertain frame of mind of the democratic party, with a hard-money candidate at the head of its ticket and a soft-money candidate at the tail of it, what can we expect of that party if it is allowed to come into power and to endeavor to manage the financial interests of the country? It says to the country that it is unable to solve this great problem and it does not know what can be done, and yet asks the people to intrust it with power to administer the financial affairs of the nation. All the party can do or has done is to stand as an obstruction to the resumption of specie payments. It is an obstruction party. It has had no financial policy here, and admits its incapacity to originate any. The republican party has pointed out the road to the resumption of specie payments in a funding of the surplus greenbacks in an easy and natural way, and if the democratic party thinks that the means we have provided are not sufficient whereby it shall be carried out, it becomes its duty, being here in power, to suggest some means whereby the desideratum can be reached. Hitherto it has failed to make any propositions in that direction. But now the democracy acknowledge their incapacity, they say in their platform which they adopted at Saint Louis, the greenback is a changing standard of values in the hands of the people and the non-payment of which is a disregard of the plighted faith of the nation and that we have failed for eleven years to do anything toward the resumption so devoutly to be wished for; and yet they willfully forget that at the end of the war gold was at 150 and that to-day under republican management it is at 112, and that the republican party has drawn the legal-tenders that much nearer to a redemption in specie.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the resumption act of January, 1875, in your judgment, contain adequate provisions to make good the promise of resumption in 1879?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Yes, it does, if properly carried out; but could be improved by additional legislation, such as I have indicated.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from New York to indicate to whom he next yields the floor?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAYMOND] for ten minutes.

Mr. HAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I cannot in the few minutes allotted to me in this discusion attempt an elaborate argument in favor of the repeal of the resumption law. I gave my views to the House on this question in the early part of the session at considerable length, and I can but reiterate the opinions then expressed, believing they are just as applicable to the question to-day as they were then. I represent a constituency heartily opposed to the policy of the present resumption act, and I would place myself in direct antagonism to their wish if I should not cast my vote for this bill. There seems to be a wide difference of opinion between the people of different sections of the country on this subject; one section believing it is destructive to their interests, while another clings to it as the forlorn hope of resumption and a step in the direction of permanent prosperity. It is a remarkable fact that while these antagonistic views prevail and much undue sensitiveness exists, there is not to be found in either section of the country any well-informed financier who regards the resumption of specie payments possible under the provisions of this act at the time specified. The act is regarded everywhere as mere brutem fulmen; yet the opposition to its repeal is as strong and determined as if the act were practicable of execution and the embodiment of all that was essential to the solution of our financial difficulties.

In the West the act is regarded with serious apprehensions as the cause, or one of the chief causes, of the present financial distress prevailing through the country; and whether this opinion is correct or not, the repeal of the resumption clause will be hailed with joy by millions of people who are now looking to Congress for some measure of relief. Those demanding the repeal of the resumption law are sometimes derisively called inflationists, sometimes repudiators of our national obligations. This is not only unjust, but a base slander. Not one in ten of the industrious, intelligent, and honest men of the West who ask this small favor of Congress is in any sense of the word an inflationist. On the contrary, I believe that a large majority of the people of all the Western States would oppose no obstacle to the resumption of specie payments if assured that it can be brought about by some rational and practicable method that will act equally and justly to all classes and all sections and will not spread ruin and consternation over the vital interests of the country. I believe such legislation would be acceptable to the great mass of the people, would be a Godsend in this hour of confusion and trouble; but if we cannot at this session agree upon any sensible legislation, let us not hesitate to undo what is now an acknowledged impracticability, a failure, and a terror to the public mind. To strike out this resumption-date clause from the act of January 14, 1875, if it will do no other good, will at least secure tranquillity, inspire hope, and give the people courage to bear their burdens patiently through this gloomy period of financial distress.

The present resumption law stands as an impediment to resumption, and the sooner it is removed out of the way the better. It has remained upon the statute-books for a year and a half, and yet not a single step has been taken to execute its provisions or provide for the general resumption of specie payments. Indeed it is not believed by any one that any attempt will be made, even if the act remains unrepealed, to execute its impracticable provisions. If this conceded opinion is correct, why should the law be so tenaciously adhered to or so strenuously defended? I am utterly unable to understand how gentlemen who profess to be in favor of resumption cling to this abortive scheme as if it were the palladium of their hopes, and at the same time declare that it is a sham and a delusion. It is folly to dispute over this plan of resumption that contains no practical provisions for resumption.

The bill before the House repealing the resumption-date clause, though it strikes out but a single sentence, effectually despoils and destroys all dangerous provisions of the resumption act. If this is stricken out there will be but little left in the act of an objectionable nature. The provisions of the first section of the law substituting subsidiary silver coin for the fractional paper currency having been carried into effect, the removal of the resumption-date clause from the third section will leave no powers to be executed in the act except to redeem the legal-tender notes to the amount of 80 per cent. of the national-bank currency that may be hereafter issued. This amount can in no contingency be greater than the outstanding legal-tender notes in excess of $300,000,000, or altogether $69,679,228. The rapidity of this redemption will depend entirely upon the issue of circulating notes to national banks. If the banking capital of the country is rapidly increased, if there is an increased demand for more banking currency, then the legal-tender notes will be reduced and redeemed pari passu, according to the 80-per-cent. clause. If, on the other hand, the demand for more banking currency be small, the redemption of the legal-tender notes will necessarily proceed slowly. The probabilities are strong that it will require several years under this process to redeem the legal-tender notes in excess of $300,000,000. This may be accomplished without the sale of any bonds by using surplus Treasury notes or selling gold to purchase the requisite amount of said legal-tender notes to be redeemed as occasion would require. The Secretary of the Treasury is only authorized to sell or dispose of bonds for the redemption authorized by this act. He cannot sell or dispose of them for any other purpose; and when the resumption clause as contained in the bill before the House is stricken out of the resumption act, there will be no redemption authorized except that specified in the third section, namely, the redemption of the legal-tender notes to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to banking associations. It is plain, then, if there should be no more national-bank notes issued that there would be no further redemption of the legal-tender notes. If this construction of the law is correct, the striking out of the resumption clause will amount practically to the same thing as an unconditional repeal of the entire act, except the provisions relating to banking and free coinage.

The repeal of the resumption act will leave the field clear and open for the devisement of some rational and practicable method for the adjustment of our financial difficulties. It is much easier and better to institute a measure de novo than to attempt to patch up and remodel an abortive and mischievous plan. The importance of an early settlement of the financial question upon some safe and satisfactory basis is now apparent. The present resumption law is the most objectionable as well as the most difficult method of execution that could be possibly devised, and should be abandoned at once as worse than useless.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this late day of the session to attempt to discuss the question of finance to any considerable extent. It has been my duty as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency to give some thought during the course of the session to this difficult and delicate question, and I have formed in my own mind a definite and certain conclusion as to what would be the best policy to be pursued in order to put the Government of the United States in a position to redeem its pledge for the redemption of the legal-tender notes in coin.

We are, sir, in the ninth month of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and during the entire session the Committee on Banking and Currency have had many propositions submitted for their consideration, to all of which the committee gave very careful, calm, and considerate deliberation; but so many different views were entertained on the question that it was impossible, until within the last twenty-four hours, for a majority of the committee to come to a conclusion in relation to it, or make any definite and distinct recommendation to the House.

The bill reported to-day by the chairman of the committee as the result of the deliberation of the Committee on Banking and Currency during the past nine months to my mind is a bill that is ill-advised, unwise, and one which ought not to receive the approval of this House. The policy of the republican party in the past years has been to take steps in the direction of the resumption of specie payments. It was so in the act of 1869 when the pledge was given to redeem in coin the legal-tender notes as soon as it was practicable. The policy was in the same direction under the acts of June 20, 1874, and the act of January 14, 1875, which provided for the retirement of the fractional currency by the issue of subsidiary silver coin, and fixed the 1st of January, 1879, as the day upon which the Government would pay its outstanding legal-tender notes in coin, and the policy of the republican party has since been steadily in the direction of resuming specie payments.

It has been said in this debate that nothing has been done or can be done to carry out the expressed purpose of resumption under the provisions of the act of 1875. I beg leave to differ entirely from any statement of that kind, whether made by a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency or any other member of this House. I believe if the act of January, 1875, remains as it now is, there is more than one mode by means of which every legal-tender note outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1879, may be appreciated to par in coin and made equal to coin in its purchasing power.

One mode has been suggested upon this floor to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] and I think a careful consideration of his proposition will lead any reflecting and intelligent mind to the conclusion to which he has come, that the policy should be as directed in the act of January 14, 1875, to purchase all the outstanding legal-tender notes not needed for the purposes of business or trade. If that course should be taken by the purchase of these notes with bonds running for a long period of years and at a low rate of interest, the result would be that before we reach the time fixed for resumption every outstanding legal-tender note would be appreciated to par in coin.

We know that there is now outstanding about $370,000,000 of legal-tender notes and something like $350,000,000 of national-bank notes; the two together making the currency, which is used as a medium of exchange, something like $700,000,000. Now if whatever of this currency is not needed for the legitimate purposes of trade shall on or before the 1st day of January, 1879, be funded in bonds at a low rate of interest, the outstanding legal notes required for any legitimate purpose of business, as a medium of exchange in connection with the national-bank notes, on the 1st day of January, 1879, would be appreciated to par in coin and would continue equal in purchasing power to coin so long as required for the purposes of trade. I venture to say that $70,000,000 of the outstanding legal-tenders would not be presented to the Treasury of the United States for redemption between this and that time, for every dollar would be kept in circulation if needed for purposes of business and trade.

I will state one other proposition, which has been presented and upon which action has been pressed, one to which I have given my own attention more particularly than to either of the others, and the one which in the present sensitive condition of the finances of the country, it seems to me, without creating any disturbance in our business relations, without contracting or inflating the present volume of the currency, will bring not only the legal-tender notes but at the same time the national-bank notes to par in coin. It is a proposition for and a preliminary step in the direction of resuming specie payments. It does not propose to take any step backward. We all must agree that if we are ever to resume specie payments some time must be fixed for that purpose.

The time has already been named by the act of January 14, 1875. That act was a notice of four years to the trade and commerce of the country of the intention of the Government to resume specie payment. It has been acted upon from that time to this, and every contract that has been made since that time has been made in view of the provisions of that act. If the time named for resumption should now be repealed, its repeal will not only be injurious to our credit at home but would impair our credit abroad, and prevent us from being able hereafter to fund our debt at a low rate of interest.

The proposition which I make in my judgment is feasible, and I do not hesitate to hold myself solely responsible for it, so far as the Committee on Banking and Currency is concerned, for I believe I stand alone in that committee in favor of the proposition. It is that from this time to the 1st day of January, 1879, the Government shall reserve of the gold received from imports 6 per cent. annually of the amount of its outstanding legal-tenders for the purpose of being able to resume specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879. With this reservation of coin I think at that time the Treasury of the United States would be in a condition to redeem every dollar of legal-tender notes that would be presented for payment or redemption. That is a proposition which I think is entirely feasible and one that can be carried out without disturbing the financial relations of the country and without appreciating the value of gold; and it may be done, as I said before, without changing the medium of exchange which now exists and which consists of legal-tender notes and national-bank notes.

Six per cent. upon the outstanding legal-tender notes annually reserved in gold would give each year the amount of $22,200,000; and at the time named, the 1st day of January, 1879, there would be a reserve in coin in the Treasury of the United States of about $55,500,000. That amount, with the surplus which has constantly been held there over and above the gold obligations of the Government, the interest on the public debt and the sinking fund, would swell the entire amount to something like $70,000,000.

Now I venture to say, from the experience of past years in banking in this country and in other countries, if there was $70,000,000 in gold in the Treasury of the United States, with $370,000,000 of legal-tender notes outstanding, $300,000,000 of which, with the national-bank notes, are required for the legitimate purposes of business, that the $70,000,000 in gold would be sufficient to pay every legal-tender note that would be presented for redemption. It is to be remembered, in considering the question of the amount of specie required, that the legal-tenders and national-bank notes are scattered all over the country, that they are a more convenient medium of exchange in the transaction of business than coin, either silver or gold, and as I said before only that which is not required for the purposes of business and trade would be presented for redemption; and I believe if this amount of money were reserved, then at the time now named for resumption every legal-tender would be appreciated in purchasing value to par in coin.

There is another fact which I desire to state in this connection; for it is said very plainly and boldly on this floor that no feasible proposition has been made for carrying resumption into effect at the date fixed; it has been asserted that everybody agrees in the absolute necessity of the repeal now proposed, because it is impossible by any plan that may be suggested to put the Government in such a position as to be able to pay in the money of the Constitution such of its notes as may be presented. Now, sir, when the State banks were in existence, as all of us know who were acquainted with their operations, the amount of their circulation and deposits as compared with the coin in their vaults was very small indeed. We all know another fact, that notwithstanding the small quantity of their coin as compared with the amount of their circulation and deposits, yet during nearly the whole of the period from 1851 to 1863, although they occasionally suspended specie payments, their notes were equal to coin in purchasing value. It appears from the reports that have been made from the Finance Department of this Government that in the year 1863 there were about fourteen hundred or fifteen hundred of these State banks; that their aggregate resources were something like $1,100,000,000 and their liabilities about the same amount; that the circulation and deposits of the State banks in 1863 were about $600,000,000, and the amount of coin in the vaults of all of them at that time about $100,000,000. In other words, their coin was but as one dollar to six, or one dollar to seven, when compared with their circulation, deposits, and all other liabilities except capital stock.

If one dollar in coin to six in State-bank notes is sufficient to keep the circulation of State banks at par in coin it is reasonable to suppose that the same amount of coin in proportion to the outstanding legal-tenders would also keep them at par with coin.

And certainly there can be no difficulty in reserving in coin from the duties on imports the amount required by this proposition, for the amount paid of the public debt during the last fiscal year was nearly $30,000,000.

Another proposition which has been made and urged, and which will accomplish the same end, is the purchase at stated times in limited amounts of such part of the legal-tenders as are not required for the purposes of business.

No, Mr. Speaker, the difficulty in resuming specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, is not because there are no feasible plans for that purpose. The real difficulty is the want of a disposition to take some preparatory step which is required so as to be ready for resumption at the time named in the act of January 14, 1875. If there was a will in this direction it would be easy to find a plan by which to accomplish the purpose.

But if, for political effect in the coming contest for political power, no such plan shall be adopted at this session of Congress, I hope no bill will be approved which repeals the time now named for resumption. I repeat that such a step would be a step in the wrong direction. It would render uncertain all business transactions, and make the time indefinite, when, if ever, the Government would redeem the legal-tenders in lawful money.

Mr. COX. I now yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT, of New York.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am under very great obligations to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, for his courtesy in yielding me this time, because I find myself, as he knows, unable to agree with the report of the committee. I am one of those who believe that the resumption act of January 14, 1875, was one of the weakest, crudest, and most unscientific pieces of legislation intended to effect a financial reform that ever passed this House, and I think I may say that the act has received the condemnation of every political economist in this country and abroad who has undertaken to consider whether it could be carried into practical effect or not. But if there were any doubt upon that subject the confession of the President of the United States and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of this session make the matter entirely plain to us and to the country.

When the act was passed there was in the Treasury a considerable accumulation of gold. There was nearly or quite $70,000,000 available for resumption; and if that act had been intended to be an effective piece of legislation the Administration would never have allowed that stock of coin to melt away so that it would be impossible at any subsequent day to resume without replacing it.

The party represented on the other side of this House have from the very outset—in 1869, in 1874, and in 1875—made pledges and declarations not one of which have they ever attempted to fulfill; and I charge upon them and upon the administration (with the single exception of the late Secretary of the Treasury) that no substantial and honest effort has been made to resume specie payments. But they did one thing: they made the declaration to the world that we would resume specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, and they committed the honor of this country to that declaration. That honor they have had in keeping; and they have not kept it well. It is reserved in my judgment for the democratic party to fulfill that pledge; and they will fulfill it, if time and opportunity be given to them, and if it be possible to comply with this ill-advised declaration which they have made to the world, a declaration which should never have been made until by suitable measures of preparation it was evident the promise could be kept.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am very sorry, for I had not arrived at the point I desired to make.

Mr. COX. I hope there will be no objection to my colleague having five minutes of my time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I really do not want to trespass on the time of my colleague because he has already been very generous in giving to me the time I have occupied.

Mr. COX. I give my colleague five minutes out of my time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will occupy but one moment. I say that the party in power made a pledge, and that pledge we ought to try to redeem. If I am asked whether I think it practicable to redeem it on the 1st of January, 1879, in the present condition of the country, I answer frankly, "no." But I want to deal with this matter with wisdom and statesmanship; and there is but one way to do this. This question should be dealt with as it was treated in England during the long suspension there when they fixed three or four dates successively, trying each time to accomplish the object, and then confessing their inability, putting themselves upon the indulgence of the world for their good motives and their honest intentions. We have no right to repeal the pledge thus given to the world until it becomes apparent by the careful investigation of a competent authority that it is not in our power to fulfill this solemn engagement. And then we should as solemnly renew the promise and make proper preparations for its fulfillment.

I say, then, there is but one way to deal with this question. It is to appoint a commission to take the whole subject into consideration—a commission upon which we can have men embodying the soundest financial wisdom of the country. Let them study this question in the light of the largest experience; let them make a report based upon the fullest consideration of every interest involved in it and the possibilities of the future; and upon such a report this House can take intelligent action.

And it is for that purpose, Mr. Speaker, that I have trespassed upon the indulgence of my colleague, in order that I might offer a substitute for this bill, to which he does not agree, and in order that I might arrive at what I believe to be a substantial and practicable solution of this question. With the indulgence of the House, I ask that my substitute may now be read.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to having it read, nor would I object to the proposition itself, but I am not authorized by the committee to accept it as an amendment. I am not unwilling that it shall be adopted after this bill shall pass, but I think we will get substantially the effect of that measure in the bill that follows.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask my proposition be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for a commission to consider the resumption of specie payments.

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and three experts, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, and to take evidence; whose duty it shall be to consider what measures are necessary and practicable in order to bring about the resumption of specie payments at the earliest possible time consistent with a due regard to the interests of the country, and to report a bill embodying the results of their investigations on or before the 15th day of December, A. D. 1876.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that paper has been read for information.

Mr. COX. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL.]

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps one of the greatest drawbacks to the final settlement of the financial problem that it must of necessity be in some measure a political question, and that being so financial quacks can continually find full scope for their energies, which have their effect on the body of the people who in turn each have a remedy for both real and fancied financial ills.

I am quite certain it is the wish of all classes that the value of our legal-tender, whose issue was made necessary by the great struggle for the preservation of the Union, should never be less than it is today, but, on the contrary, that it should gradually be appreciated to par with coin. But how to do this without unnecessary shock to the business interests of the country has been and is now the great problem. On the one hand it has been thought that the proper way was to fix a day certain when this should take place, while on the other it has been contended that it can only be safely and permanently brought about when the conditions, many of which are unknown quantities, are reached.

For one, sir, I have always contended that it was idle to arbitrarily fix a day in advance when we should commence to resume. And I regard that part of the act of 1875 which fixes the time for resumption as a menace to the business of the country, and as rendering to some extent nugatory the free-banking clauses of that act. And I regard its retention on the statute-book as mere sentiment and of no practical benefit whatever. The fact that the repeal is now brought forward as a party measure after "Samuel has been heard from, and everything forgiven," does not influence my vote. I shall most cheerfully vote for this measure, because I believe it to be a wise one, correcting a grave mistake, and in some measure relieving the labor and industries of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was right glad this morning to hear the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] inform this House that his party had discovered the royal road to prosperity and to resumption. His road is honesty, retrenchment, economy, reform. I say again that I am glad his party have discovered it. I want to tell him and his party that the republican party have been traveling that road for the past sixteen years, traveling slowly, but surely; and the fact that the democratic party has so lately discovered it may account for the zeal which has been manifested in that direction this winter. It is a fact that new converts are always zealous, and zealous people are ever apt to make mistakes; but I congratulate the democracy upon the fact that they have finally discovered the road. This is a sudden conversion, and the danger of backsliding is so great that I advise my democratic friends to gather together each morning and each evening and adopt as their centennial song the penitential hymn of Dr. Watts, of which I give for their benefit the following stanza:

> This is the way I long have sought,
> And mourned because I found it not;
> My grief and burden long has been,
> Because I was not free from sin.

[Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, why repeal the resumption act of January 14, 1875? Can Congress do it? Can this House do it without disgrace? Is it not repudiation, pure and simple, without excuse or palliation? Is it in anywise determined that the resumption of specie payments is not practicable on the 1st day of January, 1879?

I have prepared carefully in answer to these inquiries a few remarks which I hoped to have had an opportunity to deliver here. They will require twelve minutes. I have not occupied one minute upon this floor in six weeks, and I now can get only four or five minutes. I therefore must ask consent to print the remarks I have prepared; and then I ask gentlemen of both parties to read them.

My colleague and friend, [Mr. HEWITT,] who just addressed you, in an open letter published about three weeks ago in New York, gave me a text. He said, Mr. Speaker, the legal-tender was an overdue debt; that it was a disgrace to the people; that, if the law authorizing its funding had not been repealed, it would have been all funded long ago.

The gentleman said, moreover, that a law enacted "to-day"—I use his precise words—a law enacted to-day permitting the funding of that debt in a 4½ per cent. currency bond would result in the total cancellation of it within twelve months. Now I say, sir, that my friend and colleague from New York knows and his candidate for the Presidency knows that a law passed here to-day to fund that debt, which is the demand the world makes upon us, in a 4 per cent. gold bond would result in sending an amount of gold to this country whereby in less than twelve months we should be as near specie payments as France is to-day. And there is not an intelligent man who does not know that France is near enough to specie payments for all practical purposes. I am amazed that my merchant friend should come here and talk politics on this subject, when he knows that there is piled up in London the largest stock of gold that has ever been accumulated there, owned by people that want to invest in the best bonds in the world. The gentleman knows that when Congress has passed a bill to fund the legal-tender debt, the United States 4 per cent. gold bond will be the best bond in the world, the bond that will attract that gold as surely as water descends to the sea. I tell the gentleman from Virginia, I tell the gentleman from Indiana, I tell the gentleman from Michigan, and I put it in the RECORD, that the practical resumption of specie payments prior to 1879 is perfectly feasible, and for the rest I ask gentlemen to read the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] asks unanimous consent to print some additional remarks in this connection in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, the bold and startling proposition to make silver coin legal tender without reserve or limitation has taken the country by surprise and excited much feeling in all financial circles, and it would, in my judgment, be extremely difficult to exaggerate the importance of the proposed legislation. It manifestly involves vast personal and corporate interests and the national honor. It is in a very broad sense a new question. It is well known that the recent rapid depreciation in the value of silver has become a subject of profound study and solicitude at London, Paris, Berlin, and throughout India; and a very late report to the British Parliament on the subject is noteworthy for this, that nobody in Europe has discovered the causes which have produced the unlooked-for depreciation. Men of science and men of affairs are alike agreed that the question is complicated and obscure. Enough is known, however, to show that this is not the time to legislate upon the subject. No man who is wise will venture to say now what the final action of Congress should be. One need but pretend to understand the complex problem to expose his ignorance of it. More than any other question before Congress at this session this imperatively demands time, careful consideration, and thorough examination.

Foreign experts think they know, but are by no means sure of it, that the greatly increased product of silver in our own country has unsettled its commercial value throughout the civilized world. The gentleman from Colorado says the law of 1873 did it. It is quite too soon to say that. Moreover it is an error to denounce that act as a trick. It was before Congress at least two years, and the bill in substance as finally passed was printed for the study and use of both Houses of Congress thirteen times.

Neither the experts commissioned by the British Parliament nor the gentleman from Colorado have solved the problem. We may safely say that if our great bonanzas do not "peter out," but hold out, it is clear that we possess a power in this metal the development and utilization of which may well claim our most faithful attention. For the rest, it is apparent, the moment we think seriously, that the question is vital and far-reaching, one not to be treated hastily or in any way trifled with, without frightful consequences.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, if we would by one act create a financial sensation unmatched in its dire and far-reaching results in the history of the world, we have but to pass the so-called silver bill.

If we would cripple and in the end destroy a majority at least of all the national and savings banks in the country, we have but to pass this bill.

If we would remorselessly inflict upon our suffering people a calamity which no man can measure, and the end and consequences of which no human foresight can predict, let Congress make this bill a law.

If we seek to make the credit of the United States a by-word and reproach wherever our flag floats to the ends of the earth, we have only to pass this bill.

If we would make the Forty-fourth Congress famous in history and send its records down the ages fragrant with the venal odors of our time, by all means pass this bill before adjournment. But be sure, come what may as the result of faithful investigation of the subject, it were a crime against the people we represent to press a measure of such prodigious import through the forms of legislation blindly and ignorantly.

No, Mr. Speaker, we cannot restore prosperity to our country nor make the people content and happy by destroying or aiming a foul blow at the national credit. What will you do, for example, with the owners of more than three hundred millions of deposits in the savings-banks of New York, when you have justified and created a panic among all the holders of Government bonds at home and abroad? Ah! Mr. Speaker, what do we see here? It is a spectacle which might, if anything could, shake our faith in the stability of our institutions. At the very point of time when by honest and intelligent legislation, giving full force to natural laws, our way is clear for thorough reform of the currency; for the restoration of confidence to capital, the re-organization of new and prosperous industries, and the founding of the nation's credit on a much higher plane than it has yet reached, here comes a proposition, nay several of them, which would in a day sink our credit to a level with the Turks', and cover the nation with everlasting disgrace; and yet a majority of this House, which is supposed to represent and should represent the voice of the American people, has been only restrained from enacting such laws from week to week by persistent filibustering on the part of the minority.

And this leads me to inquire, Why repeal the resumption act of January 14, 1875? Can Congress do that; can this House do it without disgrace? Is it not repudiation, pure and simple, without excuse or palliation? A few days ago my friend and colleague, the distinguished chairman of the national democratic committee, in an open letter to the public, bravely and truthfully said—I quote his precise language:

> The legal-tender notes are an overdue debt; it is a disgrace to the people of this country that the payment of this debt should not have been made long since. If the original privilege of funding these notes in 6 per cent. bonds had not been repealed, the debt would have been paid within twelve months after the close of the war.

And again:

> To-day, if they were made fundable in a 4½ per cent. currency bond, they would all be paid and might all be canceled within twelve months.

Here is the truth; truth which touches the honor and well-being of every American citizen; truth at the foundation of all our hopes of returned national prosperity. I ask my friend in the name of reason and common sense why he does not in the interest of a disgraced people bring forward a bill "to-day" in harmony with his conviction to fund the legal-tender debt? Does not my colleague know and cannot any student of finance see that events have ripened with great rapidity since this Congress assembled last December, and that the time has fully come when the privilege to fund in 4 per cent. gold-interest-bearing bonds would stop all further shipments of gold and turn the yellow currents hither for investment in such bonds, making substantial resumption of specie payments sure long before 1879? Does not my merchant friend know that on the very instant the Congress of the United States wipes out the "disgrace" which he concedes, that from that moment our national credit will be foremost of all the nations of the earth, and that idle capital everywhere in Europe will seek our 4 per cent. long bonds as the best security in the world? Does not my friend know from his experience as a master merchant and economist that the funding of the legal-tender debt under existing laws will nowise necessarily or in fact limit the circulation of paper money except as it may and should be limited by the demands of trade, and that such funding of the legal tender is the natural and sure primary step pointing to the conversion of all our 5 and 6 per cent. bonds into 4 per cent. consols at an early day? Does not my friend see just here the promised and traditional reward of honest dealings, inasmuch as the saving upon the outstanding 6 per cent. bonds alone will be far more than sufficient to pay the total interest on all the legal tender?

Why not restore the privilege of funding "to-day?" The gentleman seems willing to censure the party in power for failing to do it. It was never so feasible as now; never. It seems to me a fair inference, from his words which I have quoted, that he is himself in favor of funding. Will he say that he is so in his place in this House? Is funding the true meaning of the Saint Louis platform as he reads it? Does the distinguished chairman of the national democratic committee feel warranted in pledging his party to such legislation? Will he himself frankly and squarely declare his support of such legislation? Why, then, does he justify in his letter to the public the repeal of the resumption act or any part of it?

And now I propose, with all courtesy and yet with all the force of truth, to show the gentleman's inconsistency in striking at that act. He justifies its partial repeal in his letter because it would restore "the legal-tender notes to their rightful position of a debt due upon demand and not on the 1st of January, 1879." He does this without offering any substitute and right in the face of facts showing that it will be easy substantially to resume long before 1879, and still claims that repeal is not repudiation! Let us test that claim. My colleague in his commercial affairs has often received with great satisfaction and renewed confidence from an unfortunate or improvident debtor a new promise to pay an old pastdue debt in full at a fixed date. Did he ever in a single instance receive with patience or without great indignation and reprobation from such a debtor long before such new promise had matured formal notice of its withdrawal? Is not that precisely the shameful position in which he and his party propose to place the Government of the United States in respect to the legal-tender debt, the existence of which he himself characterizes as "a disgrace to the people," by repealing the promise to pay it in 1879? It cannot be denied.

How, then, can we reasonably hope for thorough reform in any department of the public service in the face of such blindness of public judgment and hardness of the public conscience as tolerates such bold propositions of repudiation? As between man and man we know and recognize the absolute need of exact uprightness as the condition of personal honor. As legislators it is proposed that we shall ignore uprightness and dally with it for selfish and partisan ends.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 3168) relating to partition of real estate in the District of Columbia, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The House resumed consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency repealing the resumption-day clause in the resumption act of 1875.

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York asks the question: Why repeal the resumption act? My answer would be that the carrying of that act into effect is absolutely impossible, because while vastly promoting the advantages and interests of the centralized wealth of this country and its vested capital it is oppressing labor and bringing the wolf to the door of every laborer's household in this country; because it has prostrated every productive enterprise, and is a menace against every industry which employs the labor of the people of the United States, it is simply impossible. Resumption of specie payments is impossible unless you can reduce the volume of your paper money to a sum substantially equal to the amount of your coin. That proposition cannot be called in question in the light of the learning which the generations before us have furnished upon this question of finance.

The passage of the act of 1869, which partially demonetized a large portion of the money in which payment of a portion of the public debt might have been made, and the passage of the act of 1873, by still further diminishing the money available for meeting the public debt of the country and the engagements of its people—these acts have enormously enlarged your public debt and have induced the holding of the bonds of this Government by foreign nations, render early resumption absolutely impossible. I am not surprised that a portion of this Union should demand the prompt and inexorable enforcement of this law, no matter what may be the perils to this country. But on the present basis of taxation, Federal and local, it is impossible without the general prostration of the industries of the country that specie payments shall be resumed. With our taxation, Federal and local, reaching seven hundred and thirty millions a year, it is practically impossible to reduce the volume of the currency and to maintain the honor of the nation and the obligations of the State and local governments.

The highway, as has been very justly stated, to specie resumption is to reduce the burdens which rest upon the people of this country; especially the burden of Federal taxation. And this Congress will have done more toward resumption in reducing the burden of taxation to the extent of $30,000,000, if it shall reach no further during the present session of Congress, than all the laws you can enact. Economy in the Government, local as well as Federal, is the first and most important step toward the resumption of specie payments.

But that fatal policy, the holding out of motives by our financial policy for holding our debt abroad, has rendered this resumption impossible. France is no parallel. Her debt is due to her own citizens. The money that passes from her treasury to pay the interest on her bonds is not withdrawn from the country since she paid the enormous fine to the German people. Its payment is no reduction of the agencies by which the industries of the people are promoted The same is true of all other nations. Ours alone is indebted to the great powers of Europe—England, Switzerland, France, Germany. We are the debtor nation, the West is greatly indebted to the East, and this measure of resumption would add not less than $150,000,000, to the indebtedness of the debtor class of this country.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, at the time the act of 1875 became a law I was absent from the House on an investigation, ordered by the House, in Mississippi. Had I been here at the time I would have denounced that law, not only as a party necessity, so advocated by the republican party, but as a sham, a delusion, and a fraud. I can only characterize it as one with all the other contemporary acts of that party which has misruled the nation during the past eight years.

In view of the waste, extravagance, and corruption of the present Administration in all its departments, that act can only be regarded as deceptive of the true interests of the people; in fact, it was really intended to be a political make-shift instead of a statute passed in the true interests of the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, I believe in the propriety of viewing the acts of our political opponents, not as may have been intended by them, but in that light which may be productive of the most advantage. We have a notable example in the action of yesterday. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] lately a member of this House has offered a joint resolution with an object to influence party animosities and introduce agitation on questions pertaining to religion as affected by politics, and the Judiciary Committee adopted his resolve with an amendment and introduced it as a democratic panacea for apprehended evils—they extracted good from evil—no matter what opinion we may have in regard to the policy or principle of that action on the example quoted.

In regard to this resumption law let us do likewise. Let us in the time that will be allowed to the democratic administration that is incoming in March next, as all our acts on this question are predicated on that belief and that desire—let us in the two years that will be given to us between March, 1877, and January, 1879, show to the people of this country that we can renew to them and make good the plighted but broken faith of the republican party. They gave us a sham and a delusion. They gave us a promise without one single act or word of preparation in order to carry out that promise and make it good. They, instead of offering the people of the country what they desired, a well-defined system of finance which would bring about resumption of specie payments, gave them but a miserable promise of renewal at a certain date.

We ought to compel them as far as we can to keep faith with the people. We have inaugurated economy and retrenchment; let us also inaugurate that great principle which is allied to and which is but another name for the leader whom we have placed at the head of our presidential ticket. Let us, in the language of Governor Tilden and in the language of the Saint Louis platform, substitute some well-defined plan for a return to specie payments instead of a barren figment of a date. Sir, my power shall be used as far as it goes in sustaining such a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. But what do they give us now?

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman give us the democratic plan for a return to specie payments?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I will answer the gentleman's question. The platform of the democratic party and the letter of acceptance of the democratic candidate for the Presidency set forth this fact, that there can be no resumption without date or with date unless the democratic administration which is to come into power reverses the action of the past administration, unless it inaugurates reform and retrenchment and economy; unless, instead of corruptly spending the people's money and dissipating the revenues of the Government, you make purity, integrity, and economy the principles of official action. That you have failed to do, and we promise to do it. I adhere to and sustain at the same time the principles of my party. I take from my enemies that which is good. I adhere to the resumption act of 1875, and if I should have a voice in the next Congress, as it is almost now too late to do anything upon this question this session, I would advocate those measures which would bring the country to that condition of prosperity which would enable the Government without injury to the business interests of the country to stand by the law of 1875, and to pay coin for every dollar of legal-tender now in circulation.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. CANNON.)

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish I had an hour, but I thank the gentleman for even a little time. At last this bill is reported. Eight months have elapsed, and the committee in the last days of the session report. I am for the bill, but it does not go far enough.

Mr. Speaker, under the organization of the House and its rules the Committee on Mines and Mining have reported a bill to provide for the coinage of the silver dollar and make it a legal tender for all debts public and private. Now, then, under the rules that committee has an hour each day and no more; just two dilatory motions, one to adjourn and the other to adjourn to a day certain, take the hour, and the bill makes no progress. This has been followed day by day. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] an influential member of this House, chairman of the national democratic central committee, and Tilden's right-bower, leads off in this filibustering, with the help of the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Iowa. Now the present bill under the rules is not in the morning hour and may be considered and amended from day to day by a majority and passed with or without amendment, and no point of order lies against the bill nor is its consideration limited by time; and I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] who has charge of the silver bill, and to the House, that without a change of the rules this is the only parliamentary key by which the silver bill can be passed this session. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] having charge of the bill, refused to receive any amendment and moves the previous question. Now, if the previous question is voted down, the bill is open to amendment, and I will offer what is known as the Kelley silver bill as an additional section to the bill. It is as follows:

There shall be from time to time struck and coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains, as provided for in the act of January 18, 1837, upon which shall be the devices and legends provided by said act; and that the said dollar shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

Now I want you gentlemen on the other side of the House to "fish or cut bait." This is the chance and the only chance you will have under the rules this session by which a bill can be passed by a majority vote, making the silver dollar a legal tender for all debts, public and private. Gentlemen of the other side, do something positive for once during this session. The bill is all right so far as it goes, and I will vote for it as it is, for I am in favor of it, but would prefer to get my amendment in and I want to say that the remonetization of silver is of infinitely more importance, and unless you use the present parliamentary key to put it on as an amendment to this bill I can see no hope of its being passed this session. Some gentleman says the silver bill can pass as a separate proposition. The gentleman knows there is but one way to pass it this session as a separate proposition and that is for the majority of the House to restore the rules preventing filibustering, which you repealed at the first of this session.

Mr. Speaker, if the majority of the House honestly want to pass any bill or measure, it can always find a way to pass it. If the rules prevent, a majority of the House made the rules and a majority can change them. If the committees will not report, a majority of the House elected the Speaker who appoints committees, and the majority can elect another Speaker who will re-organize the committees so they will report. But I do not believe you, the majority of the House, have the honesty of purpose or the courage to do this; and for that reason I want you to allow me to offer the amendment which I have before read. We have had lip-service enough from you; let your action prove that you are for the silver bill by passing it when you have the chance, and allow us to help you.

Mr. COX. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON.]

Mr. MCMAHON. I have had but short notice, Mr. Speaker, that I should have an opportunity to speak upon this question, and if I had had more, modesty would have compelled me to be brief in any argument I might make. I cannot in five minutes do more than give to this House the sentiments of the people whom I represent. My own are well known. And I may say that in speaking for my people I know no well-defined party line which compels me to speak for democrats in preference to republicans. If I understand their sentiments I speak the opinion of numerous republicans as well as democrats when I say that the resumption law, as it stands, is a menace, as it was a fraud in the beginning, and that its repeal is no repudiation, no violation of a pledge, but will be a great relief to the country.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] says this repeal will be repudiation. Repudiation of what? To whom have we promised to pay this money? We hold it in our own pockets. It is not in the pocket of our foreign creditors. It is our debt; it answers our purposes as money; it circulates as money. And are the few, who hold the great bulk of it, to be encouraged in a scheme by which it may be suddenly made equivalent to gold to the great distress of the people? No. There are but few men in this country who will not stand by a democratic Congress which undertakes to relieve the people of some of the embarrassments that surround them; and let us have the courage to give the relief that is demanded.

If we must stand by this fraud, this snare, this delusion, this hinderance to resumption—I do not now remember the other names it has received in this debate by men who support it in order to preserve our good name and prevent ourselves from being called repudiationists—then I must say that our previous character must have been very bad indeed. I for one want no such certificate in regard to our position. This bill does not do all that the western people desire; it does not reach the entire evil. But "half a loaf is better than no bread;" and we must be content with that which we have an opportunity of getting when we cannot do better. I hope to live to see the day, not as my friend from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] probably would say, when the greenbacks will be redeemed and retired—for we will never agree to that in the West—but when the greenback, by economy and judicious legislation, will be made worth its face in gold. But we do not want the greenback currency withdrawn. It is convenient money, and if equalized with gold would be the best circulating medium the country has ever had.

It is time, I think, that the great democratic party, which has always claimed to be the ally and the friend of the people, which has always looked to the interest of the many in preference to that of the few, should now heed the suffering and the distress that is abroad in the country; should look to the destruction of our manufacturing interests and the lack of employment; should look to the reduction in value of our property and the ruin of our business.

Let us show that our hearts beat for the people; that we are in favor of relieving them from their distresses and burdens; and let us not seek hastily to redeem a fraudulent so-called pledge fastened upon the country.

Only desiring to put on record, in the short time allowed me, the feeling of my people upon this matter and earnestly hoping that this bill will pass, I now give way to those who are to follow me.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield to my colleague [Mr. WILSON] for two or three minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, currency has less to do with the depression of some of our industries than overproduction in manufactures and overspeculation in stocks and real estate. The prosperity of the country depends upon the creators of wealth and the surplus we can sell. An examination of our exports will show that we sell the products of the farm and the mine principally, the products we sell abroad of the manufactory being inconsiderable.

We sell between five and six hundred million dollars' worth of exports in a year and buy as much of imports. The merchants who handle these commodities require insurance against the fluctuations of gold that the consumer of foreign commodities must pay. If we had a specie basis this insurance would be saved. The farming interests of the West lose heavily by paying the transportation of their products to the seaboard. This can be overcome in part by building up manufactures in the West; but until we can have a stable currency capitalists hesitate to invest. It is now provided by law that these evils shall cease January 1, 1879. The cost would be the interest on sufficient gold and silver to redeem the Treasury note with and the loss to the creditor and debtor class a change of values to the extent of the difference between paper and specie, and this difference would also be added to the obligation of the debtor.

But the end of uncertainty in values, the inauguration of confidence and prosperity, would amply repay for the loss. To adopt this bill repealing the time fixed is to put the subject in greater uncertainty when it is our duty to take steps to resume. The annual loss of the unemployed labor and capital to the nation will be greater in the next two years than the cost of resumption. What would be thought of a debtor who owed a note payable in two years who, fearing he could not meet his obligation, proposed to strike the date of payment from the note? This is meeting a national debt, a war debt. Our people have never hesitated to meet their obligations when justice to their creditors was concerned; they surely will not hesitate when the result will be for their own benefit. I am confirmed in my suspicions that this bill is for party purposes when I see men who have opposed it heretofore racking their brains for reasons to excuse their votes. We must resume some time, and uncertainty will be fearfully expensive till we do.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. It is a pleasant thing to see this programme carried out. One year ago the New York democracy, the puppet of Governor Tilden, resolved that it would take no step backward upon the question of the resumption of specie payments. Six months after that there were signs of coquetting with the inflation democracy of the West, and the eastern democracy began to talk of never yielding to a repeal of the date of resumption unless something was put in its place that would bring about redemption.

Then the Saint Louis convention met; and although to that convention the New York democracy went up like the tribe of Judah from the plain, it there met the inflation democracy, which had power enough to dictate the platform of the party and to select its candidate for Vice-President. Therefore, when the convention adjourned, the only questions left to be considered in the programme were the letters of acceptance of the candidates for President and Vice-President, and the further question of what this democratic House should do in the last days of this session.

We now have, within the last forty-two hours the letters of acceptance of the democratic candidates for President and Vice-President and the proposed action of this democratic House of Representatives. What is that proposed action? It is the repeal of the date of resumption, pure and simple. There is connected with it no measure to put in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury any power to prepare for resumption.

The flag is lowered. No wonder that during the conferences between Governor Tilden and Governor Hendricks at Saratoga and at other places the Cincinnati Enquirer said:

> Mr. Fendricks was talking to the eastern democrats when at Saratoga. He was endeavoring to catch the eastern coon. He wasn't there to harrow up the feelings of his eastern friends. He is a soothing and complacent man. But just get hold of Governor Hendricks on the plains of the West, and he will satisfy his greenback friends. Mr. Hendricks is a sagacious, wise man. He has learned the methods of Paul.

Truly Governor Hendricks not only tried to get but did get the "eastern coon." We are confronted here with the proposition to lower the flag and repeal the date of resumption. I contrast it, as a part of the programme made public in the last twenty-four hours, with the declaration of Governor Hayes two months before his nomination, when, being asked whether he would under any circumstances favor a repeal of the date fixed for resumption, he declared boldly and explicitly that under no circumstances would he consent to it unless it was accompanied with some measure that should make resumption speedy and effectual. My friends on the other side have had an opportunity to put such a provision in this measure, but have declined to do so. They have lowered the flag and have the power to keep it lowered.

Mr. KASSON. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. RICE.]

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, in this connection I wish to state that on the 24th day of July I had the honor to introduce a resolution, which was adopted by this House, requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to report within one week the exact amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury, with the amount of obligations outstanding payable in gold on that date.

In his reply to that resolution the honorable Secretary took occasion to add to the gold the amount of silver coin and bullion also in the Treasury, and to deduct from the entire sum the amount of gold obligations payable on demand; thereby showing a much larger coin balance in the Treasury than actually existed for the payment of such debts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold that that report is calculated to mislead the public mind in regard to the true condition of the Government; in regard to its ability to meet its rapidly maturing obligations made payable by legislation in gold; and I desire at this time to correct such an error, and submit the following figures for that purpose:

According to said report there was actually in the Treasury in gold on the 24th ultimo	$52,657,546 43
Outstanding obligations payable in gold on demand	43,780,021 30
Leaving a gold balance in the Treasury amounting to	8,877,525 13
From which should be deducted for August interest, now past due	6,460,743 75
Thus making the total amount of gold in the Treasury at this time and available for the resumption of specie payments	2,416,781 38

A sum much less than is frequently shipped out of the port of New York in one week, and less than ¼ of 1 per cent. on the amount of legal-tender notes and national-bank currency which it is proposed to redeem in gold on the 1st day of January, 1879.

I submit these figures and remarks, Mr. Speaker, in order that the country may be informed on the questions referred to in my resolution, and also to let this House and the country know the exact amount of coin on hand with which to resume specie payment and how much preparation had been made in that direction, and what the prospect or the probable ability of the Secretary of the Treasury to comply with the provision of the resumption law of January 14, 1875, which declares for resumption on the 1st of January, 1879.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] states that at the time of the passage of the resumption act the amount of coin available for that purpose was about $70,000,000. Now, by the above showing it will be seen that after liquidating the outstanding obligations payable in gold on demand the Secretary of the Treasury has at this time in the Treasury available for the resumption of specie payment, according to the provisions of that law, but $2,416,781.38. In the face the facts are not these figures appalling? Well may the gentleman say that the legislation which gave this resumption act to the country was immature, vicious, and unwise, and, in the language of the Saint Louis platform, is not the resumptionary clause "a hinderance and an obstruction to the return of specie payments?"

Mr. KASSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House is more than a proposition to repeal the date fixed for resumption. A vote for this measure will be a vote against resumption itself. There never has been a resumption of specie payments after suspension without previously fixing the date, either by agreement among the banks or by law. It was so in England, although the time was postponed. It has been so in the history of our Government. In 1814, when the United States Bank was chartered for the purpose of bringing the country back to resumption and when gold was at 20 per cent. premium, it was made a provision of the charter, that the bank when it commenced business should pay specie for its bills and to its depositors. Within a year the nation returned to specie payments, and gold and paper were of equal value.

So, although in 1837, after the suspension of May 10, gold was at a premium of 10 per cent. within a year, in May, 1838, the banks agreed that they would resume. Gradually the premium declined, and resumption was reached in accordance with that agreement.

Hence I believe it is wise to fix some date for resumption. Prolong the time if necessary, or if, in the language of the Saint Louis platform, the resumption act is a hinderance to resumption, fix an earlier date; but the repeal of the provision fixing a date without naming any time means no time for resumption.

It is said the country is in no condition to take measures for resumption. Is that so? The great country is prosperous. There may be idle men in the cities and clamorous beggars be found in the streets, and the impression may have arisen because of this and that in some towns and villages mills and factories have stopped, and laborers are out of employment, that the country is impoverished and suffering. But the great industries of the country are being carried on as formerly. There were 20,000,000 more acres under the plow and nearly one million more men required to do the work upon farms in 1875 than in 1870. The value of farm products was hundreds of millions of dollars greater. There was more coal mined last year than in any previous year in our history. Statistics which I have just received from the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association show that more rolled iron was produced last year, more steel in every form, and more of every product of iron and steel and other metals, except pig-iron. The great industries of the country are not prostrated. The great mass of the quiet workers of the country are not and have not been idle or these material and incontrovertible evidences of their labor would not exist.

It is true that prices are depressed and that manufacturing and business enterprises consequently do not return the large gains formerly received, but all the wealth of previous years is here; the production is not essentially diminished. Why, then, is it not a good time to make preparation for resumption? Instead of undoing the legislation aiming to secure specie payment and turning back on the road this Congress should supply the defects and omissions of existing law and devise measures that will accomplish the object with greater certainty.

How shall we commence? The matter is discussed in Mr. Tilden's letter; but it seems to me that it is not sufficient to depend upon the Government to accumulate gold. We have the machinery here through which and with which the necessary coin can be gradually, safely, and certainly accumulated. In my judgment, it is not necessary to contract the currency as a preliminary step; it is not necessary to reduce the amount of outstanding circulation in order to secure resumption. Let the volume of currency take care of itself. The maintenance of specie payments only requires that the national banks (which are able, perfectly able, to do it) should lay aside from year to year the coin interest that they receive from the Government and put it into their vaults as part of their reserve, allowing the currency now held there as reserve to be thrown into the channels of circulation. In two years and a half by this means $50,000,000 will thus have been added to the present stock. A late act has already provided for coining $50,000,000 of subsidiary silver. Add these amounts to the $150,000,000 of gold in the country and we have $250,000,000. Let the Treasury lay aside coin as a part of the sinking fund or on some other plan—I do not care what—and by 1879 the Treasury will have strengthened itself with $80,000,000 additional coin, and then there will be $330,000,000 at least of coin in the country, and nearly half as much coin as the paper circulation. That is as great a proportion of coin as we had at any time before the mines of California were opened. It seems to me that this is a necessary step toward resumption, and it is a mockery and pretense to declare in favor of specie payment and then repeal the date fixed for resumption without providing any better substitute or wiser plan for attaining it.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, if there is any one greater cause of discouragement than any other to a gentleman in public life, it is the frequent instances which present themselves of legislative impatience and haste where there is great need of legislative deliberation. No gentleman upon either side of the House, I apprehend, has been here many years without feeling again and again how slight are the rewards offered in our parliamentary system to those gentlemen who desire to devote themselves directly to the solid interests of the people whom they represent. We go on from day to day, from week to week with our legislation without any patient and thorough investigation into the real, substantial interests of the country. But when a so-called political question is presented on this floor parties rally, numbers are aggregated, pressure is brought to bear, debate is cut off, and the party lash applied irrespective of what the great radical interests of the people require.

Sir, the question before the House is one of a class that demands the most serious thought and deliberation and inquiry into the great business interests of the country before we can with any just right say that the repeal of the day of resumption is demanded.

Sir, not one word of proof is presented to you by the Banking and Currency Committee; not one particle of evidence is supplied by the gentlemen who have taken the floor which can be relied upon by a deliberative body, to show that you cannot give this great boon of sound money to the people by the 1st day of January, 1879.

Finding myself met here by political platforms, political candidates, political considerations, I feel how vain it is to address myself with probable good results to that judgment of the representatives of the people which seeks alone the public good.

Gentlemen say no preparation has been made for the resumption of specie payments. Sir, since the financial panic of 1873 enormous preparation has been made. Not by legislative efforts so much as by the voluntary efforts of the people themselves. Economies have come into public, social, and business life throughout the country. Expenses are reduced everywhere. Hundreds of millions of debts have been discharged directly by payments, and other hundreds of millions have been discharged by the processes of the bankrupt courts.

More than that, sir: in the last fiscal year, commencing on the 30th of June, the balance of trade—without estimating the balance of specie shipments—the balance of trade shows $77,000,000 of gold value in favor of the United States. And the good work is going on still, reducing imports of luxuries and increasing exports.

And in presence of the fact that this law of 1875 was passed nearly two years after the disaster came upon the country that brought the hard times, (the failure of the Northern Pacific Railroad,) to this law, passed in 1875, the politicians and the demagogues from one end of the country to the other are attributing the hard times of 1873 as the effect of proposed resumption! The hard times came immediately from extravagant railroad enterprises, and ultimately from the extravagance induced by irredeemable and cheap paper money. Mr. Speaker, the question has been abused by the politicians. It is presented here to-day by the politicians. As one gentleman has said, in the ninth month of the session a political platform brings it here—no, not even a political platform, but a political candidate for the Presidency pronounces in his letter, just published, for its repeal, and the bugle-call of party summons you to follow it and repeal a statute whose whole action has been beneficial to permanent American interests.

It is bringing us to the economies demanded and has brought us largely to them. It has brought national, State, and municipal governments to economical practices. It is bringing the balance of trade largely in our favor, amounting, including the specie shipments, to a balance of $130,000,000 in the last year, as shown by the official letter which I send to the reporters to be published as part of my remarks, verifying what I have said.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
July 8, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I transmit herewith, at your request, a statement showing the imports into and exports from the United States during the eleven months of the fiscal year ended May 31, with an estimate (from some of the ports) for June, and giving the following results:

Imports for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1876, $460,087,277; for the same period in 1875, $533,005,436, showing a falling off of $72,918,159.

Exports of domestic products, (mixed values)	$591, 677, 554
Exports of foreign products	14, 393, 342

For the fiscal year 1875, $559,237,638 domestic and $14,158,611 foreign, showing an increase in the total exports of $32,674,647.

It will be observed that the domestic exports above given are expressed in mixed currency; reduced to gold, the amount is a little over $522,000,000 for domestic products, and the whole exports in gold value is $537,000,000, showing an increase in the total exports, gold value, of about $24,000,000 over those of the previous fiscal year, and about $77,000,000 over the imports of the present year.

The imports of specie in the last fiscal year amounted to $15,530,648 and the exports to $69,139,066, showing an excess of exports of $53,608,418. By adding this amount to the excess of merchandise exported, namely, $77,000,000, the total excess of exports of merchandise and specie over imports during the year is about $130,000,000.

These figures are approximately accurate, and will probably be found to vary not more than $2,000,000 from the correct ones when the accounts for June shall have been received and compiled.

Very respectfully yours,

EDWARD YOUNG,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. J. A. KASSON, M. C.,
Washington.

Thus the work of preparation goes on. One of the bankers before our committee, in answer to the suggestion of my honorable friend from New York, testified that the banks had made already large preparations, particularly his own, and said other banks in New York had done the same. Your bank-vaults are crowded with a surplus of paper money, and you have not allowed this Government to provide for its redemption by funding and cancellation, even on the sole condition that the people themselves wish to surrender and cancel their paper money. You have refused the right to the people, which the original act gave them, of funding the greenbacks, a right which gave them so much value under the funding act. And you still refuse to return that right to them. Not this side of the House, but the other has refused to do that.

Mr. WILLIS rose.

Mr. KASSON. Excuse me now. And we have proposed to reduce the expenses of the public debt further. In the Ways and Means Committee has been pending for months a bill passed by the Senate enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce our rate of interest from 6 to 4½ per cent., and that bill is not reported. Another proposition has been to reduce it to 4 per cent.——

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. KASSON, (continuing.) —by the extension of the time of maturity as an equivalent for the diminution of interest, and that is not reported to the House.

Mr. MORRISON. Does not the gentleman from Iowa know that the Treasury has at its disposal now three hundred millions of 4½ per cent. fifteen-year bonds, and seven hundred millions 4 per cent. thirty-year bonds undisposed of?

Mr. KASSON. Precisely; and the Secretary's letter told the committee they could not be negotiated, as they needed some ten years added to the time when they matured as an equivalent for the reduction of the interest, and no report has been made to the House on the subject. Ah, does it lie in the mouths of the opponents of specie resumption to say the fault rests with the republicans, and we cannot resume in 1879 with the measures they can yet submit for our action prior to that time?

Sir, I care nothing for that identical day. The 2d of January is as good as the 1st to me; and the 25th of December prior to the 1st as good as the 1st of January. There is no cabalistic effect in the 1st day of January. But the significance, the dangerous significance—and no man knows it better than Governor Tilden—of this proposition is that it leaves no port to sail to and no time at which your arrival shall be expected.

Mr. GARFIELD. And no promise.

Mr. KASSON. As that distinguished politician stated in his letter laid upon our desks this morning, "with a good pilot at the helm—S. J. T., to wit—if you start on a voyage for Liverpool you are sure to arrive there." But he is taking Liverpool out of the resumption act, and proposes to make a voyage only "for Cowes and a market." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, his letter and the claims set up by his friends of being honestly devoted to the resumption of specie payments have yet to be canvassed by the people of the United States. The platform is an evasion. A large party in this country demands the entire repeal of the resumption act and want no resumption at all. They are honest. They believe in poor money, and they take the proper steps to arrive at it. But when a gentleman believes in good money, which can be made good in only one way, then he is not justified in striking a blow at one of the most essential features of the resumption act without substituting an equivalent measure.

I have not time of course to cover the whole ground of this debate. The bill which the committee have attacked in part contains several provisions for the resumption of specie payments besides that of which they propose the repeal. And the other words of that act will remain, of course, standing unsupported by this other clause and emasculated of all vigor by this repeal, leaving us all afloat as far as the public confidence in future resumption is concerned. The gentleman from New York, who I think has an honorable purpose in respect to the resumption of specie payments—I refer to Mr. HEWITT—announces the fact that in the passage of that act the honor of the country was committed to its execution, but condemns what he calls the haste with which it was adopted. Is it possible that that gentleman, admitting that the honor of the country has been constitutionally pledged, is himself willing to aid in striking this blow at that honor in the presence of the world? Can any man who believes that the country is bound to exhaust all honorable efforts to arrive at that result, can such a gentleman vote to abolish this clause in the act until all possible measures to give it effect have been tried and found wanting?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg to remind the gentleman that that was the exact statement I made.

Mr. KASSON. Am I to understand that the gentleman is opposed to this repeal?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly. I announced my position to-day, and moved a substitute.

Mr. KASSON. Then I beg to apply my remarks to the other gentlemen who accept his premises but do not honorably accept his conclusions.

We stand, then, in the presence of a desirable object, for which a certain provision has been made by existing laws. And in that condition of things, without avowing their hostility to the object of the law, gentlemen are here proposing to take away that part of the law which is vital to the rest and without which the remainder cannot be executed, and are doing it, to quote the platform on which they stand, because it is a "hinderance to resumption." Now, sir, look for a moment at the political deceit of that proposition. They say that a law which declares that resumption shall take effect by a certain time and does not say that it shall not come prior to that time is a hinderance to the result to be arrived at. Is that consistent with your two arguments that no preparation has been made and that it is not possible to resume by the time named? If there is any significance in terms, this must be a hinderance, because without it you would arrive at resumption quicker. Will you make this argument in Indiana? Will you say that you are going to resume specie payments before the 1st of Janury, 1879? How will you use it on the stump in Indiana and in New York? Will you not, on the contrary, say in the West simply that Tilden is for the repeal of the resumption act and Hendricks is for the repeal of the resumption act? Will you not say in New York and the East that it means to arrive at resumption sooner than 1879? And will not you tell the greenbackers of Indiana that they must come and help elect these candidates in order to defeat the resumption of specie payments? Sir, that clause of the platform struck me with more than opposition; it struck me with a feeling, I hope I may be permitted to say, of disgust. That the law should be said to be positively a hinderance to resumption when they do not suggest anything except its repeal to help resumption, that seems to me a positive and direct evasion of the responsibility under which that party stands to the country. It is a two-faced declaration, worthy of the politician trained in the school of Martin Van Buren.

Mr. Tilden says in his "message," as some gentleman has called it, based as I suppose upon its length, that—

To amass the requisite quantities—

Alluding to an accumulation of coin for the purpose of resumption—

To amass the requisite quantities, by intercepting from the current flowing out of the country, and by acquiring from the stocks which exist abroad, without disturbing the equilibrium of foreign money markets, is a result to be easily worked out by practical knowledge and judgment.

Now, if this is a result to be easily worked out in this way, why have not his friends proposed a better plan than the republican administration has proposed.

Mr. WILLIS. We will when the responsibility devolves upon us.

Mr. KASSON. Why have you not, when the responsibility is upon you in this House of Representatives, proposed a proper measure? Why has not a single measure for that purpose come from a committee of this House while under the control of the democratic party? Why have they not moved an amendment to this act in the Committee on Banking and Currency, providing for the accumulation of the requisite amounts?

Mr. WILLIS. Because there is a better means than that which is provided by the original act.

Mr. KASSON. And why does not the honorable gentleman for whom they propose to vote suggest those easy and practical ways for arriving at that result? Why is it that the man who sees no ob stacle, who wants no obstacle, and whose friends in this House have not the necessary knowledge—why is it that he does not supply the knowledge that will enable them before this session closes to introduce their measure? Certainly this side of the House will vote for it with great promptitude if it tends to the result we so much desire—to relieve the country of its uncertainty.

Mr. Speaker, I think the more you examine the position of this question the more you will see that this is not a measure honestly designed for the benefit of the people, but is merely a party bridge across a political chasm. Let this issue be distinctly and constantly drawn, that the party to whose principles I am permanently attached persists in demanding good constitutional money for the laborers, the farmers, the producers of the United States, for all the people of the country, while the so-called party jumps at every form of poor money; first at paper, because it is poorer than gold; and then at silver, because it is more fluctuating, more depreciated than paper.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Iowa when he charges this side of the House with recklessly jumping toward unconstitutional currency, and when he makes a political rather than a fiscal speech, ought to remember the eleven years of continued imbecility upon the other side. During that period his side of the House had at times two-thirds majority. His party also had the Senate and the President. Yet how signally they have failed to bring back this country to the old constitutional standard of wages and prices. It does not become a gentleman who is in part responsible for that action to taunt this side of the House with remissness. He should read the democratic platform, which truly declares that—

Reform is necessary to establish a sound currency, restore the public credit, and maintain the national honor.

We denounce the failure for all these eleven years of peace to make good the promise of the legal-tender notes which are a changing standard of value in the hands of the people, and the non-payment of which is a disregard of the plighted faith of the nation.

We denounce the improvidence which, in eleven years of peace, has taken from the people in Federal taxes thirteen times the whole amount of the legal-tender notes, and squandered four times their sum in useless expense without accumulating any reserve for their redemption.

We denounce the financial imbecility and immorality of that party which, during eleven years of peace, has made no advance toward resumption, no preparation for resumption, but, instead, has obstructed resumption by wasting our resources and exhausting all our surplus income, and, while annually professing to intend a speedy return to specie payments, has annually enacted fresh hinderances thereto. As such a hinderance we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875, and demand its repeal.

We demand a judicious system of preparation by public economics, by official retrenchments, and by wise finance, which shall enable the nation soon to assure the whole world of its perfect ability and its perfect readiness to meet any of its promises at the call of the creditor entitled to payment.

That platform indicts your party for its improvidence, extravagance, and expenditures by which the resumption of specie payments has been a vain endeavor. It indicts your party for eleven years of financial imbecility and immorality in making no preparation for resumption.

But I do not intend now and here to discuss mere political matters. One startling fact should be heeded by this House before it votes upon this proposition. It is, that if this resumption law is enforced, in two and a half years there will be a coercive resumption of $670,000,000 of circulating paper. That includes bank and legal-tender notes. They are now below par to the amount of 12 per. cent. To this the United States adds, by failing to provide a legislative relief and remedy, $80,000,000 of the purchasing power of that paper. We would cruelly require the debtor to pay his debts in currency at 12 per cent. more than was contracted. More than that; if this resumption day is carried out we increase the burden of the debtor class to an enormous extent. It is thought that we have six thousand millions of indebtedness. This is now generally believed to be the amount existing in this country. If this be correct, sir, it adds $730,000,000 by enforced resumption to the burdens of the debtor class. For this you will be held responsible.

You try to make this a party question. You made a party question of the resumption bill. It was passed as such, except in so far as some honorable gentlemen on the other side to whom I have referred voted against the bill. Senator SHERMAN himself said that the republican party needed "a policy," and therefore they passed the finance bill of January, 1875. You drove that bill through here from party tendencies, motives, and aims. But have you done anything to restore confidence, remove impediments to the revival of business, or facilitate the growth of prosperity? You would resume specie payments, but what worthy of the name have you to resume with? You have had the President and the Senate and the House of Representatives for most of the time and you have done nothing substantial. You have not even followed the recommendation of your own Secretary of the Treasury in the points heretofore referred to. You dare not follow his advice, when he says upon page 19 of his annual report:

The existing provision of law making United States notes legal tender for all debts both public and private, with certain exceptions relating to transactions with Government, is an artificial barrier to the use of gold and silver, tending not only to prevent the flow of gold toward this country, but promoting the shipment abroad of our own production of the precious metals. For this reason Congress should abolish the legal-tender quality of the notes as to all contracts made and liabilities arising after a fixed day. The 1st day of January, 1879, being already fixed by law as the time when the redemption of United States notes then outstanding shall begin, it would be proper and safe to provide that such notes shall not be legal tender for contracts made or liabilities incurred after the 1st day of January, 1877. Such an act would not too suddenly change the value of the notes and would not affect injuriously either debtors or creditors, but would remove a present obstruction to the retention of our gold and silver production, and create a demand for the return of gold now abroad, thus promoting final resumption by preparing the country for it.

In furtherance of the purpose of the act of the last Congress to provide for the resumption of specie payments, the Secretary recommends that authority be given for funding legal-tender notes into bonds bearing a low rate of interest.

Why did you not help him abolish the legal-tender quality of the greenback? Why did you not fix the time for it which he suggests, to wit, January 1, 1878? Why did you not help him in that regard as well as in funding the legal-tenders?

You have voted down many motions and resolutions which have been made here in the last ten years. Some of these I have offered, copying them from the executive messages. Propositions made, both in the Committee on Banking and Currency and in the House to resume, or inquire into the feasibility of resuming specie payments you have killed. The record on that can be produced against you. Hence we say again, eleven years of imbecility and immorality lie against you.

Hence we say that an impossible date fixed for resumption is a hinderance for which you are responsible. We quote from Governor Tilden's message to show that a fixed date is not so important as legislation which allows business interests to succor us from paralysis. Time, economy, and honesty will aid us to resumption. When the time is ripe for it and the business interests of the country will admit of it, Congress can then fix upon the proper time, as did England under like circumstances.

Resumption is the great desideratum; and no one has so happily expressed it as Governor Tilden in the letter of acceptance which I quote from:

The proper time for resumption is the time when wise preparations shall have ripened into a perfect ability to accomplish the object with a certainty and ease that will inspire confidence and encourage the reviving of business. The earliest time in which such a result can be brought about is the best. Even when the preparations shall have been matured, the exact date would have to be chosen with reference to the then existing state of trade and credit operations in our own country, the course of foreign commerce, and the condition of the exchanges with other nations. The specific measures and the actual date are matters of detail, having reference to ever-changing conditions. They belong to the domain of practical administrative statesmanship. The captain of a steamer about starting from New York to Liverpool does not assemble a council over his ocean-chart and fix an angle by which to lash the rudder for the whole voyage. A human intelligence must be at the helm to discern the shifting forces of the waters and the winds. A human hand must be on the helm to feel the elements day by day, and guide to a mastery over them. Such preparations are everything. Without them a legislative command fixing a day, an official promise fixing a day, are shams. They are worse—they are a snare and a delusion to all who trust them. They destroy all confidence among thoughtful men, whose judgment will at last sway public opinion.

In conclusion, then, and in view of the futile efforts made thus far to resume, can any pretend it can be done by the date stated? As well try to reach the moon by sliding up on its beams! It was a law for which no democrat voted. It was a law for the enforcement of which no adequate provision is proposed by the party in power, Executive, Senate, or Congress. It is kept on the statute as a delusion and a snare. No substitute or condition of its repeal is now possible. It stands there a menace to business, an impediment to resumption. It has neither by its own vigor remonetized silver or gold. It is a dead letter. It is an unpleasant body, and should be removed and buried. Passed without debate, forced into a law without amendment, useless for industrial or fiscal relief, baseless for all useful foundations of specie, conceived in party scheming and brought forth in distress and disaster, it should be removed without delay and slaughtered without mercy.

The committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, sir, have treated the House with as much fairness as the House has treated them. We had leave by your courtesy to report upon this subject at any time. We have not abused that privilege. Even if we differed and delayed as to what we should report, we felt bound in honor to allow the majority of the House to pass upon this and similar measures. And now, sir, our report is made and the time has come for your action. I hope a vote will be taken; and if this negative measure be not sufficient for the great end we have in view, let the other bill pass for a commission to inquire and report more positive legislation next session. I call for the previous question upon the substitute for the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask my colleague from New York to permit a vote to be taken on the substitute which I offer? I think that it will permit a settlement of this question and facilitate legislation upon the subject.

Mr. COX. I must respectfully decline. I cannot yield for that purpose without the consent of the committee and my committee is not together, and I cannot consult them; indeed two of them are already absent from the city.

Mr. FORT. I wish the gentleman would allow five minutes further for discussion.

Mr. COX. I have no further time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon seconding the call for the previous question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 101, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, with a view to guiding me in the vote I shall give. If the previous question is voted down, will it then be in order to move as an amendment to this bill the silver bill of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] or any other amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not regard that as a parliamentary inquiry. He will state what he supposes every gentleman in the House very well knows, that if the previous question is not sustained the bill will then be open to proper amendments; that is, amendments that are germane to the bill.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COX, and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 90, noes 21; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no further count is called for the previous question will be regarded as seconded.

Mr. PAGE and Mr. FOSTER called for a further count.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will allow a vote to be taken on the substitute proposed by his colleague, [Mr. HEWITT;] that is all we ask.

Mr. PIERCE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow the substitute of his colleague to be voted on. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Let it be read, and see if gentlemen do not want to vote upon it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let it be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 69, noes 114,

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. PIERCE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that there be a call of the House.

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to upon a division—ayes 113, noes 66.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Ashe, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Candler, Chapin, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Egbert, Ellis, Ely, Fuller, Glover, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Hoskins, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Knott, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Magoon, McDill, Money, Oliver, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Plaisted, Purman, Randall, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Schumaker, Seelye, Sparks, Spencer, Swann, Tarbox, Martin I. Townsend, Robert B. Vance, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Alan Wood, jr., and Fernando Wood—79.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a quorum present and answering to their names, 206 members having answered on the call of the roll.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move that all further proceeding under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will be allowed a vote on the substitute of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will allow that substitute to be voted upon.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to allowing it to be offered, with the understanding that the previous question shall then be ordered and a vote taken in good faith upon the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. All I want is to have my substitute offered and voted upon.

Mr. COX. There is a preference here on this side of the House, and perhaps on the other side, that the proposition of my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] shall be offered as an independent section.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, as a substitute.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to allow the amendment to be read for information.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield now.

Mr. HALE. The proposition is that the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] shall be offered for the substitute reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. Let that be done, and then let the previous question be called and we will all vote on the bill and amendments.

Mr. COX. Let it be proposed as an independent section, and let gentlemen agree to stop all further filibustering.

Mr. HALE. No; let it be offered as a substitute for the substitute reported from the committee.

Mr. COX. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, then, will understand that the demand for the previous question covers the bill reported by the committee and the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section to the bill, and I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to allow it to be read for information.

Mr. COX. I admit the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT,] and call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] will offer his proposition as an amendment in the form of an additional section, and not as a substitute.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir; I desire to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I want to know whether it is not in order for me to ask the gentleman from New York who controls this bill to allow me to offer an amendment, upon which the previous question shall operate, proposing, as an additional section to the bill, the provision known as the Kelley silver bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will answer that question. It is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask whether it is not in order for me to appeal to the gentleman from New York to allow this amendment to be read for information?

Mr. COX. It is not germane at all to this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the gentleman refuses his consent.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether this proposition to substitute a provision for the appointment of a commission requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and three experts, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting and to take evidence; whose duty it shall be to consider what measures are necessary and practicable in order to bring about the resumption of specie payments at the earliest possible time consistent with a due regard to the interests of the country, and to report a bill embodying the results of their investigations on or before the 15th day of December, A. D. 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust this will be offered as an additional section, and not as a substitute.

Many MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I hope it will be voted down.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; there being—ayes 136, noes 18.

Mr. HALE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] for the report of the committee.

Mr. COCHRANE, Mr. NEAL, and others called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCRARY. I wish to put an inquiry to the Chair. Is it in order at this time to have read by the Clerk the third section of the resumption act as it would stand if amended in the manner proposed by this bill? [Cries of "regular order."] I think that is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand how it can be in order, as the matter proposed to be read is not before the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORT. Before the vote is taken, I ask that the substitute be again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order that there may be a perfect understanding of both propositions, I ask that the bill reported by the committee be first read, and then the substitute.

Mr. McCRARY. And also the statute as it will stand if amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. Every man here has read that statute a hundred times.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nothing can be read which is not directly before the House, except by unanimous consent.

The bill as reported by the committee and the substitute offered by Mr. HEWITT, of New York, were again read.

Mr. COCHRANE. I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] a question: If this substitute is voted down will he offer it as an additional section to the bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. FORT. I would like to know if the gentleman from New York offers this as chairman of the national democratic committee?

[Cries of "Regular order."]

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to move to lay the substitute of the gentleman from New York on the table, and would it carry the original bill with it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It certainly would; but it is not in order to make the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. If there be unanimous consent, I would like to read the statute.

The question was taken on the substitute of Mr. HEWITT, of New York; and there were—ayes 92, nays 104; not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Bell, Blair, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Caswell, Chittenden, Conger, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Davy, Durand, Eames, Ely, Freeman, Frye, Glover, Hale, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Henderson, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Hooker Hurd, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, Lamar, Lapham, Lawrence, Levy, Lord, Lynch, MacDougall, McCrary, Meade, Metcalfe, Miller, Monroe, Morrison, Nash, Norton, O'Brien, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Pierce, Piper, Platt, Potter, Powell, Pratt, Rainey, Miles Ross, Rusk, Sampson, Schleicher, Sinnickson, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Stowell, Thompson, Thornburgh, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Wait, Charles C. B. Walker, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, White, Whiting, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, Willis, James Wilson, and Woodburn—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Atkins, Banks, Banning, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Cason, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cox, Dibrell, Douglas, Durham, Eden, Evans, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Fort, Franklin, Gause, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Harrison, Hartzell, Haymond, Henkle, Hereford, Holman, Hopkins, House, Hubbell, Hunton, Thomas L. Jones, Franklin Landers, Lane, Lewis, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, McFarland, McMahon, Milliken, Mills, Morgan, Mutchler, Neal, New, Payne, Phelps, Poppleton, Randall, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, Robinson, Savage, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, William E. Walker, Walsh, Erastus Wells, Whitthorne, Wigginton, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Yeates, and Young—104.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, John H. Baker, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Candler, Chapin, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, Darrall, Davis, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Egbert, Ellis, Foster, Fuller, Garfield, Gibson, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hartridge, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Hoskins, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Knott, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Luttrell, Magoon, McDill, Money, Oliver, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Plaisted, Purman, James B Reilly, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Scales, Schumaker, Seelye, Sparks, Spencer, Swann, Tarbox, Terry, Martin I. Townsend, Robert B. Vance, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—89.

So the substitute was rejected.

During the vote the following announcements were made:

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TARBOX. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. STENGER. My colleague, Mr. JENKS, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. SCALES. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. SEELYE. If he were here I take it he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. COCHRANE. My colleague, Mr. ROSS, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. RICE. My colleague, Dr. COWAN, of Ohio, is detained at home on account of injuries received by a fall.

Mr. DARRALL. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ELLIS. He would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BURLEIGH. He would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. GLOVER, is paired with Mr. DUNNELL, of Minnesota. Mr. GLOVER would vote "no," and I do not know how the gentleman from Minnesota would vote.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. My colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, is absent on account of sickness. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. TERRY. I am paired with Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I am paired with Mr. HOSKINS, of New York. If he were here I would vote "no," and I presume he would vote "ay."

Mr. JOHN REILLY. My colleague, Mr. JOHN B. REILLY is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HARTZELL. My colleague, Mr. SPARKS, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. TEESE. My colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. FULLER, of Indiana. He would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. CRAPO is paired with Mr. COWAN. Mr. CRAPO would vote "ay."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. GARFIELD. I am paired with Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky. If present he would vote "no," and I would most certainly vote "ay."

Mr. HALE. My colleague, Mr. PLAISTED, is confined to his house by indisposition.

Mr. CASWELL. My colleagues, Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. MAGOON, are absent by leave of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALLING, who is absent. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. PRATT. My colleague, Mr. DUNNELL, is paired on this question with Mr. GLOVER. Mr. DUNNELL would vote "ay," and Mr. GLOVER would vote "no."

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am paired with Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. MCDILL, who is necessarily absent, if present would vote "ay."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I now ask we have a vote on the original proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the substitute reported by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I wish to say to the House that I do not desire to take two votes on this proposition. It is a substitute for the bill of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.] Let the substitute be divided, and then the question will come up on agreeing to the original propositio n.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now ask my colleague [Mr. COX] to allow me to fulfill the pledge which I gave on the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that in the event of the substitute being voted down I would offer it as an amendment to the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot do that.

Mr. COX. The previous question is now prevailing.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not in the power of the gentleman to do it because of the operation of the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the vote may be taken over again as to ordering the yeas and nays. It seems to me there was a misapprehension as to what the yeas and nays were being called on. I ask a reconsideration of the vote ordering the yeas and nays, because there is no substantial difference between the two propositions, the bill of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] and the substitute reported by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that the call for the yeas and nays on the bill reported by the gentleman from New York as a substitute for the original bill be withdrawn?

Mr. COX. My report is a report from the committee in the nature of a substitute. All I want is a vote on my substitute, not on anybody else's.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a report from a committee which had leave to report at any time; and it comes before the House as a report of a committee; it does not come as a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must be permitted to state that there can be no doubt about this question as regards the form in which the report came to the Chair. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency reported a substitute for the original bill, and to that substitute the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] offered another substitute. That substitute has been disagreed to. The question now comes before the House, Will the House agree to the substitute reported by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency for the original bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. As the yeas and nays have been ordered on that, I move to reconsider the vote ordering them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the original bill be read that we may know what it is.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair hear me a moment on the question of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman when order is restored. There is too much confusion in the Hall.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the report which I made as chairman of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. I ask the Chair, have we anything to do in this House with the original "Goode" bill? The chairman of the committee has reported from that committee originally the bill which is now before the House, and on which we are to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to correct the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] The position of this question can be readily stated. The chairman of the committee did not so report. He reported the original bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] and a substitute for that bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Now we want to see what the original bill is for which the report of the committee is a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will order the original bill to be read and also the substitute.

Mr. HALE. Did the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] report them both?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He did.

The Clerk read the original bill introduced by Mr. GOODE and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3074) to repeal in part the resumption act of 1875.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, as provides that "on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption," and so much of said section 3 of said act as authorizes the use of any surplus revenue, or the issue, sale, or disposal of any bonds to provide for such redemption, are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the substitute reported by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to repeal the resumption-day clause in the resumption act of 1875.

Be it enacted, &c., That the resumption-day clause in section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, which clause is in the words following, to wit, "and on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York in sums of not less than $50 dollars," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill reported by this committee was reported as a bill independent of itself and as a substitute for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.] This bill being a complete bill, with a title different from that of the other, the record ought to show, if it does not, that it was read a first and second time; because it never could have been subject to amendment till it had been. An amendment was offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and voted on. Therefore the question is, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? That is the question before this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the substitute, so that the yeas and nays may be taken on the final passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The main question was ordered on the bill and pending amendments, and when the previous question has been only partially executed the motion to reconsider cannot be made.

Mr. KASSON. If the House gives unanimous consent to treat this bill reported by the committee as the original bill, then would not one vote end it? Cannot the House give that unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that the committee could not report a substitute for a bill not before the House.

Mr. KASSON. If the House by unanimous consent consents to treat this as an original bill, that ends the trouble.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent that may be done, but in no other way. Is there objection to regarding the bill reported as a substitute as the original bill and taken up and put upon its final passage now? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. To make it correspond with the record it should be stated that it is a substitute for the original bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly as a substitute; and the question is now upon the final passage of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that all questions are waived upon this bill except as to its passage. Is that the understanding of the House? [Cries of "Yes, yes."] Then the only question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SPRINGER. As I desire to take the next train to leave the city, I ask unanimous consent to record my vote now and before my name is reached upon the regular call of the roll.

There was no objection.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 86, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Atkins, Banning, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Townsend, Robert B. Vance, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, Willard, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—93.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SCALES. I desire to state that upon this question I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. SEELYE; if he were present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I desire to state that upon this question I am paired with Mr. TARBOX; if he were present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. COCHRANE. My colleague, Mr. JENKS, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote in the affirmative. I also desire to state that my colleague, Mr. ROSS, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HUNTON. I am requested to announce that Mr. KNOTT and Mr. GARFIELD are paired upon this question; if they were present Mr. KNOTT would vote "ay" and Mr. GARFIELD would vote "no."

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to state that I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BURLEIGH; if he were present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. TERRY. I desire to say that I am paired with Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire; if he were present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. LUTTRELL. Upon this question I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN; if he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from New York, Mr. HOSKINS; if he were present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. HARTZELL. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. SPARKS, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. THROCKMORTON. My colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, is absent on account of sickness; if he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. JAMES B. REILLY, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. TEESE. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. FULLER; if present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. KEHR. I am requested to announce that Mr. CRAPO is absent by leave of the House, and is paired upon this question with Mr. COWAN; if they were present, Mr. CRAPO would vote "no," and Mr. COWAN would vote "ay."

Mr. FOSTER. Upon this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALLING; if he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. LORD. I am paired upon this question with Mr. HUNTER; if he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague, Mr. BLISS, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "no."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. On this question I am paired with Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS, of Michigan; if present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. WILLARD. On this question I am paired with Mr. HILL, of Georgia; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. DARRALL. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ELLIS; if here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. LYNDE. My colleague from Wisconsin, Mr. BURCHARD, is absent on leave on account of sickness in his family. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. WHITE. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] made his speech on this subject he said that every democrat on this floor held his seat under that clause of the democratic platform which declared for steady steps toward specie payments [cries of "Order!" "Order!"] and no steps backward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is clearly out of order.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. COX] is an exception to that rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entirely out of order.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is very improper for the gentleman to take advantage of his announcement of his vote to make any remarks upon this subject.

Mr. WIGGINTON. On this question I am paired with Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina. If here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. SAMPSON. My colleague, Mr. MCDILL, is necessarily absent from the House. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. PRATT. On this question Mr. DUNNELL, of Minnesota, is paired with Mr. GLOVER, of Missouri. If present Mr. DUNNELL would vote "no," and Mr. GLOVER "ay."

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. WALDRON, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "no." And I desire to make the same announcement in regard to my colleague, Mr. BRADLEY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Leave to print in the RECORD remarks upon the bills just passed was granted by unanimous consent to Mr. FORT and Mr. CATE.

JOINT COMMISSION ON THE MONETARY SYSTEM.

Mr. COX. By instruction of the Committee on Banking and Currency I now report the concurrent resolution of which I gave notice this morning. I wish both of these meaures to go to the country together. I call the previous question on the passage of this concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and experts, not exceeding three in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, and to take evidence; and whose duty it shall be to inquire—

First, into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver; the causes thereof; whether permanent or otherwise; the effects thereof upon trade, commerce, and the productive interests of the country, finance, and upon the standard of value in this and foreign countries;

Second, into the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country, and, if restored, what the legal relation between the two coins, silver and gold, should be;

Third, into the policy of continuing legal-tender notes concurrently with the metallic standards, and the effects thereof upon the labor, industry, and wealth of the country; and

Fourth, into the policy and best means of providing for facilitating the resumption of specie payments.

And said commission is authorized to employ a stenographer, and shall report on or before the 15th day of January, 1877, with the evidence taken by them and such recommendations for legislation as they may deem proper.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. I hope there will be some discussion on this concurrent resolution.

Mr. FORT. Is not this resolution subject to a point of order?

Mr. GOODIN. I rise to make a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report of a committee of conference will of course take precedence even of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COX. If there is no objection on the part of the House, I will submit this proposition: let the previous question be ordered on this concurrent resolution——

Mr. FORT. I reserve all points of order on this resolution.

Mr. COX. If the House will order the previous question to-night, then I will have no objection to letting it go over till Monday, when there will be an hour for debate, and then the vote can be taken.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I must insist upon my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reports a concurrent resolution upon which he calls the previous question. Pending the demand for the previous question the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] moves that the House now adjourn. Pending the motion to adjourn the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GOODIN] rises to make a report from a committee of conference. The Chair will rule that the report from a conference committee is in order, even pending a motion to adjourn.

Mr. GOODIN. I have no disposition to retard the vote upon this concurrent resolution. I only insisted upon presenting the report at this time because of the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that the House now adjourn. If the motion to adjourn is not insisted upon and the vote can be taken at once on the adoption of the concurrent resolution, I will not press my report now.

Mr. BLAND. I shall insist upon debating this resolution.

Mr. PAGE. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

Mr. GOODIN. I do not withdraw my conference report if the motion of the gentleman from California is insisted upon. I understood the gentleman to withdraw his motion.

Mr. PAGE. Not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GOODIN] cannot withdraw his report conditionally. If he withdraws it, it is withdrawn altogether.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 413) establishing the port of Saint Paul, Minnesota, as a port of appraisal; and

A bill (S. No. 866) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas H. Williams, of Maryland.

N. H. COVERDALE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers in the case of N. H. Coverdale; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. LEAVENWORTH for ten days;

To Mr. WARREN for ten days from August 7;

To Mr. BURLEIGH for three days; and

To Mr. BURCHARD, of Wisconsin, indefinitely.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I now insist on the regular order. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GOODIN] consents to withdraw his conference report.

Mr. GOODIN. I will withdraw it to allow the question to be taken on the motion to adjourn. I trust, however, that the motion will be voted down, so that I may have an opportunity to submit my report this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman need not await the voting down of the motion to adjourn. His report is in order pending the motion to adjourn; and the Chair has so informed him.

Mr. COX. I could have disposed of this matter by this time.

Mr. GOODIN. This conference report will take but a few moments.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the report of the gentleman from Kansas.

OSAGE CEDED LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the bill numbered 12.

JOHN R. GOODIN,
LAFAYETTE LANE,
JAMES W. McDILL,
Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
FRANCIS KERNAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. GOODIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMISSION ON MONETARY SYSTEM.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House adjourn.

Mr. FORT. I want to understand whether my point of order upon the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is regarded as pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FORT. I made the point that the proposition of the gentleman from New York to appoint this joint commission must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, for the reason that it involves an expenditure of money. I wish to have that point of order passed upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman desires to have that point regarded as pending.

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will so regard it. He recognizes the fact that the gentleman made the point in ample time.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that unanimous consent was given for the consideration of another bill upon the condition that this bill should be considered at a certain time after that bill was presented, and that there should be an hour's debate on it. That unanimous consent necessarily supersedes the point of order.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the Chair take that agreement into consideration in deciding the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair was that unanimous consent was given only in regard to the time to be occupied in discussion. The Chair does not consider that by unanimous consent any rights were waived.

Mr. HOAR. One word further. I desire to suggest, without detaining the House now, that the Chair reserve his decision on this question until the bill comes directly before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All questions of order will be reserved. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House adjourn.

Mr. COX. Is it not in order for me, with the consent of the committee reporting the resolution, to withdraw the provision for a stenographer, and thus avoid the point of order, although I think the point is taken too late, unanimous consent having been given for the presentation of the measure. I wish to say that I do not propose to cut off debate on this measure. There will be an hour for debate after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. FORT. I made the point of order immediately upon the coming in of this report, as the RECORD will show.

Mr. COX. I believe the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to be heard a moment on the point of order before it is decided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As there seems to be a disposition to entertain the motion of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] the Chair will reserve all points of order and all other rights in connection with the resolution of the gentleman from New York until the measure comes directly before the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 81.

Mr. BLAND. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. COX. Is the point of order still pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOAR. I ask to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore The Chair will hear the gentleman when the gentleman from New York yields the floor.

Mr. COX. I yield the floor for the purpose of hearing the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand this proposition, it is to appoint a committee of the Senate and the House to sit during the recess. It is a commission of both branches of Congress to be composed of their own number to sit during the recess, and it is further provided that they shall have power to employ a stenographer and take evidence, and to associate with them certain experts whose aid they shall resort to in coming to their conclusions. It is nothing but an ordinary case of appointing a joint committee with authority to employ a stenographer or accountants or clerk or whatever assistants may be needed for the purpose of pursuing their investigations. I submit it was never the intention of the rule of this House applying to certain expenditures to limit the appointment of such committees to sit during the recess. If the point of order lies against this proposition, it must lie against every proposition to raise committees of investigation with authority to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I desire to add to that that this is not a measure upon which money can be appropriated. A concurrent resolution is not a bill nor a joint resolution, but simply relates to the proceedings of the two Houses, and in no such instance is it possible to give it the effect of law so as to appropriate money. The Mississippi investigation, the Louisiana investigation, the joint and separate investigations of the two Houses have been provided for by virtue of separate resolutions of either House or concurrent resolutions of both Houses, and therefore are not subject to the provisions of the rule referred to. I need only call to the attention of the Chair that on a bill the other day which required the printing of notes and which had the force of law, the Chair ruled, there being no appropriating clause in it and no definite sum specified, it was not subject to the point of order. Certainly on a concurrent resolution no such point of order can be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide this at once. A concurrent resolution is not subject to the point of order taken by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COX. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I demand a division of the House.

The House divided; and there were ayes 131, noes not counted.

Mr. BLAND. I do not desire a further count, but I wish to know from the gentleman from New York whether he intends to allow debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further count being demanded, the previous question is seconded, and the question now is on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. SAVAGE. I make the point of order that there is no quorum and insist on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman make the point of order before the second motion was put?

Mr. SAVAGE. I did.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he made it rising in his place?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot dispute the word of any gentleman on the floor. He states he made it in time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Was he in his seat when he made the demand?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint Mr. SAVAGE and Mr. COX tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 133, noes 23.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. BLAND. Is it open to debate now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The main question having been ordered, unless the gentleman from New York who reported the resolution takes the hour to which he is entitled and yields to the gentleman from Missouri, debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. I believe the House is now ready for a vote.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WILLIS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that by unanimous consent two hours were to be given to discussion on one bill, and one hour on this concurrent resolution. The Chair knows nothing of these private arrangements. The gentleman from New York who holds the floor insists on a vote. The Chair, therefore, holds that is the only question in order.

Mr. RANDALL. It is due to the gentleman from New York to say that by unanimous consent debate on this resolution was waived.

Mr. COX. And the Chair has no right to put the gentleman from New York in the predicament of disputing his word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not do so, but is seeking only to execute the unanimous understanding of the House.

Mr. COX. I am willing to give the gentleman from Missouri an opportunity for debate. I was ready to give it to him some time ago, but he agreed with me it should go over. As the House has refused to adjourn, the gentleman can debate it now.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say this, that I am willing to accept the proposition of the gentleman from New York made now. This is the same proposition that I made to him, that the previous question should be seconded, and that a vote should be taken on Monday after an hour's debate. But if the object is to pass this without debate, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman now if he chooses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state distinctly that he only wished to state to the House what he understood to be the arrangement; and in making that statement to the House he had no disposition whatever to charge the gentleman from New York with any bad faith in any possible respect. The Chair distinctly understood that two hours were to be given to the one question and one to the other. If that arrangement has been waived, it has been waived by consent of the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It has never been waived.

Mr. RANDALL. It was waived by the unanimous demand of the House for a vote.

Mr. BANKS. It has never been waived at all by anybody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore stated that in the judgment of the Chair the noes had it.

Mr. BANKS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 20, noes 107.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. COX. One-half the hour after ordering the main question is due to the gentlemen on the other side of the House by the arrangement that was made. I suppose I would have the disposition of one-half of the hour; and I yield that half hour to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.]

Mr. BLAND Mr. Speaker, it was not my desire to postpone action on this resolution. What I have done here to-day seems to have been done under a misapprehension. I had supposed there was an intention to press this resolution to a vote without debate.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to make some remarks on this question. We have a resolution here reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency looking to the postponement of the bill that I had the honor to report to this House from the Committee on Mines and Mining. It does not necessarily work that postponement. But when the act was passed demonetizing silver there was no such provision as this; no commission, no jury was asked upon the question whether silver should be demonetized or not. But it was done stealthily. Now ofter that act has been passed in a stealthy manner we are asked to pass a resolution of inquiry whether that act was proper or improper. This is in the character of mob law. You hang a man and then try him to ascertain whether or not he was guilty. You have demonetized silver, and now you appoint a jury to see whether that act was proper or improper. That is the position that this resolution occupies with reference to that question.

I say it is the duty of this House first to restore the currency where it existed and then appoint your commission to ascertain whether it is proper or not to repeal that law. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] characterized this legislation, proposing to remonetize silver, as being the most corrupt that had occurred in this Congress during his official career. I suppose that the gentleman from Ohio had forgotten some of the legislation here during his official career in this House. I suppose he had forgotten the act of 1869, an act that he voted for, changing the contract in the interest of the money-sharks of this country and against the people, by which they were swindled out of millions and millions of money. I suppose the gentleman had not in his recollection at that time the Credit Mobilier swindles and frauds in this country. I apprehend the gentleman had forgotten the fraud and corruption of the Boss Shepherd ring in the District of Columbia. If the gentleman does not recollect all these frauds, the country recollects them.

Mr. FOSTER. I call the gentleman from Missouri to order.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to remind the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is not present.

Mr. FORT. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will yield to a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Missouri to yield, and insists that the gentleman from Missouri shall not be interrupted. The Chair desires to preserve the rights of every gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I rose to call the gentleman from Missouri to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Have I not the right to call the gentleman from Missouri to order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is not out of order. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to know why gentlemen call me to order for referring to these things. They say the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is not in his seat. I cannot help that. I thought he was. It is his duty to be here during the proceedings of this House.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BLAND. I stated that the gentleman from Ohio had forgotten the fraud, the corruption, and the rottenness of his party, and the legislation that occurred while he was a member of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri will suspend; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] rises to a point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker pro tempore just decided that a member had not a right to call another member to order for using improper language toward another member of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decided no such thing.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] rose and called the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to order, and the Chair decided that he had no right to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decided that the gentleman from Missouri was not out of order, and the Chair still so decides and overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.]

Mr. BLAND. When I have made no personal allusion reflecting on the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I want to know why his friends are so tender on the subject. Do they know anything against him which comes within the category which leads them to squirm here? I have not charged anything against the gentleman from Ohio excepting that he had forgotten that corrupt legislation had occurred here during the time when his party was in power. Is there anything else you remember, gentlemen, that will make my language out of order? If so, state it; I want to know why this commotion and whence it comes. When a gentleman rises on this floor and reports from a committee a bill that involves a principle that is stigmatized by the gentleman from Ohio as being steeped in rascalities, and as being more so than any measure which had been introduced here during his official career; when that is done have not I the right to call the attention of the country to what occurred while he was in office, to show that corruption after corruption occurred here while he was a member? And, Mr. Speaker, I think I am in order and that is the trouble with the gentleman.

The bill I reported is a measure in the interest of the honest yeomanry of this country; here is a measure that proposes to do justice, to whom?

To the toiling millions who are to-day earning their bread in the sweat of their face; it is a measure in the interest of the poor and common people of the country, and hence it excites the opposition of the agents of the money sharks in these lobbies, and those who seem to be in their interest upon this floor. Because a measure is for once reported to this Congress that has within it a provision for the welfare of the people of the country against the corrupt legislation that has gone on here for the last sixteen years in the interest of the moneyed lords it is here denounced as full of rascalities, and all this by the party that had perpetrated these injustices and brought corruption, fraud, infamy, and dishonor upon the country.

Mr. Speaker, if I did not know that a majority of this House was in favor of this bill I would not hesitate in saying that we were misrepresentatives of the American people; but because the majority here favor this bill and because they will pass it if it can ever come to a vote, those that are in the interest of the lobbyists have been filibustering and endeavoring to defeat it from day to day.

Mr. Speaker, the common people of the country cannot come to this Capitol. They are not here in your lobby. They are at home following the plow, cultivating the soil, or working in their workshops. It is the silvern and golden slippers of the money kings, the bankers and financiers, whose step is heard in these lobbies and who rule the finances of the country. They are the men who get access to your committees, and have ruled and controlled the legislation of this country for their own interests. If the constituents of those who are opposing this measure could look down from the galleries upon them they would sink in their seats with shame for the course they are pursuing, because it is adverse to the interests of their people.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, I have reported back to this House the following bill, and shall at the earliest opportunity allowed me put it upon its passage:

A bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That coin-notes of the denomination of $50, and multiples thereof up to $10,000, may, in the mode hereinafter provided, be paid by the several mints and assay offices at San Francisco, Carson City, Philadelphia, and New York, for the net value of gold and silver bullion deposited thereat; and of the bullion thus received not less than 75 per cent. in coin or fine bars shall at all times be kept on hand for redemption of the coin-notes, gold for gold and silver for silver. The gold deposited shall be computed at its coining value, and silver at the rate of 412.8 grains standard silver to the dollar, less the lawful mint charges, and such charge for transportation from the several assay offices to the mints for coinage, and from the latter to the assistant treasuries respectively at which the coin-notes shall be payable; and there shall be coined at the mints of the United States the silver dollar hereinbefore mentioned.

SEC. 2. That for bullion deposited at the mints of San Francisco and Carson, the coin-notes issued shall be redeemable on demand at the assistant treasury at San Francisco; and for bullion deposited at the Philadelphia mint and assay office at New York, the notes shall be redeemed at the assistant treasury at New York.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, cause coin and fine mint-bars (stamped) to be transferred from the mint to the assistant treasuries at San Francisco and New York in such amounts as may be necessary for the redemption of the coin-notes.

SEC. 4. That the coin-notes issued under the provisions of this act shall be receivable without limit for all dues to the United States; and the coin mentioned in this act shall be a legal tender for all debts, [of the United States,] public and private, not specified to be paid in gold coin.

SEC. 5. That the gold-coin notes issued under this act shall be redeemed, on presentation, in gold coin or fine bars, and silver in silver dollars or fine bars.

SEC. 6. That the coin-notes authorized by this act to be issued shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be transferred to the mints and assay offices named in this act as a part of the bullion fund, and from which fund deposits shall be paid for in coin or coin-notes, at the option of the depositor.

SEC. 7. That the fine gold and silver bars by this act authorized to be issued shall bear the mint stamp of fineness, weight, and value, and the value of the gold bars shall be computed according to their coining rate, and the silver bars at their coining value in dollars.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the necessary regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

This bill is of vast importance to the tax-payers of this country, for they are the debtor class to the Government.

The first section of the bill, as will be observed, provides for the payment by the Government certificates for bullion of gold and silver. Twenty-five per cent. of this bullion or coin arising therefrom is required to be at all times in the Treasury for the redemption of the coin certificates, gold for gold, and silver for silver. It also authorizes the coining of the silver dollar of the value of 412.8 grains silver to a dollar.

The second section of the bill names the places where these deposits shall be made and certificates issued. San Francisco, Carson City, Philadelphia, and the assay office at New York are the only places, as stated by Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, where the parting of metals is provided for.

The third section refers to the details of providing for tqe redemption of these certificates. They are in this section made redeemable either in bars or in coin. This would be at the option of the Government.

The fourth section contains the pith of the whole bill; that is, restoring the money character of silver and making the silver dollar authorized in the first section to be coined a legal tender for all debts, public and private, not specified to be paid in gold. The remainder of the act refers merely to the details of carrying out the law.

The effect of the bill will be to restore the double standard of gold and silver, and also to obviate the objections so often urged against gold as well as silver, that as money, from the weight and bulk of the metal, they are inconvenient, for the coin certificates will take the place of and be used for business transactions instead of the coin itself.

Mr. Speaker, this is a short outline of the bill, a hasty explanation of the purposes intended in framing it. By the terms of the bill we at once establish a convenient paper issue that will be used instead or coin, worth its face in coin, for the coin is always behind it for its redemption. But the opponents of the bill say that to make all Government debts payable in silver as well as gold is dishonesty, repudiation, and ought not to be tolerated. These are grave charges, and if true the bill should not receive the sanction of this House; but if I can show that those who make the charge are the guilty parties, and the friends of the bill only desire to act in good faith toward the debtor class, the tax-payers, and the creditor class or tax-consumer, then the bill should pass at once and become a law. In the first place the enemies of the bill have been the loudest in their demand for specie resumption. What is resumption of specie payments if it is not to resume the currency of the Government existing at the time of the suspension of specie payment? What was that currency? The answer is, gold and silver. That is a fact that none deny. The silver dollar at that time was as full and complete a legal tender for all demands, public and private, as was the gold dollar.

The silver dollar was, and continued to be, equal to gold as the money of the country, and is so by law up to the present time except for the act of February, 1873, which prohibited the coining of the legal-tender silver dollar. This act was passed no doubt for the same reason and at the instance of the same parties that procured the passage of the act of 1869 pledging the faith of the nation to pay all its obligations in coin. Both acts were in the interest of stock-jobbers and speculators in Government bonds.

Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to have read the act of 1869 referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. (Revised Statutes, section 3693, page 735.)

Mr. BLAND. This act does not make clear what was uncertain. It defines no law. The act professes to define and make clear some obscure statute. Instead of making clear the intent or meaning of any law, it attempts to make that law which was not law before. It clearly perpetrated the fraud of changing the contract between the tax-payer and the tax-consumer in the interest of the latter. I incorporate in my remaks a statement and the figures taken from the Saint Louis Republican, a journal known throughout the country as a hard-money advocate; a journal that I think would deal equitably as between the bondholder and the people:

WHAT THE BONDS SOLD FOR.

During the war and just after its close the Government issued a great amount of bonds of various kinds, which, as we learn from the Treasury record of the transactions, were sold at "par." But this record is very delusive, and in the sale of the bonds referred to hides enormous losses. The bonds were sold not for gold at par, but for greenbacks at par, which is a widely different thing. For example, a one-thousand-dollar Government bond sold at par in 1865, when gold was 145, brought only $700 in gold value; and as the interest on that bond has been faithfully paid in gold ever since, and the principal itself will be paid in gold, it is to be considered that for this debt of $1,000 the Government received only $700. The higher the price of gold at the time an issue of bonds was disposed of, the less value the Government received for the bonds, although they were sold at "par" in greenbacks, as the deceptive Treasury reports inform us. An approximately accurate calculation of the net result of these sales of bonds gives us another illustration of what republican financiering has cost us, and it deserves to be presented and placed to the account of that party.

The various issues of bonds and other forms of indebtedness issued in 1863 amounted in the aggregate to $552,595,000; they were sold at par for greenbacks when gold was worth 155, and greenbacks only 61. They therefore brought to the Government in gold value only $337,082,910. In 1864 the 10.40 bonds, $196,000,000 in amount, were issued and sold at 7 per cent. premium, the only bonds issued during the war that brought a premium. As gold at that time was worth 230, the 7 per cent. premium reduces this to 227; the gold value of the price brought by the ten-forties, therefore, was forty-four cents on the dollar, or $86,240,000 for the whole issue. In the same year there were issued of bonds and other forms of indebtedness $130,000,000, which sold for a gold value of forty-three cents on the dollar, making $55,900,000. In 1865 there were issued bonds to the amount of $551,300,000, which were sold for seventy cents in gold, making $385,910,000. In 1867 there were issued $380,000,000 of bonds, which sold for eighty-three cents, making $315,400,000. In 1868 there were issued $42,500,000 of bonds, which brought seventy-three cents, making $31,025,000. To sum up:

1864,	196,000,000	bonds at 44	86,240,000
1864,	130,000,000	bonds at 43	55,900,000
1865,	551,300,000	bonds at 70	385,910,000
1867,	380,000,000	bonds at 83	315,400,000
1868,	42,500,000	bonds at 73	31,025,000
	1,852,395,000		1,211,557,910

The debt of $1,852,395,000 therefore represents only $1,211,557,910 received by the Government, or an average price of about 66⅔ cents on the dollar. This is what the Treasury reports call negotiating loans "at par;" it is a par sale of bonds that has cost the people a loss of $640,837,000, or one-third the whole amount of bonds issued.

The tax-consumers seem not satisfied with this enormous tax, but desire now to repudiate so much of the act of 1869 as provides for paying this debt in silver as well as gold. Nothing but gold will satiate their financial maw. The people of this country are now fully aroused on the question of finance. They are looking for the cause of the wide-spread bankruptcies and business failures in the country. They cannot fail to see that the demonetization of this precious metal, thus cutting off more than one-half the medium of coin payments and exchange, is the greatest calamity that could be conceived.

Mr. Speaker, now that this question is open for fair discussion and settlement we should make no mistake, no compromise that would further favor the tax-consumer and oppress the tax-payer. Many schemes are suggested, among others that silver should be a legal tender only for small amounts of $20 or $50; but this would be conceding all. Should we now do this it would be claimed hereafter that Congress had after full discussion and mature deliberation abandoned the idea of making silver a full payment of public dues, that for the future contracts and sales of all Government securities would be based upon this legislation, and to alter it would be a violation of public faith and honor. Let it be settled once at least in the interest of those who have the burdens to bear.

Let this bill become a law and our financial troubles are ended. Specie payments will have been resumed. The resumption of specie payments must mean that we resume the coin that prevailed when we suspended. This coin was gold and silver, both a full and equal legal tender for all debts, public and private. Our legal-tender notes could be redeemed and their places supplied by a note based on specie. We would have a monetary system that would regulate itself; a system that would not depend for its volume or value upon the uncertain and partisan legislation of Congress. The power that Congress assumes now to expand, contract, and thus from session to session unsettle all monetary affairs is an evil that, sooner or later, will bring the people of this country to the helpless condition of mere slaves of the money lords and plutocrats that rule the legislation here all the time in their own interest. They have had their paid agents, lobbyists, and hired attorneys here in these halls and corridors scheming session after session for the last fifteen years, and by all manner of appliances have succeeded, as I have shown, in robbing the people of millions of dollars. Yes, Mr. Speaker, by the one act of 1869 it is shown that the Government was robbed of over a half billion of dollars. Let us settle this question once and forever and give the people an opportunity to attend to other matters than watching to see how much will be plundered from them by each succeeding Congress.

Silver is the money of the Constitution. Section 10, first article, says:

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

Thus silver is mentioned as a part of the coin money of the Constitution. Article 1, section 6, of the Constitution reserves to the Federal Government the sole right to coin money. No State can do it. So the power to coin money is given to the General Government. States are prohibited from making anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender. Now, can a State make gold and silver coin a legal tender when the State is prohibited from coining money at all? The answer is in the sixth section named. The Federal Government has the power to coin it. The State can make this coin a legal tender. It therefore becomes the duty of the Federal Government to coin this money so that the States may make and use it as a legal tender. The States have the right to make silver a legal tender, but cannot coin it. Now, can their constitutional right be exercised unless the Federal Government exercises its exclusive power of coining the money? This bill fulfills the obligation the Federal Government owes to the States, the obligation of coining the money they may desire to use as a legal tender.

I have shown that silver is the money of the Constitution, that it is the duty of the Government to coin it. There is no mistake that the silver dollar has been a full legal-tender from the formation of the Government till the fraudulent act of 1873. Then it is the duty of Congress to coin it and pay Government debts with it.

Title 37, page 70, section 3513, is as follows:

The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be four hundred and twenty grains troy; the weight of the half dollar shall be twelve grains and one-half of a grain; the quarter dollar and the dime shall be respectively one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half-dollar.

Section 3516 is as follows:

No coins, whether of gold, silver, or minor coinage, shall hereafter be issued from the Mint other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights set forth in this title.

Section 3511, ibid., is as follows:

The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains, shall be the unit of value, &c.

The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

These provisions are all taken from the coinage act of 12th February, 1873. The effect of these sections is: first, by section 3511 the gold dollar is made the unit of value; the gold standard is here declared. Section 3513 provides for the coining of the trade-dollar and subsidiary currency and section 3516 prohibits the coining any other than the coin mentioned in the title. So that the silver dollar of 412.5 grains that had been a full legal tender up to the date of this act was left out.

Section 3586 permits the legal tender of silver coin to sums of $5. This act of February 12, 1873, was a fraud, because its title gave no clew to the real intent of the act. The record shows that the act was stealthily passed, without consideration and without debate. The public generally had no notice of the pendency of such a bill, and it was not till during this session of Congress the law was unearthed and exposed.

Mr. Speaker, when will the time come that mistakes and blunders will creep into our statutes favorable to the tax-paying people? All such oversights heretofore have uniformly been in the interest of the tax-consumer. Let this law be repealed as openly, as honestly, and boldly as it was stealthily, fraudulently, and sneakingly enacted. With the double standard, which will utilize our product of silver as well as gold, we can resume specie payments without detriment to any class. Indeed the question of resumption hinges upon this policy. With this bill enacted into law resumption is at once accomplished; but if we are to undertake resumption with the gold standard alone, the money sharks will foreclose the mortgages they have upon the people, sell them out of houses and homes, and turn millions of hard-working and industrious people into beggars. The road to resumption with the double standard will be one of prosperity and happiness; the other leads to a dark and dismal financial swamp, through the impenetrable gloom of which the eye of no statesman can discern the least glimmer of light.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard objections to that feature of the bill authorizing the issue of coin certificates, that the mints could not coin the silver fast enough to redeem these certificates and that to receive them for Government dues would result in having a large amount of silver bullion and certificates on hand, neither of which would be a legal tender for dues of the Government. The answer is, no one would demand the coin or bullion; no one would desire the payment of a thousand or a hundred thousand dollars in silver or gold, but would willingly take the certificate from the Government instead of the coin. Practically no coin except for small change under fifty dollars would be called for or used, so that feature is in favor of the bill and not a valid objection to it. Another objection urged is that it is not clear that the Government would get the benefit of the seigniorage or expense of coining; but the bill provides all the expense of coining and transportation shall be paid by the depositor.

I here submit a letter from Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint. I sent him a copy of the bill and requested his answer on the subject. The letter explains this matter satisfactorily. The bill in other particulars has been amended so as to conform to all the recommendations contained in this letter. The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
May 26, 1876.

SIR: I have your note of current date inclosing bill H. R. No. 3363, and reply to your inquiries, as follows:

By the coining value of gold is meant the rate at which it is coined under the law, namely, 25.8 grains troy, nine-tenths fine to the dollar. The alloy is paid for by the depositor, but is not valued in the coin.

The nominal value of the gold coins corresponds with their intrinsic or bullion value; there is, therefore, no gain in value in the coinage. The foregoing is an answer to your inquiries.

As the parting of bullion (separation of gold from silver, both metals being returned in fine bars) is carried on only at the mints in Philadelphia, San Francisco, and Carson, and at the assay office in New York, it will be necessary to confine the provisions of your bill to those institutions. Otherwise fine gold could not be kept for the redemption of the notes at the place of deposit.

I have noted in pencil on the bill the required modifications.

I observe that the value of the silver is to be computed at the trade-dollar rate, 420 grains to the dollar.

I suggest for your consideration whether the computation should not be made on the basis of 412.8 grains of standard silver to the dollar, a bill for the coinage of a dollar of that weight being now under consideration in the Senate.

I make this suggestion without in any way committing myself to the making of either of these dollars an unlimited tender. Your bill is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN, Director.

Hon. R. P. BLAND.

With the vast mining resources of this country turning out annually silver and gold to the amount of many millions of dollars, increased by developments made daily in the Pacific States and Territories, there is no difficulty in resuming specie payments by utilizing the silver, but if the money sharks of the country prevent this we may expect difficulties not now dreamed of. If we have the right to demonitize silver, we have the right to demonitize gold. This will be the logical result. For when we refuse the one it will lead to the refusal of the other, and the substitution of paper in which Government bonds will be paid, and thus lead to unlimited inflation.

The question is here presented of honest resumption or on the other hand a forced unlimited inflation of paper money. Let the bondholder ponder this well before refusing silver as a legal coin in this country. It is true that silver is now worth even less than the legal-tenders, but this is because of its demonetization in a great measure; but the fact that silver is cheaper than gold does not alter the law of the case. By law we have the right to pay at our option in silver or gold, so that we but exercise a moral, legitimate right when we pay in silver, the cheaper money. That is the contract; that is the law, so expressed in the act of 1869. If the peple have found a legal way of averting to some extent the injustice of this act, it is a providential interposition that they will hail with rejoicing. We have promised to pay the debt in coin. Silver is coin, legal coin, the coin named in the law, "nominated in the bond." Because silver is now cheaper than gold should we again change the contract and say the tax-payer must pay in gold alone would be robbery, nothing more, nothing less. We have had too much of legalized robbery and plunder of this sort. Let us call a halt, pass this bill, and for once do justice to a poverty-stricken, over-taxed people. If A promised ten years ago to pay B a thousand dollars in wheat, at the end of ten years could B refuse the wheat because it had fallen in price and was worth fifteen cents a bushel less now than when the contract was made? No, sir; the law would compel him to stand to his contract. So should the bondholder. The bonds were made payable in coin, gold and silver coin, not gold alone, but gold and silver, leaving the Government the right to elect whether to pay in the one or the other or both.

The bill I have reported is, I think, well guarded and carefully drawn, and I shall use every effort to pass it or some other that will answer the same purpose. To this end I shall use every honorable exertion. I know the bondholding interest represented on this floor has been filibustering it for two weeks and may delay it till next winter; but I have the satisfaction of knowing that a majority of this House favor it and will hail the day when they can be brought to a vote upon it.

Mr. KASSON. As the gentleman from New York does not wish to proceed further in the discussion of this question I shall content myself with some brief observations. In the assault which has been made upon the coinage act of 1873 many gross misstatements have been uttered. It is due to the gentlemen who were connected with that act, which is charged to have been surreptitiously passed, that the facts in relation to it should be distinctly stated.

The records of the Treasury Department show that the coinage act of 1873 was first transmitted to the Forty-first Congress by the Department accompanied by a report. On the 25th of April, 1870, it was introduced into the Senate by Senator SHERMAN and printed on April 28. It was reported from the Committee on Finance to the Senate, after seven months, on the 19th of December, 1870, and again printed, with amendments. It passed the Senate on the 10th of January, 1871, and went to the House, and was printed by order of the House on the 13th of January, 1871. On the 25th of February, 1871, it was again brought before this House by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] not now in his seat, who reported it back from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures (of which he was chairman) with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. It was again printed and recommitted. That same gentleman again introduced the bill in the Forty-second Congress, and after considerable discussion it was again recommitted, and was not again considered in the House, as it appears, until the next session. On the 9th of February, 1872, it was reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures by Mr. Hooper, and printed and recommitted. On the 13th of February, 1872, the bill was reported back by Mr. Hooper with amendments and made a special order for the 12th of March and until disposed of. And the bill finally passed the House May 27, 1872, upon a division, ayes 110, noes 13.

The bill then went to the Senate, and was ordered to be printed, and on May 29, 1872, was referred to the Committee on Finance. It was again reported back to the Senate in December, 1872, ordered to be printed and recommitted, reported back, with amendment, January 7, 1873, and passed that body on January 17, 1873. It was sent to the House again for concurrence in the Senate amendments on January 21, 1873. On motion of Mr. Hooper the bill was again ordered to be printed with the Senate amendments, and a committee of conference was ordered upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. That committee reported; and the bill finally became a law as the result of the report of the committee of conference February 12, 1873.

This is the "surreptitious" bill of which we have heard so much. Hardly ever has a bill been so thoroughly considered by the two Houses.

Now in the face of facts like these, when the chairman of a committee of this House has made such charges as we have just listened to, I inquire if this House will indorse the report of that committee with any confidence in their investigation without further inquiry into the facts connected with this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. The original bill was simply a bill to organize a bureau of mines and coinage. The bill which finally passed the House and which ultimately became a law was certainly not read in this House.

Mr. KASSON. I differ entirely with the gentleman, having given the history from the record.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to read the record, to show that the bill passed the House without reading when Mr. KERR called for its reading.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman speaks of the final passage of the bill on the conference report?

Mr. BLAND. I have the Congressional Globe here to show that it was not read.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman deny the facts as I have now stated them?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was not read on the day of its passage.

Mr. KASSON. It came into the House here and was discussed and was committed and recommitted and ordered to be printed and reprinted about eleven times in both Houses, and was considered in both branches of Congress and in conference committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was never considered before the House as it was passed. Up to the time the bill came before this House for final passage, the measure had simply been one to establish a Bureau of Mines; I believe I use the term correctly now. It came from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The substitute which finally became a law was never read, and is subject to the charge made against it by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] that it was passed by the House without a knowledge of its provisions, especially upon that of coinage.

I myself asked the question of Mr. Hooper, who stood near where I am now standing, whether it changed the law in regard to coinage. And the answer of Mr. Hooper certainly left the impression upon the whole House that the subject of the coinage was not affected by that bill.

Mr. KASSON. Did the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] himself call for the reading of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. Why was it not read? It was your right to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The record will show that it was not read.

Mr. BLAND. The reading was called for by Mr. KERR. I have the record here to show that I am competent to make a report here in accordance with the facts.

Mr. KASSON. What does the gentleman desire to show now?

Mr. HOLMAN. Just this——

Mr. KASSON. That the bill was not read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will read from the Congressional Globe:

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is intended to have the bill read before it is put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope not. It is a long bill, and those who are interested in it are perfectly familiar with its provisions.

Mr. KERR. The rules cannot be suspended so as to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. They can be.

Mr. KERR. I want the House to understand that it is attempted to put through this bill without being read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] move that the reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will so frame my motion to suspend the rules that it will dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill pass, the reading thereof being dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. Cannot we have a division of that motion?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules cannot be divided.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have the bill read, although I am willing that the rules shall be suspended as to the passage of the bill.

The question was put on suspending the rules and passing the bill without reading; and (two-thirds not voting therefor) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. KASSON. And that proposition failed?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. But I will read farther:

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I now move that the rules be suspended, and the substitute for the bill in relation to mints and coinage passed; and I ask that the substitute be read.

The Clerk began to read the substitute.

Mr. BROOKS. Is that the original bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] applies to the substitute, and that on which the House is called to act is being read.

Mr. BROOKS. As there is to be no debate, the only chance we have to know what we are doing is to have both the bill and the substitute read.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts being to suspend the rules and pass the substitute, it gives no choice between the two bills. The House must either pass the substitute or none.

Mr. BROOKS. How can we choose between the original bill and the substitute unless we hear them both read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can vote "ay" or "no" on the question whether this substitute shall be passed.

Mr. BROOKS. I am very much in the habit of voting "no" when I do not know what is going on.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is taken upon suspending the rules and passing the bill, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain the leading changes made by this bill in the existing law, especially in reference to the coinage. It would seem that all the small coinage of the country is intended to be recoined.

Mr. KASSON. Come to the point about the question of reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to show that there was no reading of the substitute:

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This bill makes no changes in the existing law in that regard. It does not require the recoinage of the small coins.

Then Mr. SARGENT, Mr. Farnsworth, Mr. McCormick, and Mr. McNeely made inquiries in regard to matters of salaries and other changes contemplated by the bill, but none in relation to the question of coinage, because that was understood to have been answered already by Mr. Hooper.

Mr. KASSON. Was the substitute read?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. After the putting and answering of the inquiries I have referred to the record closes in this way:

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to; there being ayes 110, noes 13.

Mr. KASSON. I must resume the floor. The proceedings which the gentleman has read show conclusively——

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a single word further. I wish to say that the subject of coinage was not supposed to be involved in the bill, and the measure as passed was not read in the House.

Mr. KASSON. Now I come to this point: not a word which the gentleman has read denies or modifies a syllable of the record which I have stated. On the contrary, it is shown clearly that the proposition which was not read was the bill which was not passed—the original bill. As to the substitute, its reading was begun, as gentlemen had a right to call for it and any single member could exact it; and then an opponent of the bill on the other side of the House interrupted the reading, preferring an explanation; and then gentleman after gentleman rose making inquiries about the contents of the bill and had them answered, after which nobody seems to have called for the conclusion of the reading of the bill. That is what the record shows.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman state whether it is or is not the fact that that bill changed the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar?

Mr. KASSON. I have not found anything in that coinage law that indicates the slightest surreptitious act or unusual proceeding. On the contrary, the silver dollar was omitted from the original bill sent here by the Treasury Department, and the consideration of that question ran through all the various bills.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to read that part of the act which modified the previous law so as to limit the use of silver as a legal tender to the amount of $5 only?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman must excuse me. He and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have already occupied more of my time than I have myself.

Mr. BLAND. Will not the gentleman allow me——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] must not be interrupted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] The Chair protected the gentleman from Missouri in his rights a few moments ago; and he must now protect the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BLAND. I was simply asking——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa declines to be interrupted. That is sufficient for the Chair.

Mr. KASSON. I hope it will be remembered that I only decline to be further interrupted after very large concessions in that respect.

I know very well that by that act the legal-tender quality of silver was limited to $5, the coinage of the old silver dollar having practically ceased long before. Nothing has been read which controverts any part of the statement I have already made of the history of this legislation through two Congresses and both Houses. I wish to add further that there were letters on the subject from nearly all the officers of the Mint—from Raymond, from Patterson, from the venerable Dr. Torry of New York, from Mr. Snowden, from Mr. Pollock, from Dr. Linderman. The letters of these and other gentlemen who had elaborately investigated the subject I think accompanied the report that was presented on this question to Congress.

I did not intend to occupy the attention of the House thus long; but I did think it important that this House should observe that the omission of the silver dollar from the coinage act was a proposition running through all its consideration. One of the amendments proposed was to make the dollar that should be coined equivalent to two half dollars that were being coined. That finally failed; and the result of the proposition on that subject was that the dollar of 412½ grains was left out; the proposed dollar equivalent to two of the existing half dollars was left out; and the "trade-dollar" finally came in in lieu of all those other propositions touching the silver dollar.

In conclusion, I will simply say that I regret exceedingly that the language of popular prejudice should be heard in the discussion of a question of this sort on this floor. The relation between gold and silver and their relative value prospectively as well as at present are among the most serious questions that can be presented to this body. We cannot determine without further knowledge what that relation should be, whether we should coin exactly the old coin or whether we should establish a new fixed or variable relation to the gold dollar, in view of this unprecedented depreciation of silver or any other of these serious questions on which the greatest economists of the world are consulted by the legislative bodies of other countries before they come to a decision.

If at a time when European countries, especially the Latin nations, are limiting the amount of their silver coin, and Germany is repudiating it, and England will not have it as one of her standards, if at this time the United States adopts it, what will be its effect on us who open our hands for their refuse unless it be to depreciate it further here?

As to the effects of this bill, of which the gentleman from Missouri spoke, I have no time to go into it further than to say that I am not one of the men who propose to take care of the labor of this country by paying it eighty cents for a dollar's worth of wages. I am not one of those who propose that Englishmen buying the grain of our western farmers shall send here in payment of the balance of trade in our favor the depreciated and abandoned silver of Europe, worth 10 per cent. less than our own paper money, and 20 per cent. less than the gold that England now remits in payment for the surplus products of our farms. I am not disposed to do all this until all the facts and relations of this question are submitted to us in a formal and carefully prepared report, with the evidence upon which its conclusions rest, that we may form therefrom a more intelligent and deliberate judgment.

I learn that in France, a double-standard country, about three weeks ago, the government suspended the coinage of five-franc pieces because of this uncertainty of information as to the result of the great agitation arising from the alarming depreciation of silver.

I have here a summary of the report of a committee of the English Parliament on one branch of this subject, which at the request of other gentlemen I append to my remarks without asking that it may be read.

Another question is how much surplus, if we adopt the double standard, will come from Germany, how much will come from India, and how much will come from China and all Asia, from all quarters of the world. I know of these questions, but I do not know sufficiently of the facts, authentically, to ask this House to vote, or even to justify myself in casting a vote at this stage of our session on the other bill now pending in the morning hour, and therefore I urge the adoption of these resolutions. [Cries of "vote!" "Vote!"]

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The following is the summary referred to:

To sum up the more striking facts which have been brought before your committee, the situation at the present moment appears to be this:

1. The total annual production of silver has risen to upward of £14,000,000, from an average of about £8 000,000 to £9,000,000 in 1860.

2. Of this amount of £14,000,000 the mines of the United States are estimated to have produced about £7,000,000, with the prospect of an increase for some years to come. On the other hand, if the price of silver should remain as low as at present, there may be some diminution in the production elsewhere.

3. Germany has still to dispose of an amount which is certainly not less than £8,000,000, with the possibility that it may exceed £20,000,000; but with the possibility, on the other hand, that a considerably larger sum than the estimated amount may be ultimately required for subsidiary coinage.

4. The Scandinavian kingdoms have discontinued the use of silver, but the amounts of demonetized silver coin which they have thrown or can throw on the market are not important.

5. Austria has apparently been exchanging silver for gold, the amount of silver held in the imperial bank having diminished from £10,000,000 to £6,000,000 since 1871.

6. Italy has been gradually denuded of her silver currency. Since 1865 large amounts have been exported; her forced paper currency has apparently expelled the whole of the metallic currency, of which the silver coins amounted at the beginning of 1866 to about £17,000,000 sterling.

7. France, on the other hand, has for some years past been replenishing her stock of silver, of which during the last four years her imports have exceeded her exports by £33,500,000.

8. England, Russia, and Spain have each been buyers to the extent of some millions.

9. Japan and China and other countries in the east have absorbed a certain amount.

10. India still takes silver, but in greatly decreased amounts.

11. The home government has bills to sell to the extent of £15,000,000 per annum, which debtors to India can buy in the place of remitting bullion. This total has been gradually reached, and represents an excess of more than £10,000,000 compared with twenty years ago.

12. The gross remittances of silver to India during the last four years have been £15,600,000 compared with £28,900,000 in the four previous years.

Legislatively, the position is as follows:

Germany is gradually demonetizing silver, and looks forward to its use only for subsidiary coinage.

The United States is carrying out a policy of introducing silver subsidiary coinage in the place of all fractional paper currency now afloat, and of coining full-weighted silver coins, but only on a contracted scale, and only available for legal tender for a limited amount.

The members of the Latin Union and Holland have adopted an expectant attitude, but meanwhile limit as far as possible the coinage of silver.

No indications are given of any intention on the part of Russia and Austria to pass any laws with regard to their currency.

The actual facts which have been enumerated speak for themselves; and it will be seen at once which of them are in favor of a rise in the price of silver and which of them tend in a contrary direction. It is important, too, that the temporary character of some of these facts and the normal character of others should be fully taken into account. The surplus stock of Germany will in all probability weigh heavily on the market for some time to come; still it is a temporary circumstance. On the other hand, the United States will afford temporary relief to the market by retaining for her own coinage considerable amounts of the silver there produced. It is indeed possible, according to the evidence adduced, that the United States will retain as much silver for her new coinage operations as Germany may have to sell as the result of hers.

The case of France deserves especial attention. The replenishment of her stock of silver can scarcely be regarded as other than a temporary circumstance. During the last four years, out of a total of £76,000,000 of disposable silver, France absorbed £35,500,000. The relief thereby given to the market must have been immense. It is impossible to assume that it can be continued on the same scale. The natural inference to be drawn would be in the opposite direction.

With regard to India and the East, hitherto the largest consumers of silver, so much must depend upon the prosperity of the populations, on the abundance of the crops—in fact, on their powers of production—that it is impossible to make any forecast; and, as regards actual facts, no more can be stated than that on the one hand they have always possessed a very large power of absorbing bullion, while on the other that power has been diminished by the growth of the sums annually payable by India to the home government.

The only facts in any calculations as to the future which are certain, and appear to be permanent, are the increased total production of silver and the effect caused by the necessity of the Indian government to draw annually for a heavy amount. Both are adverse to the future value of silver so far as they go, but they may be partially counterbalanced by changes in the trade with the East.

As regards Europe, much must depend upon the action taken by the governments of the various countries where the question of the currency to be adopted is still unsettled. Your committee have not considered it to be within the scope of the questions referred to them to make inquiry as to the intentions of these governments, though many references to their views will be found in the various official documents procured for the committee by the foreign office. Your committee on this point would simply remark that it is obvious that, if effect should be given to the policy of substituting gold for silver wherever it is feasible, and giving gold, for the sake of its advantages in international commerce, the preference even among populations whose habits and customs are in favor of silver, and thus displacing silver from the position (which it has always occupied) of doing the work of the currency over at least as large an area as gold, no possible limits could be assigned to the further fall in its value, which would inevitably take place; but your committee are bound to refrain from giving any opinion on the expediency of such a policy or the necessity for its adoption.

In conclusion, your committee have to observe that, while they have endeavored to be as precise as possible in their statement of the facts which have been brought to their notice and to give an explicit answer to the questions referred to them, as to the causes of the present depreciation of silver, they consider that, in view of the many uncertain elements to which they have pointed, and which necessarily enter into every calculation as to the future, they are not authorized to offer any further opinion as to the probable course of the silver market beyond indicating, as they have endeavored to do, the various circumstances which have to be taken into account.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to detain the House at this late hour of the afternoon, but as the complaint appears to be that by legislation of Congress the silver dollar was demonetized, and as the charge has been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that it was done surreptitiously and perpetrated an injustice and a fraud upon the people, I wish to say to the House that I have here in my hand the whole proceedings from the conception of the idea of the demonetization of the silver dollar down to the final consummation in the law of 1873.

In the report which was made by Mr. J. J. KNOX, now the Comptroller of the Currency, in 1870, with regard to the re-organization of the Mint and the draught of a bill which accompanied it, the silver dollar of 412½ grains was left entirely out. In the correspondence which took place between the Treasury Department and the officers of the Mint and scientific men all over the country it was the almost unanimous conclusion of those learned men, who had bestowed attention on the subject, that the dollar of 412½ grains should be omitted. In the session of 1871, as has already been stated, my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] offered a bill in which that dollar was not mentioned at all. It is No. 5 of the first session of the Forty-second Congress.

It was reported again by Mr. KELLEY on January 9, 1872, with his recommendation that it do pass, and was debated by him and Potter, GARFIELD, HOLMAN, and others. On the next day the consideration of it was resumed and my colleague explained the bill and it was recommitted. It was reported back by Mr. Hooper as bill No. 1427 on the 9th of February, having in it a subsidiary dollar of 384 grains and divisions thereof but omitting the old dollar of 412½ grains and providing that no coins of gold, silver, or minor coinage other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights therein set forth should be coined. Mr. Hooper explained it in ten columns of the Globe, and stated specifically that the reason the dollar was reduced to 384 grains was that the silver dollar was worth one hundred and three cents in gold and was exported and we could not keep it here. My colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] then chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, gave most substantial reasons for the omission of the old dollar, the sound policy of which I most heartily indorse, especially his observations on the double standard. He said:

I wish to ask the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. Potter] if he knows of any government in the world which makes its subsidiary coinage of full value? The silver coin of England is 10 per cent. below the value of gold coin. And acting under the advice of the experts of this country, and of England and France, Japan has made her silver coinage within the last year 12 per cent. below the value of gold coin, and for this reason: it is impossible to retain the double standard. The values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You cannot determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago; they are 16 to 1 now.

Hence, all experience has shown that you must have one standard coin which shall be a legal tender for all others, and then you may promote your domestic convenience by having a subsidiary coinage of silver which shall circulate in all parts of your country as legal tender for a limited amount, and be redeemable at its face value by the Government.

But, sir, I again call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentlemen who oppose this bill insist upon maintaining a silver dollar worth three and a half cents more than the gold dollar, and worth seven and a half cents more than two half dollars, and that so long as those proportions remain you cannot keep silver coin in the country.

The debate occupied nearly forty columns of the Globe, so that there was no smuggling about it, but the attention was called to the change in the silver dollar and its reduction to a subsidiary coin. (See Globe, volume 89, pages 2304 to 2317.)

Later in the session (May 27) Mr. Hooper reported a substitute (No. 2934) which, so far as the silver dollar was concerned, was precisely similar to the preceding ones, all of them ignoring the old dollar and restricting the legal tender of the subsidiary coins to $5. That bill was debated by Messrs. Hooper, Brooks, HOLMAN, Farnsworth, SARGENT, KERR, and McNeely.

Mr. McNeely was a member of the Committee on Coinage, and said:

As a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, having carefully examined every section and line of this bill and generally well understanding the subject before us, I am satisfied that the bill ought to pass.

It was thoroughly investigated by everybody who felt an interest in it, and passed, as has been stated, by a vote of 110 to 13.

It was twenty-two times before the House and Senate, and occupied over thirty-nine columns of the Globe in its discussions.

In the preparation of the bill presented by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, and it was a very able report; by the bill of Mr. KELLEY; by the bill of Mr. Hooper; by the substitute of Mr. Hooper—on every occasion that matter came up before the House of Representatives and before the Senate, that dollar of 412½ grains was omitted and its omission explained when the reason was demanded. In the bills presented by Mr. Hooper it was proposed to coin a dollar of 384 grains, as I said before, but that was eventually dropped out and the trade-dollar inserted in its stead.

I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, it is due in justice to the memory of the dead and in justice to the living—it is due to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] not here to-day, that it should be stated on this floor that this bill, in the last session of Congress in which it was investigated, came before the Congress of the United States more than twenty times, and that the very question under discussion now was then explained by Mr. KELLEY and Mr. Hooper as fully as possible. It must be remembered that they stated very clearly the reason why it was that the dollar of 412½ grains was omitted. It was explained in the Senate by Mr. SHERMAN and others, and the whole country had this matter under consideration for more than two years, and at the end of that time came to the conclusion the silver dollar should be demonetized. I say, therefore, it is due to the memory of the dead—Mr. Hooper—and in justice to my living colleague who never does things surreptitiously, that this explanation should be made, that it was not done fraudulently, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has said. And his remarks are an unjust aspersion upon the frankness and fairness of gentlemen formerly and now upon this floor. I trust he will recall when he comes to look over the whole of the record in the Congressional Globe the charge he has made against upright and honorable men as fully and amply as he has made it.

Now, in regard to the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] of which he has been speaking, I can imagine no legislation which this House can undertake that would be more disastrous to the interests of the country than the passage of that very bill. It would change the existing relations of debtor and creditor all over the country. It would change every contract, public and private, in the land, whether written or verbal. And, more than that, it would be the most fatal blow which ever was struck at the credit of the nation. It is a proposition, in the first place, which would defraud the laborer of his wages, and it would give the bonanza silver miners four or five million dollars a year of additional profit on the product of their mines. It would take from the laboring-man 15 to 20 per cent. of his hard-earned daily wages and transfer it to the pockets of another.

It would, besides that, as I said awhile ago, strike down the credit of the nation. And we have to remember that if this bill passes we say to the national creditor: "We propose to pay you, principal and interest, at the rate of eighty-five cents on the dollar." And I may remark that there are yet remaining nearly $1,000,000,000 of 6 per cents that we want to change into 5 per cents. But with this threat hanging over them, that we intend to repudiate the obligations of the Government to the extent of 15 per cent., we will never be able to induce a bondholder to change another bond from a 6 per cent. to a 5 per cent. loan.

There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the House. The great plea that has been made about this matter is that we are entitled to pay in silver because at the time the contract was made we had a silver currency. If that argument be good, I ask the House to remember this fact: that since 1873 we have had but one standard of currency, and that was the gold standard; and since that time we have changed $300,000,000 nearly—I think $286,043,000 of 6 per cents and $13,957,000 of the 5 per cents of 1858 into the 5 per cent. loan. We have changed that amount of 6 per cents down to 5 per cents; and under the argument which they want to invoke, the principal and interest of those $300,000,000 of bonds must therefore be paid in gold; and yet by this bill it is provided that all the debts of the country, public and private, whatever they may have been, whenever they may have been contracted, shall be paid in whatever currency the debtor may choose to impose upon the creditor.

And more than all it is intended to impose upon the people of the country in their ordinary avocations of life a currency which is sixteen times as heavy and inconvenient as the one we have to-day. When a man has an obligation of a thousand dollars or more to pay he can now put the amount in gold in his pocket, if the debt be payable in gold, and carry it to his creditor. But if he has to pay it in silver he will have to carry the amount with him on a wheelbarrow or a wagon. It is a long step backward in financial economy. It therefore seems to me that this is to substitute for a convenient currency a very inconvenient and cumbrous one. And it is at the same time saying to the nations of the world that, "Inasmuch as you have trusted us to reduce your loans from 6 per cent. to 5 per cent., we intend to shave another 1 per cent. off and pay you in depreciated silver." The nation cannot afford to adopt such a policy; it would be ruinous in the end.

Many members called for the regular order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, how much of the hour is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has five minutes of his time remaining, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] fifteen minutes.

Mr. KASSON. I am not disposed to occupy any more time unless the gentleman from New York desires further debate.

Mr. COX. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT,] who desires to make a request of the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask leave to print in the RECORD some remarks upon this question.

Mr. MEADE. I ask the same privilege for myself. [See Appendix.]

There was no objection, and leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. I do not propose myself to occupy any further time, but yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] after which I will call for a vote.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, but little can be said in two minutes. I would like more. Two hours would not be time enough in which to discuss the momentous question of restoring the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar.

Mr. Speaker, my esteemed friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] at great length and detail, has just given the House what he claims is the legislative history of the repeal of that satisfactory law first enacted in the days of Alexander Hamilton and continued without complaint from the people till 1873, and under which silver in dollars had been honored in payment of all debts both public and private.

Sir, I wish to remind my friend that with all his research he has not found, or at least if he has found he has not reported to the House, a single sentence, word, or syllable disclosing a purpose to repeal, change, or modify the laws relating to the legal tender of any coin; no word of debate, no printed bill, no report of any committee, nor no journal of the proceedings of either House.

Sir, all that he states about this matter may be, and no doubt is, correct; and yet it may likewise be true that no repealing clause was ever in any of the bills he mentions. Those were all bills relating to mines and mining, and to the coinage laws, and the mints of the United States. He has not shown that any of them contained the repealing clause as to the legal tender of the silver dollar.

The bill that was passed was a long one, containing many sections about coinage and mints, and was reported by the chairman of the committee as a substitute, and was most likely not printed.

Mr. ATKINS. Was the substitute read?

Mr. FORT. And the substitute was not read. I charge it here until I am otherwise convinced that it is probable that at no time was the question ever discussed before the Senate or House; and was passed in this House in less than twenty minutes after it was brought in, without time or opportunity to learn its provisions. And I wish further to remind my friend that, no matter what he may claim as having happened here, the people were not consulted about the matter. I would remind him that so far as I can learn not a single newspaper in the United States ever advocated any such measure. And if he knows of a single paper that ever hinted at such a thing I now pause for him to arise and name it. And I would further remind my friend that no public assemblage of the people ever so resolved, and that no public speaker from the stump or elsewhere in this entire country ever advanced any such proposition; and if he knows of any such I now pause for him to mention the occasion.

Ay, sir, the people never dreamed that such things were happening, that such a stupendous wrong was being done to them.

Sir, no question involving so many millions of dollars to the country has been transformed into law since peace made the great war loans unnecessary. And yet, as I claim and believe, it was not openly and fully considered; and not over one in a thousand ever knew of the mischievous act until startled by its discovery when the Revised Statutes were published. And for one I demand in the name of the people I represent that the law shall first be re-instated as it was, and then it will be time to consider whether we should appoint a learned commission to consider the relative value of gold and silver.

My respected friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has sent to the Clerk's desk to have spread upon the record a document prepared in London, as I understood him. I do not care to take lessons in finance from such teachers just now. Their interests are not our interests.

Mr. Speaker, I said the other day when I occupied the floor a few minutes upon this question that the history of the repeal of that venerable law handed down to us from the fathers might never be written, and some may wish that it never would be.

I do not believe my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] ever did know anything about it except what he has stated here; but, sir, if the history of this repeal shall ever be fully written, I fear it will be found that a certain English gentleman, resident of London, was the author of the scheme. I know nothing about the matter of my own knowledge, and do not state it as a fact or in any way vouch for it, but am informed that this representative of our creditors in London came to Washington, spent the winter here, and was in close counsel with the author of this repeal, and in all probability he drew the section of the bill himself. The money lords of London commanded and we in humility and in silence bowed low and obeyed. [Cries of "That is so!" "Good!"]

Mr. KASSON. Who was it? Who was the man?

Mr. FORT. You will find out when the history is written.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COX. The debate has taken a course not intended. Nobody intended to discuss the bill of the gentleman from Missouri in connection with this resolution. It does not necessarily follow that the resolution which I reported should antagonize his proposition.

This is a proposition looking to inquiry and information and report, and I trust that the vote will now be taken upon the adoption of the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and on a division there were—ayes 15, noes 135.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken on agreeing to the concurrent resolution; and on a division there were—ayes 132, noes 31.

So the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. EDEN, (at seven o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorials, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Remonstrance of J. D. Stephenson and others, owners and ship-masters interested in coasters and the coasting trade of the Pacific coast, against the adoption of the amendments proposed to the United States shipping act of 1872 by House bill No. 654, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a paper relating to the claim of Thomas J. Sherwood for amount paid by him for clerk hire while acting as postmaster at Marysville, California, to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of Rénauld, François & Co. and others, against any increase of the duty on champagne wines, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of California, asking that Congress take such steps as will secure the release of Edward O'Meagher Condon, confined in a British prison, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of O. Streshley and several hundred other citizens of California, for the establishment of a post-route between Susanville and Dorris Bridge, Modoc County, California, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, memorial of W. S. Powell and others, that the homestead laws be so amended as to secure persons in their titles who have purchased lands from soldiers who entered said lands under the provisions of the homestead laws, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of W. R. Wheaton, against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1760) relative to homestead entries, to the same committee.

Also, remonstrance of F. W. Watson and 100 others, against the passage of the bill confirming title to the Albion Grant, Mendocino County, California, to the same committee.

By Mr. THOMAS: The petition of John W. Dougherty, James M. Roberts, and James T. Taylor, for compensation for the schooner Chesapeake Trader, lost while in the United States service, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, August 7, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in relation to the death of General Custer, which I ask may be read and placed upon the journal of the Senate, as requested in the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution H. R. No. 395.

Whereas General G. A. Custer has endeared himself to the people of the frontier of Texas and elsewhere by his bold and dashing operations against the Indians; and whereas the news of his late sudden death while in discharge of his dangerous duties is received: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That we tender our sincere condolence to the family of the deceased and to the people of our suffering frontier, and that the governor be requested to forward a copy of this joint resolution to our Senators and Members of Congress, with the request that the same be spread upon the Journals of Congress, and a copy of the same be forwarded to the family of the deceased.

Approved July 28, 1876.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
Department of State.

I, A. W. De Berry, secretary of state for the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original enrolled H. J. R. No. 395 passed by the fifteenth Legislature of the State of Texas, and now on file in this department.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed the seal of State, at the city of Austin, this the 1st day of August, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] A. W. DE BERRY,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed, if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 994) to amend section 2931 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow repayment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the tonnage tax where it has been exacted in contravention of treaty provisions, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Louis Rose, asking compensation for the value of certain wharf property in San Diego, California, alleged to have been taken possession of by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1034) for the relief of Louis Rose.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 154) for the relief of Louis Rose and other persons claiming title to lands within the lines of the military reservation at San Diego, California, recommended its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 400) amendatory of the fifth section of the act of the 18th of May, 1872, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

REDEMPTION OF TAX LANDS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 84) extending the time for the redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes, to report it back to the Senate; and, as the amendment is a mere pro forma amendment and the bill has now passed both Houses and will take only the time of reading, I ask that it may be acted upon.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was, in lines 3 and 4 of the bill, to strike out the words "within which lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes may be redeemed" and in lieu thereof insert "limited for the redemption of direct-tax lands by the act entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes,' approved June 8, 1872;" so as to read:

That the time limited for the redemption of direct-tax lands by the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 8, 1872, be, and is hereby, extended to the 1st day of February, 1877; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How often has the time been already extended?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know; either once or twice before; but there can be no objection to extending it further. The only doubt we had was as to the amendment proposed by the House. We have examined it carefully and find that it is a mere formal, unimportant matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator state the ground of any further extension after so long a period of time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that in the condition of affairs in the Southern States cases have arisen where parties have not been able, from actual poverty, to redeem lands held by the Government, which were sold for taxes. The Government does not want the lands and does not want to deprive the people of their lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Government wants the money, the tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Government wants the money. This bill authorizes these people when they can pay the tax and arrest the penalty, &c., to redeem the land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is for how long a period of time?

Mr. SHERMAN. To the 1st of February next is all the extension, under this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope this will be the last time.

The amendment was concurred in.

WAR CLAIMS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. DAVIS. On Friday morning last the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. WRIGHT] made an adverse report upon the bill (S. No. 403) to re-imburse the State of West Virginia for losses incurred by reason of the destruction of its bridges, court-houses, schoolhouses, churches, turnpike-roads, and other public property by Federal troops during the late war. After consultation with the Senator from Iowa, I move that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that being done.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID W. STOCKSTILL.

Mr. THURMAN. The House of Representatives passed a bill (H. R. No. 1183) for the relief of David W. Stockstill, of Sidney, Ohio. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and on the 21st of last month was reported adversely. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that that vote may be reconsidered, and that the bill, with the additional testimony that has just been furnished and that I hold in my hand, may be again referred to that committee. It can only be done by unanimous consent, two days having expired, and I hope it will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none. The bill will be recommitted, with the additional testimony.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the Houston, Trinity and Tyler Railroad Company of Texas have leave to withdraw the petition and papers connected with their claim now on file before the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there an adverse report in the case?

Mr. MAXEY. No, sir. The case has not been acted upon, as I understand. The purpose is to get the papers out and systematize them. It is too late to do anything at this stage of the session.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be no resolutions——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one thing while I have the floor. I shall regard it as a very great personal favor, for reasons which I need not state at this time, if I can have the attention of the Senate this morning, after resolutions are through, to House bill No. 3359, known as the southern claims bill. It is a matter that is particularly pressing upon me. I think we can dispose of it in twenty minutes. After the morning business is through, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill, if I can get the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought of introducing a resolution, but I will not do it if my friend from Iowa wants to get the floor, for it might lead to some debate. But I think my friend from Iowa ought not to take the floor every morning from us on special reports from his committee. On the last occasion when I endeavored to get up the joint resolution about the monitor Tecumseh and the remains of the sailors there, the vessel being liable to be blown up at anytime by the claimants, I was rather squeezed out by my friend from Iowa, who interposed a bill a very good bill; and now he wants another passed. I want to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, as soon as a quorum is present, which I do not believe exists at this moment, and I do not wish to do any business without a quorum, to take up that resolution. I give notice that I shall ask unanimous consent, and if I cannot get it I think it will be my duty to try to secure the consent of a majority under the circumstances, because the loss of the day might result in suffering.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to state at this time, if my friend from Vermont will pardon me, that if he will allow me to take up the bill to which I have referred I will give way and let him have the joint resolution considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will be just as courteous as my friend. If he will allow me to get up the joint resolution and pass it, I will give way with the greatest satisfaction.

Mr. PADDOCK. It does not seem to me that there is anything like a quorum present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall ask a division when the Senator from Iowa makes his motion, and then we shall find out how that fact is.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes.

The question being put, there were on a division ayes 20.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to appeal once more to the Senate, it is all that I can do, not to take up this bill, to which I have no opposition so far as I know, until they can give us an opportunity to dispose of the matter of the wrecked monitor.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will dispose of that as soon as we get through with the claims bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As soon as we get through with the claims bill then there will be something else. I only want to ask the Senate not to vote to take this bill up until after we take up the joint resolution.

Mr. WEST. What is the joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The joint resolution I am seeking to get up and wish to have the Senate act upon is about the monitor Tecumseh that is in momentary danger of being blown to pieces and the remains of a hundred and fifty officers and sailors scattered over the bottom of Mobile Bay. The resolution is to prevent that, and the Senate ought to act upon it; but if the Senate chooses to go on with the other bill instead of doing this, my duty will be done.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not want to antagonize the business of the Senator from Vermont, and I will yield with the understanding that I can have my bill taken up when the Senate gets through with the joint resolution. I know it will take but a few moments, and rather than have any delay here I will waive for the present my motion with the understanding that my bill can be acted upon immediately after.

THE WRECK OF THE TECUMSEH.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will submit the motion, and then the Chair can count the Senate, to take up the Tecumseh resolution. I do not wish to do it unless the Chair sees there is a quorum. I do not think we ought to act without a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (after a pause.) Thirty-six Senators are present, which is a quorum. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) in reference to the wreck of the United States monitor Tecumseh.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution which was reported from the Commitee on the Judiciary, with an amendment to strike out the preamble and all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to return and tender to the party claiming to have purchased the United States monitor Tecumseh the sum of fifty dollars, with interest at 6 per cent. added from August 7, 1873, to the day of the tender; said sum of fifty dollars being the sum paid by James E. Slaughter on what purported to be the sale of said monitor, then lying in Mobile Bay.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, directed to assume the control and protection of said monitor, and he is authorized to dispose of the same to the party who paid said money or his assigns on just terms, providing in such disposition for the removal from said monitor and the proper burial of the remains of the persons carried down when she sank, such removal from the said monitor and burial to be under the protection and supervision of the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] is not present on whose objection the joint resolution went over four or five days or a week ago when I reported it; but we have all the facts, and in the state of public business I do not feel justified in letting it wait any further for him. He has made no further communication to me on the subject, but it is due to him to say, and I say publicly, here that I felt obliged to call it up now, whether he is present or not.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3359.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to make a report from the special committee on the late election in Mississippi.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, and having proceeded for some time was interrupted by Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to inquire whether it is the special wish of any Senator here to have the report read and the time of the Senate taken up?

Mr. MORTON. I hope that the report will be read.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust that my friend will waive the reading and allow me to get up the claims bill, a bill that I have been pressing and for which I had the floor. There are several reasons why I am exceedingly anxious to have the bill out of the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to further suspending the reading of the report?

Mr. MORTON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. This report comes from the majority of the committee. As a member of the committee I was made acquainted with the fact of the existence of this report at about a quarter of eleven o'clock to-day, half an hour ago, when for the first time this paper was placed in my hand by the chairman in the committee-room. I was notified at my residence this morning at ten o'clock that the committee would make their report at half past ten to-day. I do not know whether it has been the custom of the Senate when a report is submitted unaccompanied by any bill or measure or based upon any matter before the Senate that it should be read at length. My reason for making this statement is that the views of the minority, which by intimation we were told it would be necessary for us to present, are in my hand and ready to be presented, but are necessarily imperfect in this, that the testimony taken in the case some six weeks ago in Mississippi has not yet been printed; and as it was the design of the two members who form the minority that we should not make a personal assertion of any fact, but sustain them by the sworn testimony of the witnesses, detailed in our presence, I had supposed that the evidence would be presented in order that it could be incorporated as the basis of the report made. The withholding of the testimony has, however, rendered this impossible; and although the facts are firmly fixed in my memory, yet I do not wish to base any allegation upon my mere recollection, but produce the sworn language of the witnesses, I submit whether it would not be well to forego the reading of but one side of so grave a question as this until the other can also be presented in the same way, when for the presentation of that other side there has not been yet the possibility of an opportunity.

Therefore it is that I trust the reading of this report, which the minority have never yet had an opportunity to examine—I do not put it, however, on that ground—should be suspended until the views of the majority and the minority can be presented together. I may say, moreover, that there has been no laches on the part of the minority, but we have proceeded just as fast and even in advance of the furnishing to them of the printed testimony in the case.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What the honorable Senator from Delaware states is correct in regard to the testimony, and I may say that the majority of the committee anticipated a little the time when it was their purpose to present the report, under the expectation that Congress would soon adjourn. I desire, what I think will be agreeable to the Senate, that the minority of the committee should have an opportunity to present their report and have it read, if they desire to have it read, or if any of their friends desire to have it read.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator desire to have his report read.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no desire about that.

Mr. BAYARD. I only think that the whole story should go together and that a fair opportunity should be given to me for the purpose of letting the minority views appear with his report and in reasonable time. I will state here to the Senate that I hold the proof-sheets with amendments made as far as the testimony printed would permit me to do it of what as I have already stated is ready to be presented to the Senate; but it is not yet in a condition to be read as the prepared report of the committee, which, as I say, none of the minority had any knowledge of the contents of until it was handed to me at quarter to eleven o'clock this morning. I submit therefore that the further reading of this report be for the time being suspended until the views of the minority can also be prepared so as to be read, which I assure the Senate will not be long delayed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that his views may be read to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. If I can have proofs of our views returned by to-morrow, I shall have no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to its being postponed until to-morrow, but I want the report read.

Mr. BOUTWELL. One remark I desire to make. I do not suppose the Senator from Delaware intended to have the Senate understand that there was anything unfair in the majority of the committee in regard to the submission of the report.

Mr. BAYARD. It was because I wished to acquit the Senate of that, that I do not want an unfair thing done now.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly. I hope it will be agreed that the Senator from Delaware may complete his report and present it and have it read when it is finished.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I ask that the reading of this report be suspended until that can be done. Both should go before the country together.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to suggest the propriety of having this whole matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. I submit to the Senate whether it is usual on the occasion of a long report of this kind to have it read in full in the Senate, or whether it is not in almost all cases furnished to us in print that we may read it for ourselves. It is simply a question of time, and I think also a question of justice, to ask that both sides of the case shall be heard.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Suppose we let the reading of this go over until to-morrow? We can have it taken up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being the general understanding, it will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, Mr. President, I desire to present on behalf of myself and my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD,] our views as the minority of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both will go over until to-morrow.

PAYMENT OF SOUTHERN CLAIMS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3359.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was after line 36 of section 1 to insert:

Provided, That no payment be made to or on account of the said John M. Brown until settlement be made of any indebtedness due or owing from him to the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have an amendment at the close of the bill which will cover that, and therefore I ask that those words be stricken out.

The amendment was rejected.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Claims was in line 215 of section 1, to strike out "Joy" and insert "Ivy;" so as to make the clause read:

To William R. Ivy, $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 247 of section 1, to strike out "McGahee" and insert "McGehee;" so as to make the clause read:

To Valentine M. McGehee, administrator, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 456 and 457 of section 1, as follows:

To David R. Godwin, $35,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 457 of section 1 to insert:

To Maria L. Haurut, $7,010.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out line 471 of section 1, as follows:

To Maria L. Haurut, $7,010.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 495 and 496 of section 1, as follows:

To Janetta Carter, widow of Armsted Carter, deceased, $1,275.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 501 of section 1, to strike out "nine" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

To Martha Crane, guardian of Anna R., Catharine M., and Clara Crane, heirs of Robert F. Crane, deceased, $1,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 540 of section 1, to strike out "Lina" and insert "Sina;" so as to make the clause read:

To Sina D. Nabors, $200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 621 of section 1, to strike out "Broxton" and insert "Braxton;" so as to make the clause read:

To Braxton Lankford, $150.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 657 of section 1, to strike out "Woodward" and insert "Woodard;" so as to make the clause read:

To James A. Woodard, $120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 677 of section 1, to strike out "Betsey" and insert "Betty;" so as to make the clause read:

To Betty Deese, $38.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 690 of section 1, to strike out "Strumpert" and insert "Shumpert;" so as to make the clause read:

To Joseph Shumpert, $327.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 987 of section 1, after the word "Cooper" to insert "of P.;" so as to make the clause read:

To John Cooper of P., $473.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust there will be no objection to proceeding with and finishing this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How near done is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading is on page 48. There are three pages yet to be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go on subject to a call for the regular order at any moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was to strike out lines 1167 and 1168 of section 1, as follows:

To Augustus and Frederick Schneider, $1,645.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is a mistake. The amendment ought not to be concurred in.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line 1172, after "George A.," to insert "James P.;" so as to read:

To Anne, George A., James P., and Jane F. Slight, heirs of Robert Slight, deceased, $980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1207, to insert the words "and three" after "hundred;" so as to read:

To John Utz, $303.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1228, to strike out "Wise" and insert "Wire;" so as to read:

To Peter Wire, $387.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 2, to strike out "Nathaniel P. Harben" and insert "David R. Godwin, Augustus and Frederick Schneider."

Mr. WRIGHT. That ought to be modified by leaving the amendment as it is, except that the words "Augustus and Frederick Schneider" ought not to be included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. WRIGHT. "David R. Godwin" will remain as it is. It is to be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be regarded as agreed to in the modified form.

Mr. WRIGHT. The second section ought to read:

That the cases of Robert S. Lacey, Hampton N. Webb, William H. Brisby, David R. Godwin, and Robert Hoodenpyle be recommitted, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, beginning in line 11, to strike out the following words:

And the following proviso be inserted in line 35, page 2, after the word "cents:" Provided, That no payment be made to or on account of the said John M. Brown until settlement be made of any indebtedness lawfully and equitably due from him to the United States and evidenced by judgment duly recovered against him by the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have three amendments to offer. I move to amend by inserting between lines 1207 and 1208 of section 1 the following:

To Gilbert Vanderwerken, $16,414.35.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following amendment: Insert between lines 308 and 309 of section 1:

To John Campbell, administrator of the estate of Stephen S. Springer, deceased, $9,225.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following as a third section to the bill:

SEC. 3. That before paying any person in this act named the sum herein appropriated to him, it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to ascertain whether such person is indebted or in arrears in any manner to the United States, and there shall be paid to such person only such part of the sum in this act appropriated to him as is in excess of such liability or indebtedness.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I move to amend the bill on page 2, after line 37, by inserting:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct from the amount directed to be paid to John M. Brown the sum of $6,339.80, being the balance of principal due the United States on a certain judgment obtained in the United States circuit court of Alabama on the 17th day of April, 1867, against said Brown for $8,233.80, as surety for C. M. Godbold, late United States marshal, and upon which there has been paid the sum of $1,914, the net proceeds of sale of land under execution issued on said judgement; and there shall be deducted further all costs due on said judgment, and no further deduction than said balance of principal and costs shall be made from said amount by the Secretary of the Treasury on account of indebtedness of said Brown to the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest whether that amendment would be in order. There has been no reference of it to the committee; and this is in the nature of an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no wish to take up time. I will only say that that whole subject was considered by the committee, and we have a general provision instructing the accounting officers what to do when they come to pay this money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does it cover the deduction of what is due to the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; that whole subject is covered by an amendment I offered. I trust this matter will not be taken up now.

Mr. WEST. I ask for the reading of the general provision as offered by the committee as an amendment to the bill requiring the accounting officers to withhold the payment when an individual is indebted to the United States.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment offered as section 3.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not think that covers the case. The object of my amendment is to deduct a judgment.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama why, when there is a general provision for deducting all sums due to the United States, there should be a special one to deduct so much and no more from one?

Mr. SPENCER. I will explain to the Senator from New York the reason why I offered the amendment. It is the understanding and belief that the United States charges interest but will not allow interest. The object of stating this specifically is that the United States shall have interest and that the claimant also shall have interest on this claim.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let us have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, and it may be so far as other members are concerned, we have no evidence before us of any such judgment as is referred to.

Mr. WRIGHT. This very name was considered by the committee, and rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the general provision is ample.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think so. Let us have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the bill as it now stands amended covers only those claims which were recommended by the commission?

Mr. WRIGHT. Only those claims, nothing beyond those; and some of them are recommitted for reconsideration.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution to print extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That to enable the Joint Committee on Public Printing to carry out the provisions of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government approved July 31, 1876, directing an inquiry into the question of the public printing, it is authorized to send for persons and papers, to employ and examine experts, and to administer oaths; and the expenses of such examination shall be paid from the contingent fund of the two Houses, one-half from each House, to be paid upon the certificates of the chairmen of the two Houses respectively.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether he had not better give authority to employ a stenographer if it becomes necessary.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; put in that amendment—

And to employ a stenographer.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator that he had better make that resolution a bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; let it be put in the form of a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so changed.

Mr. SHERMAN. A concurrent resolution would do.

Mr. ANTHONY. But it makes an appropriation out of the contingent fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can make an appropriation out of the contingent fund without a law.

Mr. DAWES. A concurrent resolution would not answer. It would require a law to take the contingent fund of the two Houses. I reported a bill from the Committee on Contingent Expenses the other day to meet precisely such a case in regard to the Chinese Immigration Committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make no objection at all.

Mr. DAWES. The contingent fund of the Senate seems to be guarded a little differently from that of the House, and it has been found by experience that in several instances investigations of this kind have been balked.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can see the point the Senator makes.

The bill (S. No. 1035) to provide for paying the expenses of the Joint Committee on Printing in making an inquiry in relation to the public printing was read twice and considered as in Committe of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill on its third reading be read in full as it will stand.

The bill was read the third time at length, as follows:

That to enable the Joint Committee on Public Printing to carry out the provisions of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government approved July 31, 1876, directing an inquiry into the questions of the public printing, the said joint committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to employ and examine experts, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer; and the expenses of such examination shall be paid from the contingent fund of the two Houses, one-half from each House, to be paid upon the certificates of the chairmen of the two Houses respectively.

Mr. DAWES. It occurs to me to make an inquiry in this connection. The Senate will recollect that two or three of these commissions in reference to salaries are in existing bills which have passed, one in reference to the Army and one in regard to one other subject. How are they going to be paid unless a bill is passed in reference to each one or all put in one?

Mr. LOGAN. In the Army bill we appropriated for that commission.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; I was not aware of that.

The bill was passed.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I called attention the other day to what seemed to me a defect in the sundry civil bill, with regard to the office of Congressional Printer, and I thought that it abolished an office which did not exist and left the Congressional Printer still in office; but the Committee on Appropriations, to which the matter was referred, reported that the law of this year was in conformity and in consistency with the law of 1874, which reads in the eighteenth volume of the statutes:

Provided, That so much of the act entitled "An act providing for the election of Congressional Printer," approved February 22, 1867, as provides for the election of such officer by the Senate, and provides that such officer shall be deemed an officer of the Senate, shall cease and determine and become of no effect from and after the date of the first vacancy occurring in said office; that the title of said officer shall hereafter be Public Printer, and he shall be deemed an officer of the United States, and said office shall be filled by appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

This proviso provides that "hereafter"— that is, from the date of the approval of this act—"the title of said officer shall be Public Printer." The title of the office has been Congressional Printer; he has been recognized as such by all the Departments of the Government; and upon examining the roll in the State Department it appears that the word "hereafter" should be "thereafter," and it is in the roll "thereafter." The print of volume 18 of the Revised Statutes is not a copy of the roll. I call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to that fact, but I do not suppose it is necessary to make a formal reference of the matter. It seems to me that the office of Public Printer or Congressional Printer is in a very singular quandary.

Mr. DAWES. How about that vacancy?

Mr. ANTHONY. A vacancy was created by the act which has just passed.

Mr. DAWES. The act just passed put an end to the office.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all right now. A vacancy has occurred and the officer is now called Public Printer.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that I understand the Senator from Rhode Island distinctly. Did he say the roll had the word "thereafter" instead of "hereafter?"

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. The report of the Committee on Appropriations was based on the language of the statute, and did not go back to an examination of the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY. The language of the statute is inconsistent with itself, and that prompted an examination of the roll, because, if the word "hereafter" was the proper word in the statute, then the office of Congressional Printer ceased two years ago.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4064) to repeal the resumption-day clause in the resumption act of 1875; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3025) providing for the sale of Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a commission consisting of three Senators, three members of the House of Representatives, and experts not exceeding three in number, to inquire into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver, the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country, the policy of continuing legal-tender notes concurrently with the metallic standards, &c., and the best means of providing for facilitating the resumption of specie payments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 413) establishing the port of Saint Paul, Minnesota, as a port of appraisal; and

A bill (S. No. 866) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas H. Williams, of Maryland.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill that has just come from the House referred and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 4064) to repeal the resumption-day clause in the resumption act of 1875; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that that bill be read at length.

The bill was read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. I move that the concurrent resolution of the House also be referred and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and experts, not exceeding three in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, and to take evidence; and whose duty it shall be to inquire—

First, into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver; the causes thereof; whether permanent or otherwise; the effects thereof upon trade, commerce, finance, and productive interests of the country, and upon the standard value in this and foreign countries;

Second, into the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country, and, if restored, what the legal relation between the two coins, silver and gold, should be;

Third, into the policy of continuing legal-tender notes concurrently with the metallic standards, and the effects thereof upon the labor, industries, and wealth of the country; and

Fourth, into the policy and best means of providing for facilitating the resumption of specie payments.

And said commission is authorized to employ a stenographer, and shall report on or before the 15th day of January, 1877, with the evidence taken by them and such recommendations for legislation as they may deem proper.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to have the concurrent resolution of the House in reference to the sixteenth amendment referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and in making that motion I want to say one word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The people of this country are sincerely and profoundly in earnest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will allow it to be read at the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and it was read twice, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following be proposed to the several States of the Union as an amendment to the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any State for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, or any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect or denomination; nor shall any moneys so raised or lands so devoted be divided between religious sects or denominations. This article shall not vest, enlarge, or diminish legislative power in the Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the people of our country are seriously and profoundly in earnest on this subject. This amendment, as the Senate will see, prohibits the appropriation of any school funds to any school that is under control of any sect or denomination, and prohibits the division of such fund among different denominations. So far it is very well as a pronunciamiento; but suppose that a State for the purpose of propitiating some religious denomination does make an appropriation in violation of this amendment, what are we to do about it? The amendment is a mere brutum fulmen; it has no sanction and there is no one to enforce it. If the power was given to Congress by legislation to enforce the amendment, we could make it a high crime for any officer to pay or for any one to receive the money, or we could by legislation appoint some official, possibly the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it should be to bring the violation to the attention of the courts. The only remedy now under the amendment, and I do not know whether that could be without further legislation, would be for a tax-payer to seek the courts and after the money had been paid and spent, and after tedious years perhaps the tax-payer might recover his contribution to that fund. Therefore it seems to me that another section should be added giving Congress the power to enforce this amendment.

But there is a more serious objection to the amendment than that I have noticed. The amendment only applies to a school fund and prohibits its being appropriated to schools under denominational control. There is not a word in the amendment that prohibits public money from being appropriated to theological seminaries, to reformatories, to monasteries, to nunneries, to houses of the Good Shepherd, and many kindred purposes. We know that in one State within a decade $1,200,000 was voted Protestant institutions for which the Catholics of the country were taxed, and we know that in the same period several millions of dollars were voted to Catholic institutions for which Protestants were taxed.

Besides, sir, even in reference to schools this amendment only prohibits appropriating the school fund to denominational schools. It does not by any means forbid appropriations from the Treasury generally even to denominational schools.

I call the attention of the Senate thus briefly to this subject.

The amendment should cover the whole subject. I propose a substitute to be referred to the committee with the pending resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's substitute will be read.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator before the substitute is read to allow the Secretary to read again the latter part of the amendment. I refer to the words as to "moneys so raised." Let the Secretary read that clause again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any moneys so raised or lands so devoted be divided between religious sects or denominations.

Mr. CONKLING. The words "so raised," as I understand, refer to money raised for school purposes by taxation and to lands devoted in the same way, and to nothing else.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey proposes a substitute.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me a moment? I wish to go to a conference committee and I want to submit a substitute for this. I will make no remarks, but have a substitute that I desire to offer.

Mr. CONKLING. The substitute of the Senator from New Jersey has not been read.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] will first be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. No State shall make any law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no public property and no money raised by taxation in any State, Territory, or District, or derived from public lands, or other public source, shall be appropriated to any school, educational, or other institution that is under the control of any religious sect or denomination; and no such appropriation shall be made to any religious sect or denomination or to promote its interests; nor shall any public money, land, or property be divided between religious sects or denominations.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute proposed by the Senator from California will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. There shall be maintained in each State and Territory a system of free common schools; but neither the United States nor any State, or Territory, county, or municipal corporation shall aid in the support of any school wherein the peculiar tenets of any religious denomination shall be taught.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that the people are in earnest on this question; but whoever may be the father of the provision contained in this joint resolution and proposed to be made a part of the Constitution, if he really meant to meet the evil, I do not think he ought to be at all proud of his offspring. The defects in the resolution have not been fully pointed out, and I will proceed to read the resolution as it passed the House and is sent here, and it will be seen that there is a defect in it to which the attention of the Senate has not yet been called:

No State shall make any law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof—

Thus far it is simply imposing on the States what the Constitution already imposes on the United States, and that is all correct—and no money raised by taxation in any State—

For what purpose, now? I call attention to the limitation—

no money raised by taxation in any State for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor—

That is, a public fund for public schools—

nor any public lands devoted thereto—

That is devoted to public schools—shall ever be under the control of any religious sect; nor shall any moneys so raised or lands so devoted—

Limited all the way to the public schools—

be divided among religious sects or denominations.

It simply prohibits, after a fund has been raised for public schools or after lands have been devoted to public-school purposes, the diversion of that fund or those lands to sectarian schools or for the benefit of churches. That is all it does. Theological schools, schools where any particular system of religion is taught, are not the public schools; and there is no prohibition there upon the States raising any amount of money or devoting any amount of public lands to the support of private schools for instruction in the religion of any sect.

This resolution, then, prohibits the States from committing the wrong when it is attempted indirectly, but leaves the States full power to commit the same wrong whenever they choose to do it directly. There is the defect of this resolution and that is the main defect. But there is another defect. It simply prohibits the States from doing these things; it does not prohibit the United States; and under the Constitution of the United States, as it now stands, it is entirely competent to devote lands or impose taxes and appropriate money for sectarian purposes. The amendment, therefore, which should be submitted to meet this entire evil ought to cover the whole ground: it ought to prohibit the Federal Government, as well as the State governments, from doing anything of this kind. I prepared on Saturday last a substitute which I propose to offer and have sent to the committee, which covers the entire ground. It is true I have said nothing in it prohibiting a division, because the language used prohibiting an appropriation or donation for any such purpose covers this ground and would prevent a division if it were raised for public-school purposes; it would prevent a diversion, and as I may wish to make a remark or two on this as I proceed I will read the substitute. The first clause is the same as that which passed the House.

No State shall make any law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof—

nor shall Congress nor any State raise by taxation, donate, or appropriate any money or property for the support of any church or religious society, nor for the support or in aid of any theological school or seminary, or of any school or seminary teaching the peculiar religious doctrines or subject in any respect to the control or direction of any church, religious society, sect, or denomination. And no special or denominational system of religion or religious belief shall in any State or Territory or in the District of Columbia constitute any part of the course of study or instruction in any school or institution of learning supported wholly or in part by taxation or by the donation of any money or property by any State or by the United States.

This substitute, as I have said, covers the entire ground. It takes up the poisonous tree by the root, while the resolution sent us by the House cuts off but a minor and unimportant branch. I will send the substitute to the Chair and ask to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with the resolution of the House.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to express my surprise at the reading of this resolution as it has come to us. It is very clear that you can drive an omnibus through it. All it provides is that a fund raised for the benefit of the public schools, already dedicated and set apart for that purpose, cannot be diverted to a sectarian school; but it does not prohibit a State from appropriating money out of its general treasury that was not raised for school purposes for the support of sectarian schools; and it does not prevent a State from levying an original tax for the support of sectarian schools. It simply protects a school fund raised as a general school fund dedicated for that purpose from being afterward diverted to sectarian schools, and leaves every State free to make an appropriation out of the general treasury, out of moneys raised for all purposes, to the support of sectarian schools or even to create a special tax for that purpose. It is competent, therefore, for any State to appropriate money out of the general treasury of that State for the support of Catholic schools or Protestant schools, or to levy a tax directly upon the people for that purpose. This amendment would not interfere with any legislation of that kind. I hope it will be properly amended and sent back to the other House in time to be passed, so that it may go before the States next winter.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the proposed amendments.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to discuss this matter——

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the call for a moment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to discuss the resolution at all. I do not think this is the proper time to discuss it. I have no question that the object was to remove the fear which had been raised as a bugaboo throughout the country for political purposes. The objections here raised I regard as captious and not of substance. Let the resolution go to the committee, and if it needs amendment let it be amended; but I do not believe that the criticisms which have been made here have any very good effect. The object of the resolution was to meet what was considered a defect and which has engendered a good deal of political discussion, and it has met that question fairly as the House has sent it here. If the Senate choose to adopt it, well and good. If they do not choose to adopt it, let them say so.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the various amendments proposed.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate, being the unfinished business of Saturday last, which is the resolution to print 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying document in relation to the massacre at Hamburgh.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to give notice that, if there is no other business more important or pressing, I purpose after the usual morning business to-morrow morning to call up for consideration the House bill to perfect the revision of laws.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suppose the Senator will not interfere with the disposition of the post-route bill?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is that pending?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, not pending; but it was laid on the table with the understanding that it should come up after we got through with this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, before I begin on what I was speaking about on Saturday, I wish to say, although I did not have the opportunity readily when the matter last before the Senate was disposed of, that it seems perfectly obvious from what has been stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] that the proposition that has come over to us is perfectly illusory as it stands, clearly and absolutely so. Whether that arose from a want of due consideration or from a want of disposition to go further than the House has gone, of course is left to conjecture. The presumption must be that the House has carefully considered the proposition, and this is all that it desires to do on the subject. However, that is merely in reference to what has taken place, and I do not care to enlarge upon it now.

When we left off on Saturday evening, Mr. President, we had been drawn, legitimately I admit, into a consideration of the state of affairs in the States not long since in rebellion. We had been drawn into it by a persistent and filibustering (if I may use such a phrase) opposition to taking up and acting upon a simple resolution, such as passes twenty times in every session with universal approbation, to print an extra number of copies of a public document affecting the public concern, the expense of which I am told by my friend at my right [Mr. ANTHONY] would be less than $300. It was said in opposition to it that it was an electioneering document, designed for political purposes. Mr. President, in this Republic every document that affects the welfare and interest of the people is and ought to be a political and electioneering document, because the essential idea of a Republic is that the people, every one of them, are entitled to know what the Government proposes to do, and is doing, and how public affairs are carried on, and what is "the state of the Union," as in another branch the phrase is, where they have a Committee of the Whole on that subject all the time. But, as I have said, this simple proposition to print an extra number for dissemination among the people, for their information, of a message of the President of the United States on a subject of public concern respecting an occurrence that Senators who have resorted to expedients to prevent its being acted upon say there are no words sufficient to characterize the shocking atrocity and wickedness of, is yet attempted to be "whistled down the wind" as a political and electioneering document. Are the gentlemen who oppose this proposition afraid that the intelligent people of the United States will find out the truth? Or, if these official documents do not contain the truth, are they afraid that the truth cannot be made known to them? I think that is a very extraordinary proposition to advance in this body. But out of it we have been drawn naturally and necessarily into a consideration of the condition of public affairs in the States lately in rebellion.

When I stopped on Saturday I was proceeding to show, not by any assertion of mine, but by the solemn official action of that revolutionary proceeding that inaugurated what they call a new constitution in the State of Texas, carried on by those who had been in the rebellion and in opposition to those who had resisted it, that one of the chief safeguards of republican liberty in that State, a public system of free education, had been substantially overthrown; and that, although on the solemn faith of keeping the provision of the old constitution that rebellious State was restored to the Union; not by that general faith that in admitting new States is considered to be understood and implied that they will hold on to the essential principles of the constitution we agree they may come in on; but on a special and particular provision in the act of Congress which authorized this reconstruction that the State of Texas should never alter these provisions for this free security and maintenance of public schools. I am not giving the very words, but the substance, and I am sure I do not overstate it. The reconstructed State of Texas by an ordinance of its convention agreed to that and pledged the honor—for little else could be pledged, for there is nothing between honor and force on such a question—pledged the honor of the reconstructed State of Texas that they would stand to this provision they had adopted about public schools as one of the most beneficent, wholesome, productive of all the force that could be put into operation in that State for its regeneration and improvement. And yet we find them on the first occasion when the democracy, as it is called, which of course in that country is merely another name for re-organized rebellion—the moment the democracy in that State by right or wrong gain possession of power, they resort to revolutionary and unconstitutional methods to repudiate this very provision to which their plighted faith was pledged.

But my honorable friend from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] who I am sure would not wish himself to do a thing of that kind, says that after all the new constitution is sufficiently effective, although the old one required a quarter of the general revenues of the State to be appropriated to public schools and the new constitution absolves the Legislature from any duty to appropriate a dollar; they need give nothing at all now, whereas before they were to give a quarter; and he says that this is still an efficient and good system. Upon that point I wish to read from the report of the superintendent of public instruction of the State of Texas for the scholastic year ending the 31st of August, 1875. All of his report is very suggestive and very instructive, but

I can only in the condensed way in which I wish to treat this subject refer to a few paragraphs. He says on page 25:

The honorable fourteenth Legislature failed to make an appropriation for the payment of county superintendents and school directors for the scholastic year ending August 31, 1876.

The law of Texas, as I understand, required that these public officers, who had the whole management of the public-school system in general under the State and in particular in the various localities, were entitled to certain salaries, modest and small, as will be seen by the context; and yet the democratic Legislature of the State of Texas the moment it got into power failed to make any appropriation at all to pay them the small stipend or to enable them to carry on the performance of their duties, much as in another quarter at this present time, it is said—I cannot allude to it otherwise—that a democratic body, full of reform and good works, proposes not to carry on this Government unless a good many laws shall be changed to suit their notions. He continues to say:

It becomes my duty to call attention to the justice of making an appropriation at an early day to satisfy this class of claims.

Under the law, school directors are allowed compensation at the rate of $4 per day for the time actually employed as directors, provided such employment does not exceed ten days in any one year.

That is $40 apiece salary for the whole year.

The county superintendent, in addition to his service as president of the board of school directors, is entitled to $4 per day for the time employed as county superintendent, provided the time employed in the duties of his office shall not exceed thirty days in one scholastic year.

That would be $120 a year for him.

An estimate based upon the presumption that the five directors and the county superintendent for each of the one hundred and thirty-nine counties known to have maintained public school organizations served the full time authorized by law, would give the amount of deficiency appropriation required to meet their claims as follows:

Deficiency appropriation necessary to pay directors	$27,800 00
Deficiency appropriation necessary to pay superintendents	16,680 00
Total	44,480 00

This small sum to pay the stipends of $40 at the utmost in one case and $120 in the other of the very men under whose charge and control this work must go on, the first glorious democratic Legislature of Texas declined to appropriate. They felt it to be their authority under the constitution not to carry out their existing laws, in the face of the plighted faith of that State that its constitution and the laws made under it in respect to public schools should be faithfully carried out and executed. Now he goes on to say:

Prior to March 15, 1875, the trustees of the several school districts were authorized to open schools and contract with teachers to conduct the schools for four months in the year.

Not a very heavy proportion of time, everybody will agree; there was nothing extravagant about that.

The amount of salary was not limited by law, but left to the discretion of the school trustees.

Boards of school directors, under the law in force prior to the date above mentioned, were empowered to levy such deficiency tax as might be necessary to meet the liabilities thus created by the trustees.

Prior to the time, however, when the boards of school directors had levied the tax to meet the liabilities, the public schools had, in general, been taught for the time required by law, and warrants had been issued, payable out of the school tax when the same might be levied and collected.

That is to say, they had got the school-teachers to go it on tick in order to give them the public schools, and would have the tax assessed afterward.

On the 15th of March, 1875, the Legislature passed a law limiting the power of the boards of school directors, to the extent that under no circumstances after said date could they levy a tax greater than ½ of 1 per cent. in any school district, for the payment of teachers, in any scholastic year.

By which little democratic performance the school-teachers were left without their pay.

The passage of this law, therefore—deprived the directors of the power to provide for the payment of liabilities created under the law.

He says—

It will be seen that in the counties reporting there appears to be owing to the teachers for the scholastic year ending August 31, 1875, the sum of $50,598. These debts are local debts due from the school districts to the teachers; and, unless the Legislature make some provision for the payment of these liabilities in the districts by a special tax, the teachers who earned their salaries under one law are deprived of their only resource for pay by an amendment to the law made after the service was performed in good faith.

In view of the fact that a large number of the counties of the State are interested in the settlement of these just claims, it is respectfully suggested that a general law be passed authorizing such officers as may be designated by law to levy a special tax to meet these deficiencies.

Whether that was done after this act of repudiation, I do not know. I hope that a returning sense of justice induced that Legislature to do it. Now he speaks on the subject to which we more particularly referred on Saturday.

FUTURE PUBLIC-SCHOOL POLICY.

Taking it for granted that the proposed constitution for the State—

The one now adopted and in fact in force, whether by law or not—framed by the constitutional convention that assembled at the capital September 6, 1875, and submitted to the people for adoption or rejection on the 15th of February, 1876, will be ratified, I deem it unnecessary to make any recommendations as to future legislation upon this subject, since—since, by the terms of the proposed constitution, it is for the present impracticable to establish and maintain any general system of public free schools.

Now mark what he says, Mr. President—

I was almost prophetic when I stated on Saturday that it appeared to me from that constitution, or the little that I could understand of it, that it had been so changed with certain lands as a fund that any present maintenance of public schools for anything that that constitution required to be done was totally out of the question, and I find that fortified and proved by the report of this gentleman officially made that under the new constitution—it is for the present impracticable to establish and maintain any general system of public free schools.

The best that can be done under the circumstances is for the State to aid private educational enterprise to the extent of the means authorized to be expended for gratuitous instruction by the terms of the proposed constitution, by providing that a certain proportion of the scholastic population may be instructed in private schools at the expense of the State.

Then he goes on to recommend that the only way to dispose of these public lands will be by selling them in very large bodies to individual capitalists and speculators as the only way of getting rid of them at all in order to get any money to do anything with. He says in conclusion, which is perhaps something of an indication of the state of public opinion in the State of Texas on this subject of free schools—

To such of the people, officers, teachers, and press as have faithfully come forward in the face of the bitter prejudices, obstinate antagonism, and given me their much-needed sympathy and co-operation in the difficult and embarrassing duties connected with this department, my warmest thanks are due and herewith respectfully tendered.

* * * * * * *

O. N. HOLLINGSWORTH,
State Superintendent Public Instruction.

This is not quite all upon this topic. On looking further into this new constitution I find these provisions, which, as I understand them—and if I am wrong my friend from Texas, (Mr. MAXEY,) in the correctness of whose personal statements I have implicit faith, will correct me—I suppose refer to the university to be set up under the grant by the United States of lands for an agricultural college. My friend shakes his head, and I take it it does not.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator that during the days of the republic, nearly forty years ago, provision was made, and most ample provision, for the establishment of one or more universities. A very large amount of land was appropriated for that purpose during the days of the republic, and is patented land. It has nothing to do with the agricultural college.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I think appears in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sections of this new constitution, beginning at the tenth.

The Legislature shall, as soon as practicable, establish * * * the University of Texas, &c.

But now when we come down to the thirteenth section, which is the one to which I referred and which I understand by reading it refers to the agricultural college to which the United States has granted lands——

Mr. MAXEY. I have not the constitution before me. The university is an entirely different thing from the agricultural college.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will read section thirteen and see if this is it:

The Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas—

That is it, I believe. Now we come to that college for which the Congress has granted a munificent donation of public lands to support for the equal advantage, I suppose, of all the citizens of the United States who are competent, without regard to color, to get in—

The Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, established by an act of the Legislature, passed April 17, 1871, located in the county of Brazos, is hereby made and constituted a branch of the University of Texas for instruction in agriculture, the mechanic arts, and the natural sciences connected therewith. And the Legislature shall, at its next session, make an appropriation, not to exceed $40,000, for the construction and completion of the buildings and improvements, and for providing the furniture necessary to put said college in immediate and successful operation.

That is the agricultural college; and if it stopped there it would look very fair that while the constitution absolved the Legislature from appropriating a dollar of money to support public schools, it did require them to appropriate $40,000 for a university. Next—

SEC. 14. The Legislature shall also, when deemed practicable—

Not now by $40,000 or any other sum, but also "when deemed practicable," that is by it—establish and provide for the maintenance of a college or branch university for the instruction of the colored youths of the State, to be located by a vote of the people: Provided, That no tax shall be levied and no money appropriated out of the general revenue, either for this purpose or for the establishment and erection of the buildings of the University of Texas.

They give to that thing for which the United States had granted hundreds of thousands of acres of public land for the general benefit of all its citizens and required the buildings to be put up by the State, $40,000 for the whites.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Not to exceed $40,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not to exceed $40,000; but I will call it $40,000. I wish to state it fully up to the mark on that side. Then when it comes to the other section here is another agricultural college for them under the gift of the United States, except that at some future time, when the Legislature of that State shall deem it practicable, they may establish and provide for the maintenance and instruction of the colored youths of that State a college to be located by a vote of the people, but no money to aid in the establishment of the college or the erection of its buildings shall be taxed upon the people of the State.

Mr. President, if that is the "equality before the law" that we have heard so much of very lately in certain platforms and in certain letters of acceptance, produced by the very people who enacted this constitution, then I think it high time that Congress, so far as it has the power over the agricultural-college fund, should take note of it, and high time that the people of the United States who do not believe in humbug and in illusions and in lies, whether they appear in platforms or in letters, should take note. This saying of one thing to the ear of the people for their votes and doing another thing in the acts in respect of which those votes are desired ought to be carefully taken into consideration. I do not speak of this because it is the State of Texas; my honorable friend knows that. It is only the key-note that pitches the tune in every southern State that went into the rebellion, or nearly every one. There are, perhaps, one or two honorable, notable exceptions, but generally it is the key-note of that aristocratic reaction which does not intend that the colored man shall make himself capable of defending his rights either in the forum or in the field, for intelligence is necessary to do it; that he shall be in fact, as he was in law before, the mere serf of the master upon whose estate he is allowed to labor. That is the eminently painful aspect of this case that is attempted in platforms and letters to be sugared over by sweet and general words about universal equality before the law; that is, if the law be made by the particular State wherein the equality is attempted to be asserted. This is the type; it is not the exception. It represents a sentiment; for what can be more solemn and responsible than the representatives of the people of a great State assembling in a convention, although it be revolutionary in point of law, yet with all the dignity and solemnity of changing its organic fundamental law in aspects like these? Is not that going backward instead of forward, repealing the fundamental and irrevocable former constitution, to which the plighted faith of the State had been pledged, in accepting this act of Congress which required a pledge upon that very point, and requiring a quarter of the general revenues of that State to be appropriated to universal free public education of all, and requiring no more that a dollar should be spent for such purposes? Then when you come to the gift of the United States you make it effective to the white man; you deny it and make it ineffectual in every respect as to the man of color.

Mr. President, it is not agreeable to say things of this kind; but when we are obliged to consider the condition of these affairs we must, if we do our duty, look plainly at the historic facts as these great States have presented them to us by their public action. But my honorable friend from Texas said, if I understood him, that in the general respects of peace and good order everybody in Texas was desirous of maintaining the law; that he himself had dared to prosecute an offender when somebody had tossed a bullet against the breast of the foreman of the jury as a suggestion that he had better find for the defendant. What state of society is that which even the statement of my friend indicates? He did not state to us that this was a political offender, one whose crime had grown out of political commotions; and it is immaterial to my point whether it did or not. If it did, then it shows the very state of things to exist to which I have alluded, in respect of these massacres and murders everywhere in several of these States, always falling upon some man of color or some white man of republican sentiments or holding a republican office. It only shows, I say, that my honorable friend from Texas, as I know he would do individually, would not submit to that sort of public sentiment, and at whatever cost would himself stand up to vindicate the law.

Mr. MAXEY. I know the Senator would not by his statement do me an act of injustice. If he will look at the RECORD he will see that what I stated had reference to a matter that occurred seven or eight years ago, during the republican administration of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the matter, what was the thing, if I may ask the Senator?

Mr. MAXEY. It was a murder, as I stated, committed by desperadoes upon a citizen of the State of Illinois.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the cause of the murder?

Mr. MAXEY. It was gain. They murdered him to get some $500 or $600 in money, which was recovered and returned to the heirs of the owner. The property was a wagon and horse, several hundred dollars in gold, and several hundred dollars in greenbacks, all of which was placed in the hands of a very honest, upright merchant; and when the owners came and identified themselves every dollar of it was returned. That was seven or eight years ago, when the democracy had no control there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, Mr. President, we find that only seven or eight years ago, even in respect of what may be called private murder, murder for the mere object of gain or mere personal hatred, it required the brave uprightness of my honorable friend and the courage of a jury threatened with bullets to attend to that. What can we expect, then, in the case of murders like those in Limestone County, which nobody has contradicted and nobody questions that I know of? What are we to consider is the state of public sentiment if so much is required in respect of a mere murder for gain, when it is a murder which carries out the objects of a political organization? By that I do not mean an object to enslave, but an object to win and put down all opposition. I have no doubt that my friend from Texas would stand up equally to prosecute a thing of that kind, but I am not sure that he would be so successful as he was in this instance of a murder for private gain.

In reference to the Limestone affair, which perhaps we never should have heard of but for the riot at Hamburgh, it appears that a newspaper printed close by the spot in an adjoining county gives as a public item of news the statement of an occurrence similar to that at Hamburgh, where from mere disagreement of race, or of politics, or from an attempt to coerce and oppress and control people, thirty or forty human beings, citizens of the State of Texas, have been sent to their graves; no verdicts of guilty that we know of yet, from any jury; no prosecutions; but the thing goes as a matter of course.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated on Saturday that I had never heard of the transaction to which the Senator now refers. Since that time I have taken much pains to ascertain from the Representatives from Texas in the lower House if they know anything about it. None of them have any knowledge of such a transaction as is mentioned in the Waco Register. The information which they have in regard to this affair, which occurred not eight or nine months ago, but about two years ago, was that the same man to whom I referred on Saturday, a colored man, Trammell, was connected with the murder of Applewhite, in the town of Groesbeck, in Limestone County, in cold blood, in 1871, and was indicted for the murder during the days of Governor Davis, under a republican administration. The records were subsequently burned by an armed mob, and this same man Trammell was tried to be arrested by the sheriff for his crime, and was indicted for this arson. This, as I understand, was also under the republican administration. Since the democrats acceded to power writs of capias were issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff for the arrest of Trammell. The sheriff and his posse attempted to arrest him on those writs of capias, and were fired on by Trammell and his party, and Clendennin, one of the sheriff's posse, was killed; and then this killing of Trammell took place.

That is as I understand the case, and two or three perhaps were killed of those aiding Trammell while the sheriff was endeavoring to make the arrest. That is the information which I received from members of the House this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did my honorable friend receive any information that there had been a judicial investigation in that county and anybody had been arrested and tried for that affair?

Mr. MAXEY. That I know nothing about. I only know, as I was informed by a member of the House, that the sheriff was endeavoring to make the arrest of this man Trammell under writs of capias on indictments for murder and arson, and the sheriff's party was fired on and it ended as stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I must say that the member of the House stopped very short in his information, and possibly exactly at the right place. He had information that there was some provocation, something that stirred up this thing, but whether the hand of justice ever afterward interfered to rectify whichever way was wrong the informant of my honorable friend is silent. That is not a very good attitude to leave it in, for it leaves it in the very attitude that appears everywhere in a general sense in all of these reconstructed States, that wherever violence and crime (not arising from a desire for private gain, which occurs everywhere as we know, and where the hand of justice is swift to follow the offender in all these States as well as in the North) occur from some motive that is below that, prejudice, political animosity, caste, race, whatever it may be, somehow or other the hand of justice is paralyzed and cannot go forward even to investigate. That must show a state of public opinion which tolerates offenses of this character, because the end in view that the offenders have is the same end that those people who should rectify these things also have. If a mob gets together on the eve of an election and disperses all the democratic voters who wish to attend that election, and kills a dozen of them, and the republican community in which that takes place sits still from its highest to its lowest member, and there are no indictments, no inquiries, no punishments, is it not just to say that that republican community is responsible for such a state of things? If it is just to say that of a republican community, is it not also just to say that of a democratic community? If you find every time it happens in the course of turbulence in these States that some one holding an office, or in the Legislature, is slain, that that one is always a man of one particular political faith; if you find that when any man who has been a soldier is slain it always happens to be the soldier who fought under the flag of the Union; if you find that whenever in a neighborhood disturbance the people who are slain are always the black men and those who stood by them, is it not a circumstance that leads us to ponder gravely as to such a state of society, and does it not justify us in the belief that the responsible agents of society, those who, as I said on Saturday, own the land and have in a large measure the intelligence which with property gives them control are dumb and silent, can they escape the responsibility, and is it not just to conclude that if they do not wink at these things they at least are willing to do nothing to prevent them and to reap the benefit in a political sense that they suppose is sure to follow? Is there anything unjust in that? Is there any "bloody shirt," as the favorite phrase of our friends over the way is, about that? If I am wrong in this philosophy of jurisprudence, I should be glad to have somebody correct me, but of course nobody can, because I am only stating, as it is put together, a self-evident truth in the economics of politics and of jurisprudence. To borrow a phrase from the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] "it will not do," therefore, when the attention of the country is drawn to these occurrences, to say that it is drawn to them on account of hatred to the people. As well might any one of the hundred thousand clergymen in the United States be accused of hatred to the murderer, to the perjurer, and to the thief because on every Sabbath morning he reads the Ten Commandments and exhorts his people to keep them.

But let us leave the State of Texas, which is sad enough, and go over again to South Carolina, to which this particular message refers. I stated on Saturday from the public prints, nakedly and without any comment, the simple story of this event, not nearly as strongly as the truth would have warranted, in order to show the utter baseness, cowardice, and meanness of the performance. I wish to give now from democratic authority in that State the reasons why such events take place. Here is an editorial of the News and Courier, printed at Charleston, in South Carolina, published on the 10th of July, 1876, referring to this transaction at Hamburgh:

Assuming that the accounts of the Hamburgh fight given by the Augusta newspapers are in the main correct, we find little, if any, excuse for the conflict itself, and absolutely none for the cowardly killing of the seven negro prisoners who were shot down like rabbits long after they had surrendered.

The insolence of the negro militiamen, out of which the trouble came, could easily have been punished without a resort to arms. General Butler, who appears to have been in command of the whites, admitted that an apology by the militiamen would satisfy his clients. The affront to Mr. Butler, therefore, was not the immediate cause of the fight that followed.

Now mark.

This—

That is, the fight—

was brought on by the demand that the militiamen—

Not the man who was supposed to have committed the offense, but the whole company of the militia—that the militiamen surrender their arms into the keeping of the whites.

Now mark the next paragraph, which I verily believe speaks the public sentiment of that class, the ancient ruling class of the whole South, which this paper represents; not of every man in it, I beg to say, but of the body:

The presence of armed bodies of negroes is a menace to any community.

That is the proposition. The right of the colored man, under the law and in conformity with it, to have a militia company, is a menace to any community, and of course it follows, as this editor goes on to say, that whatever is a menace to any community ought to be disposed of and put out of the way. It is not a menace to the community that there should be white-league rifle-clubs and white-line organizations all of one political party, ku-klux organizations all of one political party, but the presence of an armed body of negro militiamen "is a menace to any community." That is the democratic doctrine. He might have added that the presence of the negro anywhere, except as a slave or a serf, is a menace to any community unless he votes as his old master tells him how to vote.

The presence of armed bodies of negroes is a menace to any community.

I should add before I go on that I think that is a libel on the colored race. When in the heat of the rebellion the great mass of the white able-bodied men of the South were in the field, and their plantations, and villages, and homes were left with their wives and children and the colored race, was there any menace to the community? When the golden opportunity for wickedness, and vice, and riot, and crime of every description existed, when that longing for freedom that burns in every human bosom was at its culminating point, the homes and families and hamlets of the southern rebel, depending upon the good-will of the colored man alone, were as safe as we are in this Chamber at this moment. Yet the moment the man of color becomes free, this distinguished democratic authority tells us that to have him a militiaman his presence "is a menace to any community." That is the doctrine upon which the people of the United States are to be asked this fall to revolutionize in a peaceful way in the North, and in some way in the South, its Government. But he goes on to say, although it "is a menace to the community:"

But we do not understand that the danger was such as to justify the whites in demanding the surrender of the arms, or in laying siege to the house in which the negroes took refuge, and killing the negroes who attempted to escape. The killing of seven of the prisoners was barbarous in the extreme.

That is, the killing of the other thirty, whatever the number was, was moderately wrong, but the killing of seven there is particular objection to.

We have no words strong enough to express our condemnation of such a crime.

That is, about the seven.

They who do such a deed sow the wind.

So they do. They sow the wind and light the fire that shines in the eyes of an intelligent and law-abiding people all over this country; and without large respect to party the intelligent and law-abiding people of this country will not, I believe, do anything that they can avoid to turn the Government over into the hands of people who would carry it on in the way these people would, on this statement, if they could get the power.

We pray—

He says—

that they and those who are innocent of the wrong may not reap the whirlwind.

So do I. I do not want any vengeance for such crimes; but I do wish that the calm majesty of the law, impartial, just, although severe, may be visited upon such crimes. But how much of impartial administration of the law you would get were there at this moment a democratic governor of the State of South Carolina and democratic judges and democratic prosecuting attorneys is a question; for, I repeat, there is no instance yet stated (there may be some but not enough to change the general tenor of my statement) in which in a State where the glorious democracy have had the control any of these political riots, assassinations, murders, or rebellions have met with the slightest prosecution or punishment. In one or two instances I have had occasion to exercise pretty careful observation, for there have been some citizens of my own State who after the war was over took their little all and settled in the Southern States. Two or three of them came back to the graves of their fathers, as those who have left this life go back to the graves of their fathers, slain for opinion's sake. One of them contributed only two things to the disturbance of southern society. He had a saw-mill and an opinion. They did not kill him for the saw-mill because they wanted the lumber, but he had an opinion and he was sent home dead for that.

Mr. CONKLING. They had no use for the opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They had no use for the opinion.

Mr. President, when you look a little further at these questions, (for I do not wish to occupy too much time upon them; I only refer to two or three instances where a hundred might be named,) what do you find? Do you not find the obvious fact that in order to carry this next election every one or nearly every one of these Southern States must go in a particular way, and that, as in Mississippi only less than a year ago, it is necessary that means should be resorted to in advance in order that there shall be a peaceable election, as they call it, and that to have a peaceable election is to cause everybody who does not wish to vote the right ticket to stay away, and in order to cause them to stay away it is necessary that they should be made to feel that he who carries the wrong ballot carries his life in his hand? I do not think I am overstating that at all. The universal testimony from all sources comes up to us everywhere that this system of reaction and coercion is inaugurated for the purpose of having what they call a peaceful election, that there shall be no question when votes come to be counted as to how the ballot really was, and, in order that there shall be no question, one party must be kept away from the ballot-box; and a few lessons like that of Hamburgh and like those that have taken place that have been so often referred to—and they could not be too often—are only necessary in order that the men who have been recently enfranchised shall not dare to vote for that administration and that system of laws that have given them their liberty and protected, so far as possible, their rights.

Let us see now if I am unjust in these conclusions that I draw. I want to call your attention, sir, to the significant history of this party upon these subjects, for there would be stronger reason to believe that these acts of violence, systematic and persistent, as I have described them, are flowing from this motive, if you find that the motive is based upon an unconquerable repugnance in these people and in their allies to the amendments to the Constitution and the laws made to carry them out. If I find a whole body of men, be it a party or a State, who opposed with all their might and main the abolition of slavery, then I should expect to find that if anybody sympathized with the violence and wrong inflicted upon the enfranchised slave, it would be that party, and not the one that believed enfranchisement ought to take place.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, abolishing slavery, passed the Senate on the 11th of April, 1864. You will observe it was in the heat and stress of the rebellion, a year before it fell through, when all hope of the restoration of the Union in its original condition was long since gone. It was independence to the Southern States or nothing. It was everything to the North that the Union should be restored, and restored on principles of liberty. The proclamation of President Lincoln had gone forth. Whether he had the constitutional authority to make it or not, it was a great public act of the Government enfranchising every slave. But in order to make that promise good and secure it was thought desirable that an amendment of the Constitution should be adopted. It was proposed, and on the 11th of April, 1864, it passed the Senate by the vote of 38 to 6. Several of the war democrats, as they were called, voted for it, and the immortal six who voted against it are as follows:

Messrs. Davis, Hendricks—

Now the democratic candidate for Vice-President—

McDougall, Powell, Riddle, and Saulsbury.

They represented the extreme unction and sentiment of the democratic party. I say "unction and sentiment" not exactly in the theological sense, although I might say so, because they represented the death as well as the sentiment and faith of that party; so that I am not perhaps grammatically at all out of order in saying that. Here was the democratic vice-presidential candidate from a free State, after the proclamation of President Lincoln in that great stress of war, solemnly recording himself as the true exponent of democratic faith in favor of retaining the institution of slavery when it was proposed to get rid of it in a perfectly constitutional way. That was followed, as you might naturally expect it would be, about three months afterward by the democratic national convention at Chicago, of which the presidential candidate of the democracy now before the people was a distinguished member and a member of the committee on resolutions, expressing to all the people of the United States and to the whole world, after this amendment had been passed—not yet agreed to by the States, it is true, but after Congress had passed it through both branches—the statement that this war for the Union, this proclamation of the President for liberty, this amendment of the Constitution for liberty and equal rights (for all were involved in the declaration) were a failure, and that the manifest and immediate business of this Government was to make peace on the best terms it could get. Is it then strange that with such ideas there should be this constant backward effort for reaction in respect of the liberty of schools, education, protection of private rights wherever those private rights come in collision with the dominant disposition of the ancient aristocracy? It does not appear to me that it is strange at all. I think, as the Senator from Texas stated about ruffians, that it was spewed out by the rebellion from the very nature of things and that it will never be cured until time and the steady hand of republican government in the hands of those who love liberty and believe in these amendments shall have cured it.

But that is not all, Mr. President. When the next amendment was proposed time had gone on; the rebellion was crushed; slavery was gone as a fact, and the thirteenth amendment had been adopted as a law. Then there came its natural consequence that must flow from it, and that was the civil equality and the political equality of the people who had thus been made free citizens of the United States; and how do you find them then? I ought to have stated as to the thirteenth amendment that every or nearly every democratic State Legislature then having the power voted against the ratification of the thirteenth amendment. There were only three, to be sure; they were Delaware, New Jersey, and Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to call the attention of my friend before he passes from that. As to Governor Hendricks, the democratic candidate for Vice-President, the Senator showed that he voted against the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to call his attention to the fact that in the course of the debate on that amendment the Senator from Indiana then, Governor Hendricks, denied the power of Congress or the people of the United States to abolish slavery by a constitutional amendment, he insisting that it was beyond the reach of a constitutional amendment.

Mr. BOGY. That was the reason he voted against it, believing we had not the power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This gentleman personally I respect very much; he has a right to his opinion just as I have to mine, or as I think I have as long as I do not get any farther South; and I do not doubt that he thought we had not the power. He would not have voted against it if he had been for it, and he had a good reason for being against it undoubtedly; and if we had not any power to pass the amendment we certainly have not any power to maintain it. If the honorable candidate for the Vice-Presidency of this party was sincere, as he clearly was, in the idea that this was an absolute nullity, beyond our power, it is a nullity still; no lapse of time, except by a regular revolution which overthrows a government—and this has not yet been overthrown, and I take it it will not be for some little time to come—can make a constitutional amendment good. It does not run by prescription; and if our excellent friend should happen by accident to get into the presidential chair, then being sworn to maintain the Constitution of the United States and sworn in effect not to maintain anything that is not in the Constitution of the United States, away would go your thirteenth amendment, and Governor Smith of Georgia would certainly have his prophecy come true in a most remarkable way, that the old order of things could be restored without any trouble at all if the democrats could only get in. That would be perfectly apparent.

Now we come to the fourteenth amendment, which passed the Senate on the 8th of June, 1866, and I have the Journals here, so that no man can say hereafter that I have misstated the record, and I read from them. On the 8th of June, 1866, the fourteenth amendment passed the Senate. Those who voted against it still represented the essential ideas of the democratic party; and they were:

Mr. Cowan, Mr. Davis, Mr. Doolittle, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Hendricks, Mr. Johnson, Mr. McDougall, Mr. Norton, Mr. Riddle, Mr. Saulsbury, Mr. Van Winkle.

And the States that voted against it were Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Texas, when it was originally proposed—every or nearly every democratic State. After the war, bear in mind, after the thirteenth amendment had been adopted, and this was only the natural sequence of private protection of personal rights and personal equality before the law, and the whole representative body of the democratic party in this Chamber, which perhaps more truly than anything except a national convention, and when you take acts altogether more truly than that, represent the ideas of that party, solemnly recorded their verdict against it, and every State that they could control—and when I say every I do not know that I am literally correct, but substantially every State that they could control—recorded its judgment against it; and some States, one that I believe has now furnished a democratic candidate, as it often has before, for President of the United States, having under a republican legislature adopted the amendment, when a democratic legislature came into power reversed it and withdrew or undertook to withdraw its assent to that amendment. I find in this valuable little Manual that we have that the fourteenth article was submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, there being then thirty-seven, by resolution of Congress passed on the 16th June, 1866; that it was ratified by the following States, giving a great number which I will not take the trouble now to read, except New Jersey, which ratified it on the 11th of September, 1866, it having then a republican legislature. In April, 1868, the Legislature of New Jersey came to be democratic, and New Jersey then passed an annulling resolution, annulling her ratification, and forwarded a notice accordingly to the President of the United States or to Congress, whichever was the proper authority. Oregon which, on the 19th of September, 1866, was republican and ratified the fourteenth amendment, became, in its Legislature, democratic on the 15th October, 1868, and she withdrew her ratification to the fourteenth amendment, and notified the United States accordingly. Ohio, which republican on the 11th of January, 1867, ratified this amendment, became democratic in January, 1868, and attempted to withdraw her ratification, and gave formal notice of it to the Government of the United States. I see by a vote here that North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Virginia had previously rejected the amendment. When I spoke of New York, I was mistaken. She did not withdraw her ratification of the fourteenth amendment; it had become too late before the democrats got into power. But when we come to the fifteenth amendment, which I will now speak of, I will show you how the democracy behaved upon that, and compare that action with their present platform in a minute.

The fifteenth amendment passed the Senate on the 17th of February, 1869. The Senators voting against it were—

Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks—

How constant that patriotic man was in voting "no"—

McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Whyte.

The States that voted no were again all or nearly all—I think I am safe in saying all, but I do not know positively—democratic States, California, Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Oregon, Tennessee. Now let us see what the State of New York did. The fifteenth article was proposed by resolution of Congress of the 27th of February, 1869. New York approved it on the 14th of April, 1869. On the 5th of January, 1870, her Legislature having become democratic, she undertook to withdraw, and so far as her act could go did withdraw her ratification of that amendment, and notified Congress or the President of the fact. Ohio, her Legislature being when the fifteenth amendment was submitted a democratic body, rejected the amendment on the 4th of May, 1869. New Jersey had previously rejected the amendment, she being democratic.

So you find on these three amendments that every democratic Senator who had the intense faith in him, every democratic Senator who was not known as what was called a war democrat in Congress voted against every one of these amendments, and I am bound to assume that he voted against them upon principle and reflection.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to make a statement in that connection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. When the fifteenth amendment was submitted by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States the Legislature of Indiana was in session and the republicans had a majority in each branch; but they had less than two-thirds of each house. The constitution of Indiana provides that two-thirds of each house shall constitute a quorum, and the construction that had commonly been given to it was that it meant two-thirds of all the members elected. Just before the adjournment of that Legislature an attempt was made to ratify the fifteenth amendment by the republicans. To prevent its ratification the democratic members of the house resigned their seats, thus reducing the house to less than two-thirds of the whole number of members elected. The appropriation bills, some of them, had not been passed. The Legislature broke up, the Governor issued writs of election to take effect some time in March, and the vacancies were supplied; new representatives were elected in place of those who resigned. The Legislature was then convened in extra session by the governor, which could not last longer than forty days, I believe.

Mr. McDONALD. Will my colleague allow me to state that the same men who resigned, with one exception, were re-elected?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. All those who had resigned were from democratic counties and were re-elected. But after this election the Legislature was convened in extra session, which could not last longer than forty days. They went forward and passed the appropriation bills and did some other business; and, as the time for the expiration of the extra session approached, another attempt was made to ratify the fifteenth amendment. To prevent the ratification, the democratic members of the house again resigned. This led to an examination of the question as to the quorum of the two houses. The language of the constitution was "two-thirds of each house." After consideration and discussion, they came to the conclusion that "two-thirds of each house" did not mean two-thirds of all the members elected, but meant two-thirds of the actual membership, and that when a member had died or had resigned he was no longer to be counted. In other words, they adopted the same rule of construction that had been adopted by the Senate of the United States after resignations had taken place here during the war. The language of the two constitutions was alike with this difference, that the Constitution of the United States says that a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum and the constitution of Indiana said two-thirds of each house should constitute a quorum. But what constitutes the house was held to be the same thing. It was held here after long discussion that the House consisted of the actual membership; that when a man resigned he was no longer to be counted. They came to that conclusion in Indiana after the second resignation, and went forward to ratify the fifteenth amendment after the resignations took place the second time, and that ratification was counted.

Mr. McDONALD. I have sent for the first volume of Indiana statutes, which contains our constitution, and I shall desire to have that section of the constitution read in this connection. I will state further that my colleague is mistaken in his statement of facts in reference to the house in which the resignations took place in the first instance. The first resignations were on the part of senators who were re-elected again, as I stated before, with but one exception. The second resignation was on the part of members of the house. The speaker of the house made the decision to which my colleague has referred, and in making it he went back upon every decision that had been made upon the question of a constitutional quorum in our State from the time of the adoption of the constitution, and it has never been ratified by any other tribunal nor followed by any subsequent Legislature.

Mr. MORTON. I presume I was mistaken as to the resignations taking place in the same house the second time. I think the resignations were in the other house the second time, but they were for the same purpose, to break the quorum and to prevent the ratification of the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, what my two friends from Indiana have stated I am very much obliged to them for, because they have both fortified the inference that I thought was fairly to be drawn from this steadfast course of public conduct by the democratic party. Even the body of the party in Indiana, a free State, after the war was so bitterly hostile to these measures of freedom and equality before the law that its representative men resigned from their places in the Legislature rather than allow a constitutional majority of that Legislature to ratify the amendment, and they went back to their democratic constituencies and received their approval by a fresh election to do the same thing over again. That represents truly and fairly, as my friend has stated, the democratic idea.

Mr. McDONALD. I will state, if the gentleman will permit me, that several of those senators were representing what were known to be republican districts, and that they were returned as well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must be a very extraordinary republican district that is represented by a democrat who votes against the fourteenth amendment. I should like to have that district brought to the Centennial and put on show. [Laughter.] But my honorable friend from Indiana says that on his notion of the constitution of the State of Indiana the fifteenth amendment is not ratified, for I believe we only got exactly the number of States necessary to make it good, and he says that that ratification was in violation of the constitution of the State of Indiana, and very likely that is what his friends, Mr. Hendricks and Governor Tilden, mean when they say that whatever is lawful they do not know but they would be glad to carry out and leave it to those counties of Indiana to determine what is lawful according to their previous notion. I am very much obliged to my honorable friend for that contribution to the examination of this subject.

Now, Mr. President, let us go a little further. I had stated that every democratic Senator who represented the real democratic idea as put forth in its platform of 1864, that the whole war to suppress the rebellion was wrong and a failure and ought to be put down and stopped, voted against the fifteenth amendment; every democratic State that I remember—if there be any exception, I shall be too happy and too glad to state it—when it was submitted to its Legislature voted against it; and yet in a recent manifesto put forth at Saint Louis, and a still more recent and protracted one put forth at Saratoga or somewhere, we are told that we are happy to accept the present situation, be it what it may, in order to give everybody his constitutional rights, be they what they may. I shall refer to that subject a little further on more in detail; but it ought to be stated just here.

In spite of every previous action of the democratic party, in spite of all its previous protests and votes in every form, in conventions in 1868 and 1872, against these amendments and against the laws to carry them out, now we are told—not when you come to look at the language, which is studied and careful—but the people are intended to be told, and to be asked to believe, that there has been a sudden conversion, and that this party that is resisting here by dilatory motions the printing of a public document on a subject affecting the liberties and the lives of citizens of the United States has experienced as sudden a conversion as St. Paul did, and that there is to be no more persecution of people for their political opinions, but all is to be harmony. There are not many people who have had the benefit even of the public school system of the State of Texas, I take it, who will be prepared to believe that tale.

I am not going to take your time and weary the Senate by going through and reading from the Journals; but I have said, and I repeat, that following these amendments were of course the necessary acts of Congress to see that they were put in force, providing the necessary legislation that each one of these amendments declared Congress should have power to provide to carry them out, and from the first civil-rights bill of April, 1866, down to the last bill to amend some of the sections of an act that the Supreme Court through a want of proper phraseology held were not within the Constitution, but not without it in principle—from first to last, by every step, under every one of these amendments and in every form, every member of the democratic party in the Senate of the United States has voted against them, has fought against them with all the vigor of intellect and the persistence of will for which members of the democratic party are so justly famous; and yet it is to such hands, now here resisting even the dissemination of official intelligence, that we are asked to commit the destinies of this free people under these amendments and under these laws in order that there may be peace and equal rights. Was there ever such a mockery of legislation or of justice? Was there ever such a delusion held out to an intelligent people of any country? Why, sir, it would be worse than if a part of the sailors of a ship had mutinied and undertaken to cast the ship on shore, and at last, after a great struggle, they were captured, put below the hatches for a little while, and then let up on deck and sent to their respective places on the ship to do their particular parts of the duty, and suddenly they come forward to the owners of the vessel when they get into port, and say, "Here, turn out the captain and all the loyal crew who would enforce order on this ship, and give us command; let us try one voyage and see what we can do with it." It shocks common sense, it shocks human credulity to think such a thing is possible.

Senators may say, as probably they will, that I am making a political speech. I am. I think that every speech made in the Senate ought to be a political speech. We are elected for the business of politics and to secure the people of this country, so far as lies in our power by just laws and fair debate, the blessings that the Constitution and the laws have intended to secure to them. Having now shown you what has been the history of these amendments and of these laws, to overturn which the Hamburgh affair is one of the steps, I want to show you how this is followed by a strict connection, when you read it exactly, by the democratic platform of even this year. I do not mean to say that this platform is dishonest—that would be unparliamentary; perhaps it would be unjust; I do not know—but I will say that if those who framed it had been dishonest they would have resorted to catch the ear of the people to exactly the delusive and deceptive phraseology that they have put forth to the world. Let us see what it is upon this precise point, which is perfectly in coincidence with what I have been stating about its previous course.

For the democracy of the whole country we do here re-affirm our faith in the permanence of the Federal Union, our devotion to the Constitution of the United States with its amendments universally accepted as—

What? As a guarantee of civil liberty, of equal rights, of equal political suffrage? Not by a long deal—as a final settlement of the controversies that engendered civil war, and do here record our steadfast confidence in the perpetuity of republican self-government.

We stand by the Constitution of the United States and its amendments "universally accepted as a final settlement of the controversy that engendered civil war."

What controversies engendered the civil war, Mr. President? Was it the right to hold slaves in a State of the Union that chose to hold them? No, sir. The republican party in 1856 and in 1860 most clearly declared that it had no power and had no purpose to invade the rights of any State in respect of its domestic institutions. Was it in respect of equal civil rights, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude? No, sir; that would have been absurd at that time. There was not any such issue, there could not be, because so long as the state of slavery existed there must be this inequality of civil rights. Was it in respect of the right to vote without regard to race, or color, or caste, or condition? Of course not, for that would have been absurd. What was it? Everybody knows, and I merely occupy your time for nothing in stating it. It was the question whether slavery should be carried from the States into Territories common to the people of all the States, as a State institution, in spite of any will or wish of Congress or of the people who even might form a territorial government and erect a State there. It was the doctrine that the Constitution itself carried slavery out of the States where it existed and into every Territory that either by conquest or by purchase, and in whatever latitude, might belong to the people of the United States. And when on an issue against that a republican President was elected to maintain the Constitution and the laws as they stood, came the secession or rebellion; and now what this democratic party of 1876 proposes is that it re-affirms its "devotion to the Constitution of the United States, with its amendments universally accepted as a final settlement of the controversies that engendered civil war." Not the controversies that grew out of it and exist now, but the ancient question of the right of a southern slaveholder under the Constitution to carry his slaves into Kansas or Nebraska against the will of the people of that Territory, they regard as fully settled and they will stand by it as a settlement of a controversy that engendered the civil war.

O shame, where is the blush that might mantle faces in that convention, perhaps too ruddy before, to put off a sham and delusion on the people of the United States of that character? If, in spite of all its previous history, in spite of every act of all its public men, in spite of the organized act of all its Legislatures where it had the power, this new party had really got a new faith of peace and unity under these amendments, why, in God's name, did it not say so? Why did it employ such an astute scholar and dialectician to put in this careful phrase that we regard these amendments and will stand by them as settling the controversies that produced the civil war? None of the questions that grow out it, none of the questions that agitate us to-day, none of these matters of reaction that what we have seen in the Southern States show, are referred to at all; but we are glad to know that we stand by the Constitution settling the question of the right of a person to carry slaves into free territory!

Now look a little further, sir, and see what is to become of all the laws that have been passed to carry out these amendments if the power in this country is to be intrusted into the hands that now demand it. Here is the platform on that point. We believe—

In absolute acquiescence in the will of the majority—the vital principle of republics; in the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; in the total separation of church and state, for the sake alike of civil and religious freedom; in the equality of all citizens before just laws of their own enactment.

Not in the equality of all citizens under these amendments of the Constitution; not in the equality of all citizens as protected by the acts of Congress under the amendments; but in the equality of all citizens of the respective States under "just laws of their own enactment." That is, if the State of Georgia enacts a labor law which makes every man a vagrant whom the owner of some great estate does not choose to employ, that equality the democratic party believes in; but in that great national constitutional equality which flows not from State laws, but from the fundamental law of the Republic and the laws passed to carry it out that the Supreme Court have now held to be constitutional in every respect but one of mere phraseology, they do not believe at all, or if they do they have been especially industrious not to say so.

Mr. President, I do not know but that I have taken up already too much of your time; but I think before I close I ought perhaps in justice to these eminent gentlemen to whom I have referred, not as persons but as types and representatives of a great party, see whether they accord with this platform on which they propose to run. I find in the letter of Governor Tilden these words:

The nobler motives of humanity concur with the material interests of all in requiring that every obstacle be removed to a complete and durable reconciliation between kindred populations once unnaturally estranged on the basis recognized by the Saint Louis platform of the Constitution of the United States, with its amendments universally accepted as a final settlement of the controversies which engendered civil war; but in aid of a result so beneficent, the moral influence of every good citizen as well as every governmental authority ought to be exerted not alone to maintain their just equality before the law, but likewise to establish a cordial fraternity and good-will among citizens—

This is not exactly grammatical. I have no doubt it is a misprint. I would not accuse Governor Tilden of writing bad grammar—

whatever their race or color, who are now united in the one destiny of a common self-government. If the duty shall be assigned to me, I should not fail to exercise the powers with which the laws and the Constitution of our country clothes its Chief Magistrate to protect all its citizens, whatever their former condition, in every political and personal right.

If that had been said out of connection with this platform and had been said by a man of a party that believed in the theory of these amendments and of these laws, no criticism could have been made upon it at all, because it would be a general declaration of faith; but he is careful to put this in connection with the very phrase in the platform at Saint Louis to which I have called your attention as being the kind of law and the kind of constitution only that he is to enforce and that whatever power the laws do give him, so understood, he, of course, will extend to everybody alike. But, Mr. President, what is the use of commenting upon that? The peace and the unity that he speaks of at Albany and at Indianapolis is one thing. There are order and equal rights. But when you go to Mississippi and Louisiania, to Hamburgh or Coushatta or Corinth, there peace and order are quite different things. But, as I said, what is the use of commenting upon this? Have we not seen at this very session of Congress in both its Houses the most definite action on the part of the party to which I am now alluding showing that the moment they get the power every one of these statutes will be swept out of the books? Have not our democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber at this very session voted solid against a provision amending the civil-rights bill so as to make its phraseology conform to the judgment of the highest court of the land? So they have, and with everything of criticism and everything of reluctance and opposition they had no better or other plan to suggest except just what is implied in this platform, adroitly worded as it is, to leave everything to the States. That is the doctrine. It has been announced here by the leaders of our friends, and with their universal approval, that Congress has no business to legislate in respect to any one of these amendments and that it belongs to the States to secure liberty under the thirteenth, equality under the fourteenth, and suffrage under the fifteenth amendment, and that it belongs to no other power, and it is to remit this question to the States lately emerged from the rebellion and to this state of society that holds the existence of a military colored organization a menace and the presence of a white republican a disgrace, that the democratic party is to carry the next election and to carry it only by the votes of these very States where violence and disorder of the extremest kind are resorted to in order to effectuate the purpose. And lest there should be any doubt and it be said that it is not the democratic Senators alone that make the democratic party, have we not seen here, on an appropriation bill even, a sweeping proposition from the House of Representatives to repeal every law that now upon the statute-books of the United States secures any guardianship and inspection over the election even of members of Congress where by the Constitution itself confessedly Congress has full power to regulate and see that there is an honest and fair election? Even in that respect, so intense is the hatred, if I may use such a phrase—I certainly will not use it, although I borrow it from the other side—so intense is the dislike of this party to any legislation which secures to this nation any national rights in these respects that they even ride upon an appropriation bill legislation that sweeps all that away though the subject is one the jurisdiction over which by Congress has never been disputed. But Hamburgh is not the only instance.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me in that connection, if it does not disturb him, to call his attention to another bill passed by the House and now before the Senate, a bill to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes? I will read that section if the Senator will allow me:

No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

I only want to call the Senator's attention to the bill to repeal that section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not waste your time, Mr. President, by going on further in respect of the legislative attitude of our friends on the other side in regard to this whole subject, although it is interesting and the proof could be accumulated beyond all computation almost. But I want to come back again, for a moment before I close, to the state of things in the South, and I come back to it as the natural consequence of the history I have been stating to you; for with this attitude of those who opposed these amendments and opposed these laws, what could you expect but that after such a state of overthrow as took place in the South those who believe in reaction should with such encouragements resort to just such measures as they do? Could you expect anything else? It was exactly that sort of confidence in northern democratic aid which precipitated our southern brethren into the rebellion. It is exactly that same confidence in democratic sympathy and opposition to the Constitution and to the laws in these respects that precipitates many, many of our southern brethren into these acts of turbulence and violence which my friend from Ohio has stated are too shocking to be described in human language; but they accumulate; and to show you how even experience against the warning of the democratic editor of the South Carolina paper, that they are likely to reap in the whirlwind and that it is a great mistake, is not strong enough, policy is not strong enough, patience is not strong enough to keep people of this character from continuing steadily in that very path. Almost since this debate began and since this Hamburgh affair, there has occurred this in the State of Mississippi:

On last Saturday, the 29th ultimo, a convention of republicans of Hinds County, Mississippi, was held at Raymond, a town twenty miles from Jackson and six miles from where the Clinton massacre occurred, to choose delegates to a congressional convention to be held at Brookhaven. Delegates were there from different parts of the county, and were as peaceable and well-behaved as men could be.

The democrats flocked into the town early in the morning from all directions until several hundred were assembled. As this was the first public meeting of the kind the republicans felt safe in holding at that place since the Clinton riot a year ago, and the democrats thinking that they had the county so well in hand that republicans would not dare to assemble there again, they were indignant at this bold disregard of their pleasure. It was evident, too, that if they tolerated this convention other meetings would be held and the county be organized for the campaign. This could not be permitted, and so we have to witness the scenes that followed as related below.

What I have now stated is the paragraph of the editor. It may be exaggerated. Now comes the description from the eye-witness:

When the convention was called to order democrats crowded in and filled the court-house. The yard outside, also, was filled with them, all armed and as hostile as they could be by insulting demonstration. One account says the convention was fired into and broken up in confusion. Another account is from the Jackson Times of the 31st ultimo, as follows:

"Fire-arms were exposed in a reckless and threatening manner, and the conduct of democrats who were understood to be present for the purpose of supervising a republican convention was simply outrageous.

"Cartridges were exposed in the convention, and attention of delegates was arrested by significant gestures clearly indicating that they would be used in murderous work if necessary to enforce democratic success. Buckshot, fired from 'nigger-shooters'"—

That is what they call the fowling-pieces down South—"nigger-shooters"—

"were sent flying around the hospitable town of Raymond, and many of them came in uncomfortably close proximity to the heads of republican representatives.

"The most unprovoked and inexcusable outrage, however, was an assault made upon Mayor McGill, of this city, and Messrs. Kerr, Knadler, Tapley, and others, who were peacefully and quietly returning home in their private conveyance, a spring-wagon, which accommodated in all six persons. When about four miles from Raymond they were overtaken by eight or nine armed and mounted men, who reined their horses alongside of and behind the vehicle."

And then it proceeds to state how they were abused. It is the old story over again. It is not necessary to read it. Now the paper goes on:

Colonel McGill is mayor of Jackson, serving his second term, and was re-elected last winter by the votes of both parties. Captain Kerr is register of the United States land office at Jackson, and a native of that city. Both these gentlemen were gallant confederate soldiers—

But they had dared in the interest of a real peace and reconciliation to say that they were willing that these constitutional amendments and these laws should be taken for what they really meant, and that they would not go for reaction but for real equality and real liberty, and as a consequence of course they were served a great deal worse than anybody else was—

Both these gentlemen were gallant confederate soldiers. Mr. Knadler was a Union soldier, but until recently acted with the democratic party in Vicksburgh. Mr. Tapley is an educated young colored man, also a native of Jackson. There could have been nothing offensive in that party but their politics.

This conduct of the White-Liners may be traced to a well-matured and settled system of warfare which they have inaugurated in that county. The Raymond Gazette, of the 26th of July, says—

And that is a democratic paper, representing democratic news and democratic intelligence—

"It remains to be seen if the white tax-payers of Hinds County will again permit a handful of carpet-baggers and a half dozen home radicals to attempt to organize colored people in solid column for offensive political operations against the said white tax-payers. It remains to be seen, we say, whether this thing is again to be allowed in Hinds County."

That is the democratic talk for you, and it represents, as I have said, exactly the theory upon which Governor Hendricks and his associates resisted all these amendments, exactly the theory upon which he and his successors resisted every law in every form to carry them out, and exactly the theory upon which Governor Tilden and Governor Hendricks now say that they will take these amendments as settling only the dissensions that engendered the civil war. They will settle everything down to the 1st of April, 1861, but they will settle nothing since. That is the attitude.

Mr. President, every time these subjects have been discussed here (and they have generally been introduced by democratic opposition to some simple proposition or measure legitimate and correct in itself) in reply to mere statements of facts about these atrocities and their origin and motive and purpose, we have had one single, uniform response, that the republican party still keeps up a strife of hatred and animosity and that it flaunts "the bloody shirt," as they with the elegance that belongs to their party style it, the bloody shirt of politics; and that is the only answer. It is good for my friend from Ohio to denounce this particular Hamburgh outrage if it is as represented as he says, but if I denounce it and undertake to look into the causes that led to it, then I am exhibiting hatred to the South, I am flaunting, as the saying is, that political bloody shirt to move men's minds to animosity. Nothing is more unjust, Mr. President. If there is any one duty that the Congress of the United States owes to the whole people, it is the duty to calmly and dispassionately unmask every fraud that any party is attempting to perpetrate upon the intelligence of our people. It is our duty to uncover to the intelligent voter of this country every act of violence that stabs the Constitution that we all have sworn to support. It is our duty to maintain as far as we can, both by debate and by law, the real security of peaceful liberty, peaceful equal rights, peaceful equal suffrage in every State; and that duty no cry of hate and no cry of bloody shirt or other vulgar language of that kind I trust will deter us from performing. We have no hate for the southern people. We desire, more intensely if possible than they can, that there should be the real brotherhood that flows from the peaceful operation of equal laws everywhere. We have passed no amendment that they do not now pretend at least to say is right. We have passed no law that in every free State would not be considered wholesome and just for the protection of the liberty and the equality and the political rights of citizens; and yet out of that they say we have manifested hate and dislike. No, Mr. President, it is not so. No hearts beat warmer for the real restoration of these Southern States than do the hearts of the republican soldiers and the democratic soldiers and the republican party of the Northern States and of the West. There is nothing that we have done upon which the finger of any man can be placed to show otherwise. We have only enacted wholesome, equal laws that meet in the State of Vermont—we having similar State laws—with the universal approbation of everybody; and it is only those who desire to go backward into the era of caste and of aristocracy and of a real slavery, rather than those who desire to go forward into the new era of peace and equal rights, who raise this cry of hate, based only as I say on the fact of the laws we have passed.

Why, Mr. President, I cannot point out to my southern friends better the attitude of the North, as it is called, or the republican party toward them, than that which is stated in these lines of an almost inspired man, who has written so much for equal rights and for peace, himself a member of that only sect in our country that does not believe it to be lawful or right to take up arms for any cause. Here is what he says upon this very topic, and it is expressed in such a way that I hope my friends cannot misunderstand it, the true sentiment, as I believe, of all that great party and that great people for whose sake in some degree I have now spoken:

From you alone the guarantee
Of union, freedom, peace, we claim;
We urge no conqueror's terms of shame.

Alas! no victor's pride is ours;
We bend above our triumphs won
Like David o'er his rebel son.

Be men, not beggars. Cancel all
By one brave, generous action; trust
Your better instincts, and be just.

Make all men peers before the law,
Take hands from off the negro's throat,
Give black and white an equal vote.

Keep all your forfeit lives and lands,
But give the common law's redress
To labor's utter nakedness.

Revive the old heroic will;
Be in the right as brave and strong
As ye have proved yourselves in wrong.

Defeat shall then be victory,
Your loss the wealth of full amends,
And hate be love, and foes be friends.

Then buried be the dreadful past,
Its common slain be mourned, and let
All memories soften to regret.

Then shall the Union's mother-heart
Her lost and wandering ones recall,
Forgiving and restoring all;

Stretch hands and bid ye welcome home.

Mr. President, if that be peace, then we are for peace; if that be hatred, then it is that hatred misnamed, which is a real love, which only stretches over the South the national authority that the national Constitution gives in order that the equal rights the Constitution secures shall be protected.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me to make a report from the committee of conference on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit a report, which I send to the Chair, upon the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are quite unable to understand the report. Let it go over until to-morrow and be printed so as to show what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the present consideration of the report, and desires it to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the bill be printed as it will read if amended as the committee propose.

Mr. ALLISON. That would require a great deal of printing. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that I have here a memorandum of the changes made in the bill by the conference report.

Mr. ANTHONY. All right.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the memorandum be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. That will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the memorandum read.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be very glad to have it read also.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the memorandum be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I send it to the desk. The additions are made on one side and the deductions on the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorandum will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the memorandum.

Mr. SHERMAN. What I wish to call attention to is the success of the comparatively small and unimportant places called rivers and harbors, to the injury of the great works of internal improvement which alone are contemplated by the Constitution, in order to patch up here and there some disappointment in local affairs——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call my friend to order. I asked that the report go over and be printed; but certainly I do not intend to stop my friend. I only want to have it understood that there is not unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope if the Senator from Ohio is permitted to attack the report that I shall be allowed to say a word or two in defense of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to letting it go over until to-morrow. We certainly cannot vote for it as it now stands.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection either, provided it is understood that it is not only printed but printed so that we can understand exactly what is being done. I will consent to any form of that. I suggest that the memorandum had better, if it can, show the States or localities in which these works are located. I do not know where some of them are at all, as I listened to the reading. Doubtless the chairman does, and in a moment can add the States.

Mr. ALLISON. I will add that to the memorandum and have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONKLING. Then how is the bill to be printed; simply over again as it was passed?

Mr. ALLISON. The conference report I suppose will be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit that it is idle to print merely the conference report, and then print the bill over again, as the bill has been printed already. If it is to be printed, I submit it ought to be printed with the proposed amendments incorporated in it. Otherwise how are we going to print it? The bill is here as we passed it. We know how that is. It was not changed in a single instance. Therefore we may as well I think have it printed as it will stand when amended by the conference report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be printed just as a bill from the House would be, as amended, showing what is stricken out and what is inserted.

Mr. CONKLING. If printed that way, there would be no use to print it as we agreed to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the original House bill be printed with the amendments agreed to by the Senate, and then indicate upon the same items the changes made by the conference committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, let the print show every step in the progress of the affair.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the whole thing will appear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made as suggested.

The following is the statement submitted by Mr. ALLISON:

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 4, 6, 12, 35, 46, 78, 102, 110, and 128.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 43, 45, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 103, 104, 106, 107, 108, 109, 111, 112, 114, 115, 117, 118, 120, 121, 124, 125, 126, 127, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 162, and 164, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 5, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out with an amendment, as follows: Insert "three" in lieu of "five;" and the House agree thereto.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted insert the words "and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out with an amendment, as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "ten;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted insert "and thirty-two," and after the word "thousand," in line 1, page 6 of the bill, insert "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 44, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out with an amendment, as follows: Insert "fifteen" in lieu of "twenty-five;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 56, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out with an amendment as follows: Insert "thirteen" in lieu of "thirty;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Insert "thirty-eight" in lieu of "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "sixty-six" and insert "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 93, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of "three thousand" insert "two thousand five hundred;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of "thirty-nine thousand and six hundred" insert "thirty-five thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert "one hundred and forty-two" in lieu of "one hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 113, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with the following amendment: In lieu of "fifty thousand" insert "twenty-nine thousand six hundred;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "fifty" insert "thirty:" and the Senate agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 119, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "seven" insert "five;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 122, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "ten;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 123, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "eight;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 134, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "eight;" and the House agree thereto.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 148, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted, insert as follows: "Provided, That $10,000 thereof shall be expended for removing the bar at Fort Smith, Arkansas; and provided further, That $40,000 of the above sum shall be expended on the Missouri River, including improvements opposite Saint Joseph, Missouri, and at Nebraska City;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: Strike out "two hundred" in line 22, page 15 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and seventy-five;" and the Senate agree thereto.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 160, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert "seventy-two" in lieu of "seventy-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 161, and agree to the same, with the following amendments: Insert after the word "water" the words "at mean tide," and after the word "river" the words "to the port of New Orleans;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "thereof" in line 18 of said amendment the following: "not to exceed $10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the regular order.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 2d instant:

Resolved, That 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the late massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the scenes we have recently witnessed and declarations heard make it proper for us to stop and scan well the political and social horizon and see in what direction our craft is drifting, for we should not forget that the political and social waters have dangerous reefs and shoals hid beneath their surface as well as the physical sea. Therefore, in our moves and counter-moves on the great political chess-board, and in our efforts to checkmate each other, we should not forget to watch carefully in what direction the gales are driving us. Although no storm may be raging, yet there can be no absolute calm; the vessel moves onward for weal or woe; there is no standing still even though the sails be furled.

But a few years ago the furious storm of rebellion drove us onward through the fierce waves and rough breakers of intestine war, hurling us rapidly onward toward the dangerous reefs of disintegration and dissolution; but the counter-current of patriotism and loyalty bore us safely through the storm.

All who have studied with any care the history of other nations know full well that governments which have to undergo this fierce ordeal are subject not only to a single but to a double crucial test of their ability to stand the shock. Not only is their ability to withstand the strain of rebellion and internal war put to the trial, but also the ability of their institutions to counteract and control the effects of the rebound in case of success; in other words, their ability to withstand the reaction which always follows the close of a fierce internal war. The strength of the action and reaction is as a matter of course in proportion to the magnitude of the movement and of the forces and material brought into operation as compared with the entire strength of the nation. Judging by this rule, which is certainly a correct one, it must be admitted by all that the trial to which this Government was subjected by the recent rebellion exceeds that of any other of a like character of which history gives us any account.

We have passed safely through the first act, the first crucial test in the great ordeal, and are now in the midst of the second act and are as a nation undergoing the second crucial test, which, as the first, though slower in its operation, as often proves fatal. Although we are proverbially a fast people, and causes produce results more rapidly with us than elsewhere, yet no statesman will contend for a moment that a period of but little more than half a score of years is sufficient to outlive the reacting forces put in operation by the mighty convulsion through which we have passed. A war of sections seldom if ever equaled in magnitude and the enfranchisement of 3,000,000 of slaves must necessarily have produced a strain upon our institutions unequaled by that ever felt by any other nation.

It is a fact contradicted by no instance in history of which I am aware, that the reaction in such cases tends in the nation to aggrandisement and extravagance, and to trickery, deception, and falsehood in the overthrown party in their attempt to regain power.

As an example proving the first part of this proposition it is only necessary to trace the history of France since the close of the great revolution, struggling and panting for liberty and republicanism, yet alternately republican and monarchical and so swayed by the influences and passions of the day that we see her deliberately by the voice of six millions making Louis Napoleon president, next seven millions create him dictator, and lastly nearly eight millions declare him emperor.

As an example proving both parts of the proposition I may refer to the causes which led to the rapid increase of power and wealth of Athens, which culminated under Pericles and as suddenly faded away through corruption and vice until swallowed up by the rising Macedonian power.

But I will not stop to give examples with which Senators are familiar, but proceed at once to examine some of the elements at work in our national, social, and political life, and therefrom cast the horoscope of the near future if these are allowed to work out their natural results.

But first let me say that no party in any nation or country has ever heretofore carried the Government through such an ordeal thus far so successfully and with such good results as has the republican party in this case.

Thus proving, so far at least, despite the sneers cast at American statesmen and American patriotism, the ability of her leaders to make good the dream of our sages which Moore has so bitterly cast in verse:

> Even here, beside the proud Potomac's stream,
> Might sages still pursue the flatt'ring theme
> Of days to come, when man shall conquer fate,
> Rise o'er the level of his mortal state,
> Belie the monuments of frailty past.

Although errors may have been committed and mistakes made in the attempt to steer the vessel safely through the storm and thus reverse the verdict of history, yet they are fewer in number and far less grave than could have been anticipated, when we take into consideration the usually demoralizing effect of war. Nevertheless, in our attempt to solve this great problem and conduct the country safely back to its ante bellum status, a new factor has entered into the operation which needs the most rigid scrutiny before we as a people can safely allow it to work out its effect in the great work of reconstruction.

I allude, as a matter of course, to the re-introduction into the political arena of that element which in the late rebellion and struggle for unity stood opposed to the loyal portion of our people.

In order to understand fully the effect this element is likely to produce in the administration of the Government and thus indirectly upon social life, it will be necessary for us before considering its immediate tendencies to glance hastily at the chief results which have so far grown out of the war.

One of the inevitable consequences of a long war during which we were shut in and confined to our own resources was to develop to an unusual degree our productive powers.

This, in that portion of the country free from the devastating effects of the war, naturally brought about high prices, both of labor and productions, and with these a corresponding idea of extravagance. Speculation ran rife, overleaping all the bounds of moderation which had hitherto halted the most reckless; manufactories swelled their proportions, while others sprang into existence; railroads began to spread over the land like a vast net-work of iron, while even wilder schemes were inaugurated on the faith that the success of others inspired. The amount of money suddenly thrown into circulation, and the recklessness naturally inspired by the commotions of war, led to risks and speculations of which our people would not have dreamed in tranquil times under any financial system.

When the war ceased and the Army was dismissed to private life the money which the soldiers, officers, and others brought with them, together with the dues and pensions paid by the Government, continued for a time to supply the unusual demands thus created and keep in motion the operations started under the war impetus.

But the cause which produced this effect, the great force which put these wheels in motion having suddenly ceased, the natural effect began ere long to be felt; the thousands of hands now returned to the field of labor in the civil walks of life began to divide the profits. The regions of the South whose energies had been crippled and prostrated by the war afforded one field of expansion for the gathering and swelling energies of the North, while the newly opened mineral regions of the West afforded another outlet. Paradoxical as it may appear to the eyes of those of other nations, the productive powers of the North were greater at the close than at the commencement of the rebellion. But the gates to foreign emigration so long closed being opened again, the stream set in afresh, thus adding new hands to our productive forces; while, on the contrary, the demand had decreased, the war supply being no longer necessary, and our foreign commerce crippled and diminished. Prices necessarily began to fall as the demand grew less in proportion to the production, and as financial expansion was stopped, the difficult work of contraction was begun by the Government.

It is unnecessary for me on this occasion to trace the various steps of this process, as it is well known that at last the retrograde movement culminated in the financial crash of 1873. The necessity for retrenchment became at once apparent to all who paid any attention to the signs of the times; in fact many of the more prudent had foreseen the coming storm and had already begun to take in sail.

It is, however, difficult for a people who have once had a taste of unusual prosperity and who have once entered upon the highway of extravagance to withdraw voluntarily from its allurements and descend to that economy which the changed condition of affairs requires; and, as a natural consequence, in social life we see a fierce struggle on the part of each individual to retain that position in life and external display attained in more prosperous times. Debt, recklessness, and crime follow. Add to this the feverish state of mind produced by the commotion and excitement of war, and we see a double cause leading to this result.

Another effect of the unusual excitement and prosperity was a large increase of tradesmen, artisans, and speculators, which resulted in withdrawing large numbers from the rural districts to the cities and centers of population. Extravagance in dwellings, furniture, dress, and all that pertains to external display followed as a matter of course. The municipal authorities, catching the spirit of the times, were drawn into the maelstrom of extravagance; expensive improvements were undertaken, and these cities and municipalities became burdened with debts under which they are now groaning. Such a result was to be expected as a part of the ordeal to which we as a nation have been subjected by the great war of the rebellion, and we may be thankful to-day for the early revival of that healthy spirit of public sentiment which is rapidly throwing off this incubus.

But this disposition to congregate in the centers of population, in addition to its effect on the cities themselves, had a tendency also to bring into conflict certain important industrial interests, which to a certain extent has had its influence on the politics and legislation of our country.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the monarchs of France adopted the mistaken policy of drawing away the nobility from the rural districts to the cities, and especially to Paris. This had a direct tendency to destroy the sympathy between the nobility and rural population, which ultimately, as De Tocqueville clearly demonstrates, was one of the causes producing the revolution. And although the unfortunate Louis sought earnestly to assist and benefit by liberal public measures this rural population, yet these very efforts assisted only under this state of affairs to precipitate the gathering storm.

It is true we have no titled nobility in our Republic, and thank God for it. Yet like causes are calculated to produce like effects; and although I have no fear of such results in this country as followed in France, yet we can already see some of the evil effects of this tendency to centralize great wealth and moneyed power. From it grew up great monopolies, as for example the railroad combinations, whose interests ought to be one with that of our agriculturists, yet from this centralizing tendency they seem to be opposed. This has given rise to organized opposition which has been carried into the political as well as commercial arena.

And as I have mentioned this subject as an example in point, allow me to diverge for a moment in order to say that the wants and needs of the great agricultural interests of our country have not received that attention to which they are entitled. Yet this has not arisen so much from an unwillingness on the part of the various legislative bodies and Congress to do full justice to these great interests, as from a want of knowledge of what was necessary to be done. It has been too often the case that those who have undertaken to represent in a special manner these interests have been more anxious to promote their own interests and to rise to prominence on this plea than to originate useful and practical measures; and in some instances hasty legislation instead of harmonizing the great transporting and agricultural interests has only resulted in bringing them into more direct opposition. That there are errors which need correction there is no doubt, but this is to be brought about not by antagonizing the two, but by fostering and elevating the agricultural interests of the country and thus bringing the two into harmony without contracting either. Our Agricultural Department instead of being what it now is should be one of the broadest in its scope, if not the most extensive in its details, of all our Departments.

But to return to the subject; let me now trace very briefly our political history since the war and see what the indications are for the future.

The dominant party was fully apprised of the lessons which history teaches in reference to the effect of great internal wars and was conscious of the fact that the natural effect of the rebound, unless carefully controlled and restrained by a strong hand and judicious management, would be to lead to too great a centralization and consolidation of power in the Federal Government. But the problem was attended with unusual difficulty, not only on account of the magnitude of the contest and the large numbers engaged, but also on account of the new element thrown into the solution by the sudden emancipation of three millions of slaves who had necessarily to be introduced into the body-politic.

To freely pardon the rebellious element as soon as the contest was over and re-admit it to representation in the councils of the nation would no doubt have had the appearance of great and unusual magnanimity which might perhaps have won back the hearts of many. But to do this before the great questions involved in the contest had been permanently settled and irrevocably fixed and riveted upon our institutions would have rendered the victory of Government and loyalty over rebellion and disunion a nullity and would have resulted only in confusion and renewing in the halls of Congress the contest the war was supposed to have settled.

Duty, honor, and the perpetuity and good name of our nation, as well as the blood of thousands and tens of thousands shed on a hundred battle-fields, required that we should fix firmly and irrevocably upon our institutions the questions decided by the verdict of war. To have done less than this would have shown either a want of fidelity on our part to the trust reposed in us or inability to perform the duty imposed. That one step toward a stronger national centralization was necessary; the contest itself and the principles involved proved to every thinking, loyal mind which had studied with any care the problem. The extravagant idea of State rights held by many, and which had long been a thorn in the side of the National Government, had necessarily to be modified; and the public mind, which from the commencement of the rebellion was naturally drifting in this direction, readily acquiesced in this decision, as has been proved more than once by their votes at the polls. The status of the freedmen, which was one of the bitterest elements in the contest, had also to be so fixed that naught but revolution could ever change it. Here, then, was presented a problem such as no nation or party ever before had to grapple with; paradoxical in its propositions and apparently contradictory in its results, yet to be wrought out by the same forces and at the same time; a step toward centralization on the one hand was to be taken, while a long step was to be made on the other hand in widening the scope of freedom.

The problem presented to-day to the statesmen of France in order to produce a republic is less complicated than that presented to the republican party of the United States at the close of the war. Let what may be said of the politicians of to-day, let self-constituted judges and political scribblers cry them down as they may, I assert, and the future unbiased historian will confirm it, that no party in this or any other government has worked out with more consummate skill a greater national problem than the republican party has in this case, so far as these two great points are concerned. The sovereign power of our Government has become a fixed fact in the minds of the American people, never to be effaced, and yet the legitimate rights of the States are left untouched; the universality of freedom in our bounds has reached that point where it will never be challenged, and the odious name slave will never again appear on any of our statute-books. What the loyal and patriotic Union Army decided on the field of battle a republican Congress and administration have forever riveted and fixed upon our institutions. Let it not be said then by any one who is true to his country, who loves the Stars and Stripes, that this party has been unfaithful to the trusts reposed in it. Our dangers therefore, and we are not without them as I will presently show, lie not in this direction; these two points are forever settled; the theory of State supremacy and involuntary slavery lies buried in the grave with those who fell in their defense, and though these brave but mistaken and misguided men may, I hope, be resurrected to a happier and wiser life, these principles will forever sleep in the tomb of oblivion.

But, sir, in bringing back the country to its normal standard, not its exact ante bellum status, for this can never and ought never be done, but to that true normal standard which the Great Ruler of nations intended it to occupy, there were other questions to be solved, which although not so vital as those I have mentioned, were of scarcely less importance as affecting our progress and prosperity, especially politically.

The martial spirit which had been engendered by the war could not be at once dissipated at its close, nor was it wise to attempt it with too strong a hand, because it was necessary that those who had periled their lives in behalf of their country should receive their reward and approval from the people after their return to their homes. The patriot must feel that his devotion to his country is approved, otherwise his ardor is necessarily cooled. But more than this, the leaders of the party felt it absolutely necessary, notwithstanding they well knew its tendency to centralization, to keep alive this martial spirit until the great questions decided by the war should be incorporated in our institutions.

Victors in a republic are proverbially magnanimous. But the masses of the people when the causes of the contest are removed sometimes sweep rapidly and often without sufficient caution from one extreme to the other, unless guided by great prudence. It was necessary, therefore, for the party in power, in order to make peace permanent, to keep alive for a time the martial spirit, yet guard well its tendency toward centralization; for while Scylla was on one side Charybdis was on the other. In this difficult task the nation stood nobly by them and refused to place it in other hands.

But in this process, which necessarily required time and perseverance, some became impatient, urging that the gates which were for the time barred against the return of a portion of the rebellious element should be thrown wide open and all freely admitted. The result of this impatience, as is well known, was in part the cause of the formation of the so-called liberal party, which was not produced by an abandonment of any great principle settled by the war, but merely a difference of opinion in regard to the policy which should be pursued. But the partial withdrawal of many men then called leaders did not succeed in weakening the confidence of the people in the party which had brought them safely thus far through the fiery ordeal; again they stood nobly by it in its efforts to lead the nation gradually back to an enduring peace.

At last the time arrived when it was deemed proper and safe to remove the ban and re-admit to the right of joining in the administration of the Government all who desired this boon, and thus combine in our united whole every section and interest. This, as a matter of course, brought a new element into the solution of the yet not completely finished problem, who, by at once taking advantage of the dissatisfaction produced in the minds of many by the crash of 1873, have complicated the work of final restoration and peace, and are rapidly developing a system which bodes no good for the future.

I have already said that we need have no fear of another rebellion growing out of the doctrine of the supremacy of State rights, or of the slavery question, for these questions are forever settled. Our danger now lies in another quarter; nor is it that of centralization, for, although not wholly beyond the breakers which line this coast, yet the force of the indriving current has been broken. No, sir, the danger lies in another direction; nor are the indications which point toward that danger as few or faint as many seem to imagine.

THE COMBINATIONS IN VARIOUS INTERESTS TO AFFECT AND VITIATE LEGISLATION.

Labor and capital have become arrayed against each other to such an extent that it has been necessary again and again to call in the aid of the State to quell the riots resulting. In some cases even the General Government has been compelled to proceed with a strong hand against improper combinations intended to evade or violate our revenue laws. But, sir, the republican party is no more responsible for this than it is for the seasons of drought, the fierce storms of the past season, or the grasshopper raid; it is a natural outgrowth of that inordinate desire of gain and restless spirit born during the commotions of war. But to that party is due, sir, the credit of warning the people against the threatened evil and of first grapplingwith it, as it has with other encroaching evils. Through these efforts reaction has set in against this current, and crafty politicians watching closely the signs of the times have rushed to the front urging on the swaying element toward the other extreme, with the cry of rings! rings! rings! hoping thus to foist themselves into position and power.

The change in the political complexion of Congress just at this particular juncture, when circumstances had made it necessary to examine into certain frauds perpetrated upon the revenue of the Government, and also when the contest for the approaching presidential election began to be waged, the advantages of the position were at once seized upon by the opposition to institute a series of endless investigations. And the very willingness of the republican party to lay open its inmost heart to inspection and desire to root out the least remains of evil have been used as weapons to strike at its vital energies and as far as possible cripple it in the noble work it has been so patiently and faithfully performing.

Such a scene as is being carried on in the political arena was never before witnessed in our country. Committees of Congress, instead of devoting their time to the examination of the proper business before them, are transformed into inquisitorial bodies. In fact I may say, without any great exaggeration, that Congress seems to have been transformed into one great investigating body, an immense inquisitorial court, a national star chamber to hunt down characters and blast reputations. Why, sir, it would seem as though we had suddenly leaped backward into the distant past to gather models from the secret council of Venice, the Spanish inquisition, and the star chamber of James I, after which to mold the Congress of our centennial

A newspaper article concocted in the fertile brain of some reckless reporter charges a member of Congress who has always stood fair both in private and public as to morals and honesty with some act of corruption or some unfair or improper dealing. Forthwith a committee is charged with the work of investigating the matter and day after day is spent in this now all-important work, while the legitimate business of Congress is left hanging on the Calendar uncared for and unattended to. Witnesses from far and near, and at a cost to the Government of hundreds and thousands of dollars, are dragged to the capital, who, when examined, in five cases out of six can only state they know nothing about the matter in controversy. Here and there in the vast array of officials necessarily employed an occasional unfaithful one is found; and even these few not confined to one party, but belonging alike and in equal ratio to both.

Each unexplained private business transaction or unguarded silly letter, each mistake in calculation in an old account or more than ordinary attorney-fee, is deemed the opening of a mine of corruption and is heralded over the country as the commencement of a discovery which is to shock the country to its very center. One or two having been found unfaithful, the whole country is set ablaze with reports of astounding developments, and the cry goes forth that political heads are falling before the scythe of democratic reformers as

> Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks
> In Vallombrosa.

As one after another of these fancied revelations, these supposed mines of corruption, fade away as the facts are unfolded and the rays of truth fall upon them, and the chase begins to flag, a fresh relay of spies are sent out to ransack the records of those who stand most prominent before the country. The official files are carefully examined for a couple of decades back, each account is critically refigured and each letter found, carefully read. The very slum and filth of society is diligently scraped for witnesses, who for a momentary notoriety are ready to manufacture some tale of scandal. Worn-out lobbyists who for years have clung like parasites upon the skirts of Congress are rehabilitated and brought to the front as accusers of and evidence against perhaps the very men they have been boring and importuning for years to assist in passing some iniquitous measure they have again and again rejected. Even the lunatic asylums, prisons, jails, and penitentiaries are opened and lunatics and confessed criminals are brought forth as aids in these inquisitorial investigations, in order to blacken the character and stain the reputation of some prominent individual. The very graves are asked to aid and the dead to assist in this work of defamation; and in nearly all cases the accused party is not permitted to be present.

A new trade has suddenly come into operation, and a new art has sprung into existence in our midst—the trade of accuser of public men, and the art of manufacturing plausible stories to fit the accusations. An exemplary life and a character of unflinching honesty and integrity form no safeguard against the one or defense against the other; the only point to be determined is this, Is the individual in the way; or, Does he stand too prominent before the country? This is sufficient to mark him as a proper object for these inquisitorial onslaughts and to cause him to be tracked and trailed by secret spies, and every scrap of his past record, even to his private business matters, to be raked from their files and scrutinized. Private confidential letters written with unguarded faith in personal friendship are unearthed and brought to light and exposed to the prurient curiosity begotten and fostered by this unhealthy state of public morals. Personal honor, which should keep these sacred, is thrown to the dogs, and the mails and telegraph lines are burdened with grists which are poured into this mill of scandal to be ground out as food to feed public curiosity; a certain class of newsmongers become self-constituted spies; your coachman, your servant, and even your washerwoman, if possible, is set as a watch over your actions and made an evesdropper to catch each unguarded word.

Tell me, sir, what all this forebodes? For although the picture is painted in strong colors it is no stronger than the facts warrant. Is it a manifestation of a great desire to purify public morals; or is it an effort on the part of some to rise to prominence by slandering others? Does it indicate the dawn of unprecedented purity in political life; or of political recklessness and anarchy? Does it foreshadow the coming of a political millennium to be ushered in by democratic rule when congressional clerks shall all be saints and doorkeepers emblems of purity; when political leaders shall live without salaries and frauds be unknown? Or does it indicate a desire to put on pharisaical robes and wear broad phylacteries with mottoes culled from the records of democratic administrations?

Sir, history will not contradict itself, and if these things give us any warning, it is to beware of introducing into political rule and social life a system of espionage. It has ever been one of the precursors of a reign of anarchy and revolution. And although we may not have reason to fear in this case such extreme results as were brought upon France in 1789, yet we do have great reason to apprehend that its effect will be to unsettle and produce a state of confusion in political and social life. Faith in public honesty and private integrity will be destroyed, the management of our governmental affairs and political positions, instead of being placed in the hands of our best men, will eventually be handed over to those who can best ply the tricks of espionage and the arts of accusation and defamation. The political arena will become the hot-bed of gamesters and tricksters; and instead of purifying public morals, office-holding will be deemed an evidence of corruption and bribery, and its uncertain tenure will only cause the holder to ply more energetically his arts to gain wealth.

I am, sir, no advocate or defender of corruption or dishonesty in politics or business, and would be glad to know that every unfaithful servant and derelict officer would receive the just condemnation his error deserves. But this system of espionage and star-chamber investigation and defamation which is now being introduced into the political arena through the accidental turn of the wheel of political fortune, instead of working out this desired result, only tends to destroy faith in public men and to arouse suspicion and distrust in the minds of all, and thus sap the very foundations of our institutions. It is a double-edged weapon, and as often cuts the individual or party that wields it as the one at which it is aimed. Destroy faith and confidence in human integrity and honesty, and you necessarily produce dishonesty and corruption. Destroy faith in our public men and cause the people to believe that being in office or being in a public position is equivalent to being dishonest and corrupt, and you neces sarily destroy every incentive to honesty and integrity.

I am not standing here to-day, sir, as the apologist for any corruption or dishonesty which may be found in the republican party. Far be any such intention from me. No, sir, such is not my desire or intention. If it were true that under the rule of this party corruption and unfaithfulness had grown to an extent unknown under the administration of any other party, I would say at once to the people, "Hurl it from power and intrust your affairs to more faithful servants." But, sir, not only is the charge untrue in fact and without foundation, but also the figures themselves show that in proportion to the numbers of officials engaged and amounts disbursed no party has ever before administered the Government with so little loss as the one now in power. The opposition may affect a smile at this statement, and democratic papers may pretend to scout the assertion and hold up to public gaze a republican official or two who have proved unfaithful, but they dare not place the records side by side before the public as they are. I challenge them to the comparison.

Had the republican party adopted the method of concealing and covering up from public gaze the errors and frauds of its officials as did the democratic party when in power, the cry which has gone before the country would never have been heard.

I ask Senators and the public to look at the list of public thefts alone committed under the old democratic rule that has been made public and were almost forgotten by that party now held up to us as a pattern of honesty.

Thousands, tens of thousands, yea even hundreds of thousands at a single grab; not one, two, or three only, but scores, aggregating millions of dollars. Could you add to this the money extorted by officials for sale of offices, for granting contracts—as for example those of removing the Indians and furnishing Army supplies, and a thousand and one others of which the records give us no account—I would have a list before which all charged to the republican party sinks into insignificance.

But, sir, there is another reason why the few errors of this party are heralded before the country in such exaggerated style. Under the régime of the slave-power ignorance was purposely fostered, and education, except to the few, withheld. The masses were kept in ignorance of the guilt of their democratic saints, and it is only since the war these things are beginning to appear in all cases to the public. Under republican rule education has been fostered to an extent never before known in any country, and the great body of the people to-day stand in reference to education the peers of their rulers. So that even were it desired to cover up errors, which, thank God, the republican party does not try to do, it would be impossible to the extent that it was done in the days of democratic rule.

I repeat it, sir, I am not trying to-day to act the part of an apologist of the party to which I belong. That party has never attempted to avoid the closest scrutiny, and wherever any evidence of probable guilt existed has subjected its officers to the severest investigations. No, sir, the republican party needs no apologist; the facts fairly and correctly presented are all it desires. Even the investigations recently instituted have struck left as well as right, and as many and I believe more, have fallen in the democratic than in the republican ranks. Such, therefore, is not my object; it is a much higher and I trust a much more important one than this: it is to place before the Senate and the country in plain, unvarnished colors the course which is now being pursued in this respect and to call attention to the dangers which are likely to result if allowed to go on unchecked.

The motto which says "Do right though the heavens fall" is certainly a correct one, and so far as it becomes the duty of Congress to investigate the manner in which public officers have discharged their duties and fulfilled the trusts reposed in them it should be done thoroughly and fearlessly, no matter what may be the result to the party or administration. But, sir, I protest against investigations or trials proceeding upon the new principle which appears to have been incorporated into the political code of the present day, that "the accused is presumed to be guilty until he prove himself innocent." If this is to become the established rule in our congressional star-chamber proceedings we may expect ere long to see lettres de cachet issued by those in authority, and those who stand in their way quietly incarcerated in prison-cells.

In congressional investigations as well as in courts of law the only safeguard is to cling with unyielding grasp to that old and time-honored principle which lies at the very base of criminal law, that "the accused is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty."

But, sir, the primary object of investigations appears no longer to be to protect the revenues of the Government and correct errors, but to destroy the reputation of those who stand as prominent individuals before the country as candidates for the chief positions. Presidential candidates appear to have been the favorite game to be hunted down by these investigations; as soon as one is scented a pack of hounding spies and servile tools are set upon his trail to find, if possible, some transaction, some word, or some act upon which to hang an accusation, and as soon as the first bark is heard a host of ready and irresponsible witnesses are on hand to give testimony.

In the good old days of bards and chivalry there was a court fool who often spoke severe truths in the midst of his jests; so in our Sunday Jester of some time since I see this thing curtly but sharply expressed. Speaking of a western nomination, it says: "The moment the head of a candidate appears above water every one 'goes for him,' and in a few days his character looks as if the fly-wheel of the great Corliss engine had struck it." So long as this is confined to the attacks of individuals and the press we have nothing to do with it officially, no matter how much we may deprecate it; but when Congress or one of its committees is made use of as a weapon to assist in hunting down good names and slaughtering hitherto untarnished characters, it is high time for us to look whither we are tending; and especially does it behoove us to be alarmed at the prospect before us when in pursuit of this unworthy object the bounds of propriety and constitutional restrictions are transcended with impunity, when courts of inquisition unauthorized by our Constitution are set up and made the means and excuse for seizing private papers, ferreting out individual transactions.

If such, sir, is the result of the first slight taste of power by this disturbing element, what are we to expect should it through the effect of the swaying tide of human sentiment or the accidental turn of the political wheel of fortune come into full control of the Government? Already the want of faith in the possible integrity of Government officials is beginning to be riveted on the minds of our people, and yet at a time when there is in fact not near so much corruption relatively as during the palmy days of democratic rule. This if continued must eventually extend to social life and business transactions, and sap the very basis of society. It is time for us to have the moral courage to say to accusers of our public men and to scandalmongers that our public servants are presumed to be innocent, and that charges, to receive notice must be of serious character, properly presented, with a reasonable probability that they will be sustained, and coming legitimately within the purview of Congress. In other words, it is time for us to have the courage to say to all who come with their stories that we claim to be honest men; that we stand here as the representatives and defenders of honest men, and not of thieves; and that while we shirk no responsibility and fear no investigation, we deem the character of any and all good men too sacred to be tarnished or blackened by the mere statement of a scandal-vendor or by a newspaper squib. Sir, let all deeds stand forth, but let not the damnable crimes of treason and treachery to country be covered up by vile vilification and slander of the country's defenders and preservers. Democratic tactics are understood and will be laid bare to the world before this campaign is over. When a party will allow the poor and unfortunate to be murdered by wholesale merely because they will not vote the democratic ticket, is not the fact patent to all that by force and intimidation they expect to obtain power in the South, and by slander and a villainous system inaugurated they expect to obtain power in the North? Is it not true that every man who became prominent as a soldier during the war against the rebellion, that has stood by his guns and been faithful to the republican party, has been assailed in every way possible in order to destroy his influence with the people? But, sir, it has come to be a saying in this Chamber and in some of the feeble-minded newspapers that we are "shaking the bloody shirt" if we call attention to brutal wholesale murder of colored republicans. All I have to say in answer to that is that when democrats will stop staining the shirt with blood, we will quit shaking it; until then it will be shaken in the faces of an indignant people.

Sir, in my judgment a conspiracy exists to-day as much so as it did before the war to obtain possession of this Government by the means I have mentioned. Murder of negroes, intimidation of voters, with slander, falsehood, and every means possible to be used, so that the power that failed to destroy the Government by force of arms may now with their allies obtain possession and run it for their own political aggrandizement and gain. If they can control and govern, all well; if not, what then, sir?

Has not past experience given us the answer? What was their action heretofore when they lost political power? Rebellion, sir, was the resort.

Mr. President, is it possible that so soon the country is asked to trust them again?

No, Mr. President, the loyal people of this nation will not, in my opinion, wrest the political power and control now from the hands of those who saved the country because they loved it; those who preserved the flag because they cherished it; maintained the Constitution because they believed in it, and crushed slavery because they hated it: to place that power in the hands of those who trailed our flag in the dust because it was the emblem of liberty; trampled our Constitution under their feet because they respected it not; attempted to destroy our free Government because they hated it, and fought to maintain slavery because they loved it.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, some time ago I said that it was against my taste and judgment to enter into a political discussion on this floor; but it seems that on a mere resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Indiana asking for the printing of a certain number of copies of a message of the President of the United States an extended political discussion has again been forced upon the Senate. I do not know that I shall speak long; but not following the lead of the Senator from Vermont, I will not travel all over God's creation on this occasion, but will try at all events to adhere somewhat to the question before the Senate, unless I should happen to go off on the discussion with regard to the figures which were shown the other day, for everything, as I learn on the floor of the Senate, is to be discussed upon a mere resolution to print a certain number of copies of a message of the President of the United States. Now, what is it? In answer to a Senate resolution of July 20, 1876, calling for information in relation to the slaughter of American citizens at Hamburgh, South Carolina, this message came, and it was "read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed." What is it?

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of July 20, 1876, calling upon the President to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, any information in regard to the slaughter of American citizens at Hamburgh, South Carolina, I have the honor to submit the following inclosures, to wit:

No. 1. Letter of the 22d of July, 1876, from Governor D. H. Chamberlain, of South Carolina, to me.

No. 2. My reply thereto.

No. 3. Report of Hon. William Stone, attorney-general of South Carolina.

No. 4. Report of General H. W. Purvis, adjutant and inspector general of South Carolina.

No. 5. Copy of evidence taken before a coroner's jury investigating facts relating to the Hamburgh massacre.

No. 6. Printed copy of statement by M. C. Butler, of South Carolina.

No. 7. Printed letter from the same to the editors of the Journal of Commerce.

What the President of the United States had to do with that, God only knows; I do not. It was no public matter intrusted to the President of the United States.

No. 8. Copy of letter from Governor Chamberlain to Hon. T. J. ROBERTSON.

One would suppose that a member of the Senate was able to bring before the Senate his own information and his own letters.

No. 9. An address to the American people by the colored citizens of Charleston, South Carolina.

And what has that to do with this case, so far as the President of the United States is concerned?

No. 10. An address by a committee appointed at a convention of leading representatives of Columbia, South Carolina.

And now comes—

No. 11. Copy of letter of July 15, 1876, from the district attorney of Mississippi to the Attorney-General of the United States,

In response to an inquiry from the Senate of the United States in regard to a transaction at Hamburgh, South Carolina!

No. 12. Letter from same to same.

No. 13. Copy of report of a grand jury lately in session in Oxford, Mississippi.

All this in answer to an inquiry of the Senate of the United States with regard to certain transactions at Hamburgh, South Carolina. What does the President say?

These inclosures embrace all the information in my possession touching the late disgraceful and brutal slaughter of unoffending men at the town of Hamburgh, South Carolina. My letter to Governor Chamberlain contains all the comments I wish to make on the subject. As allusion is made in that letter to the condition of other States, and particularly to Louisiana and Mississippi, I have added to the inclosures letters and testimony in regard to the lawless condition of a portion of the people of the latter State.

In regard to Louisiana affairs, murders and massacres of innocent men for opinion's sake, or on account of color, have been of too recent date and of too frequent occurence to require recapitulation or testimony here. All are familiar with their horrible details, the only wonder being that so many justify them or apologize for them.

But recently a committee—

And I desire the Senate to mark this, whether they print the 10,000 copies or not—

But recently a committee of the Senate of the United States visited the State of Mississippi to take testimony on the subject of frauds and violence in elections. Their report has not yet been made public; but I await its forthcoming with a feeling of confidence that it will fully sustain all that I have stated relating to fraud and violence in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. President, I will try to keep within the rules of order; I will try to remember the high position occupied by the President of the United States, for I honor the office, whether I do its occupant or not. Now, the first inquiry here is, what information did the Senate require of the President of the United States? Information in relation to the slaughter of American citizens at Hamburgh, South Carolina. What does the President of the United States in answering that resolution of inquiry, a very proper resolution of inquiry, and one with which no member on this floor, on either side, finds the slightest fault? It may have been proper. I will not go into the motives of the honorable Senator from Indiana. I will not talk about the bloody shirt, for fear that the Senator from Vermont will say that such language is not elegant language and not worthy this Chamber. The inquiry was put to the President of the United States, and the duty of the President of the United States was either to withhold the information regarding that matter because it was not proper to give it, or to give it, and then stop; and before I get through I will satisfy, if not the Senate, the country, that the President of the United States has gone out of the line that becomes the dignity of the office.

Sir, the Senate asked for information regarding an occurrence at Hamburgh, South Carolina. If public policy warranted the President in giving that information, then he was in duty bound to give it; if public policy demanded that he should withhold that information, then he should have withheld it. But he goes further, and becomes a volunteer in this matter. The President of the United States arraigns—I understand the word I use, and its full value and its full meaning—he dares to arraign the people of two States in this Union about whom no inquiry was made by the Senate of the United States Sir, what business had the President of the United States to under take to volunteer information to this body, his equal in point of intelligence? What business had he to volunteer information to members of this body with regard to matters in Louisiana and Mississippi? Sir, he goes further, and one would have supposed either that the chairman of the committee [Mr. BOUTWELL] or the representative of the minority of the committee, [Mr. BAYARD]—and either of those gentlemen will take the remark kindly, I know—had informed him exactly what their report would be, and what the facts were that they had found.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will indulge me a moment I will suggest to him what business he had. Section 3 of the second article of the Constitution imposes upon him this duty——

Mr. EATON. Be kind enough to tell me the page, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Page 45 of the Manual.

He shall from time to time—

Mr. EATON. Wait one moment, if you please. Now go on; I I think I have had my attention directed to that.

Mr. DAWES.

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union—

Mr. EATON. That is all, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Not quite.

Mr. EATON. I submit——

Mr. DAWES.

and recommend——

Mr. EATON. I submit to no further interruption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. DAWES. Will you not allow me to continue the reading?

Mr. EATON. I submit to no further interruption. I should have come to that in a moment. It is to the Congress of the United States that the President is to submit information. I shall arrive at that before I get through with this business. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts may possess his soul in patience. I will reach that, as much of it as he will like. What business, I ask again, had the President of the United States to become a volunteer to charge upon the people of Louisiana and Mississippi these outrages which he speaks of? If it was his duty, and now I call the attention of my honorable friend from Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. I have been giving my friend from Connecticut my undivided attention, and I solicited the opportunity of answering, but the Senator objected.

Mr. EATON. You will get the opportunity by and by, not now. I ask your attention now, not your words but your attention. Let every Senator hear what I say and answer it if he can, any way, now or at any time. Did the President of the United States under his oath of office have any authority to communicate information to the Senate under that section of the Constitution to which the Senator directed my attention and which I had upon my brief?

He shall from time to time give to the Congress—information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

Mr. President, let us look at this act of the Executive, for he is only a man. If there have been outrages in the State of Louisiana; if there have been outrages in the State of Mississippi, such as demanded the attention and action of the Executive of the United States, his oath of office, the oath which he has taken, should have compelled him to communicate that information to the Congress of the United States. Such is the organic law of the land, binding alike on Presidents, and Senators, and people. He is one of the people, and one only; yet he dares to arraign the people of two States and bring them before the Senate of the United States and before the country of which he is President and does not, according to the oath of his office, give to the Congress of the United States any information which he has at hand. I hope that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has learned by this time that I have not forgotten that clause in the Constitution. If Louisiana had been suffering, it was the duty of the executive of Louisiana to call upon the President of the United States for the interposition of the power of the United States if the Legislature of Louisiana was not in session. I will read that clause of the Constitution:

The United States shall guarantee to every State of this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

If there was any danger of domestic violence in the State of Louisiana, then it became the duty of the executive of Louisiana, if the Legislature was not in session and could not be easily convened, to inform the President of the United States that there was trouble in his State and ask for the assistance of the United States. If there was trouble in the State of Mississippi, it was the duty of the Legislature of Mississippi, if in session, or of the governor if the Legislature was not in session and could not be convened, to notify the President of the United States; and then it would have been the duty of the President of the United States to have notified Congress, now in session here, of what was transpiring in those two States and demand, if he required it, the action of Congress upon that matter. Who will deny it? I will give way to any honorable Senator to answer. Was there any other course for the President of the United States to pursue and be honest to himself and honest to his oath? Has he done either of these things? He has not, but he has ventured to enter the political arena as an informer. That is what he has ventured to do. He has dared to arraign two States of this Union. If what he says is true, why has he not informed Congress of it under his oath of office? Therefore I say here, and let it go before the country with this message, that it is not true; it is false. I know whereof I speak. I make the charge boldly that it is false. There is no truth in this message with regard to Louisiana. I will come to Carolina by and by. I will take these things up by piecemeal. There is no truth in this message with regard to Louisiana and Mississippi, because if it is true he is forsworn if he has not given that information to the Congress of the United States as the Constitution of the United States forces him to do.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Yes, sir; with great pleasure.

Mr. McMILLAN. At the time this message was delivered and the report of the grand jury of the United States which accompanies the President's message was made, I desire to ask the Senator whether there was any application for aid from the State of Mississippi, and further to ask him whether it is not a democratic governor and a democratic Legislature which govern Mississippi at this time and at the time that message was presented to the Senate?

Mr. EATON. Well, I will take these things up. There are a good many questions. But first the Senator asks me if it is not a democratic Legislature and a democratic governor that govern Mississippi. I do not know. I hope so. It would be some sign of good government if there be such. Next he asks me if the grand jury were in session at a particular time.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; I asked whether at the time the report of the grand jury of a United States court which accompanies this message was sent to the President the governor of Mississippi and the Legislature of Mississippi were not democratic, and whether any application for aid was made at that time to the President of the United States?

Mr. EATON. That is very possible; but the Senator does not escape out of that hole. It is too small.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am endeavoring to make no escape.

Mr. EATON. Let me answer the first question, and then I will hear another. The Senator insinuates that there have been outrages here which a democratic governor and a democratic Legislature have not brought to the notice of the United States. That he insinuates. That I deny.

Mr. McMILLAN. I insinuated only——

Mr. EATON. One moment. I have not yet got though; when I do, I will give you the floor. He next intimates that the President of the United States received this information from a grand jury because he could not get it from a governor. Very well; now I will suppose all that true. If he got it from a grand jury, why did he not under his oath of office give his information to the Congress of the United States and not to the Senate upon an inquiry relating to a riot at Hamburgh, South Carolina? Now I will hear the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. I make no insinuations in any respect whatever. I proposed to the Senator from Connecticut simple questions in response to a statement of his upon the floor of the Senate as a Senator of the United States that facts stated by the President in his message to the Senate first, stated by the foreman of the grand jury of a United States court in his report to the court, are false. The Senator has stated that the statements in the message are false, and those statements are embodied in the report of the grand jury of the United States to the United States court.

Mr. EATON. Is the honorable Senator through? I stated this, and I state it again, and let it go to the country for what it is worth, that if the President of the United States is true to his oath of office, and he has received any information of this character regarding the condition of Mississippi, it is his duty to report it to Congress. That is what I say; and therefore I do not believe this trash anyway.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator denied in his place in the Senate that the facts were true, and put himself at issue with the statements in the message of the President of the United States distinctly and flatly.

Mr. EATON. Do you know they are true?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do, sir.

Mr. EATON. How do you know?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am at liberty now to state that I know it by the testimony of innumerable witnesses delivered before a committee of this Senate under oath.

Mr. EATON. I might not believe that.

Mr. McMILLAN. Sent there for the special purpose of making the investigation.

Mr. EATON. I might not believe that, for I have heard that some of them are not worthy of belief. No matter——

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator may not believe any truth.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman cannot drag me out of my course; it is not in his power. What I said was this, and the people know it; the Senate know it; that if there was any such information as this, it was the duty of the President under his oath of office to give it to the Congress of the United States, and therefore I do not believe it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. I will not submit to further interruption.

Mr. McMILLAN. I merely desire to have the Senator retain the position which he chooses to occupy. That is a direct statement that the facts were not true.

Mr. EATON. I did not say so.

Mr. McMILLAN. I appeal to the record.

Mr. EATON. When the Senator from Minnesota asserts that, he asserts on this floor what I did not say.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am content to rest that with every member of the Senate present when the Senator made the declaration.

Mr. EATON. What I said was this, and I say it again; it is not for that Senator to make a question of veracity with me——

Mr. McMILLAN. I make no question of veracity.

Mr. EATON. It does not belong to him or to me to make a question of veracity. I appeal to gentlemen whom I see in my eye if what I said was not just what I say now, that it was the sworn duty of the President of the United States if these things were true to bring them before the Congress of the United States and he had failed to do that, and therefore I did not believe that they were true. That is just what I said exactly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before that the Senator made the distinct statement, and I appeal to the report of his speech.

Mr. EATON. Is there any further question of veracity between the Senator from Minnesota and myself? I have explained this thing exactly as I understand what I said, and I do not believe there is a Senator within the sound of my voice except the Senator from Minnesota who does not agree with me.

Now, sir, I give it as my deliberate opinion as a Senator of the United States, having in view my own position, having in view the honor of the State which I in part represent on this floor, that the President of the United States has traveled outside of his line of duty. Sir, he is not your master, nor mine, thank God. The time has not yet come when a President of the United States can do acts that would not be tolerated in any member of this Senate and yet not be subject to rebuke. Sir, this is a political slander, a political slander against the democratic party of the United States. The very reading of the last clause settles that. Let us look at it:

Their report has not yet been made public—

He had no right to know anything about it; he had no right to know a word of it any more than I. It was a report to be made from a committee of this body to this body, not to anybody else. And yet he says:

Their report has not yet been made public; but I await its forthcoming with a feeling of confidence that it will fully sustain all that I have stated relating to fraud and violence in the State of Mississippi.

Is this so? Did the committee of this body who were bound to report to this body give information to the President of the United States so that he might volunteer this to the world when he was not required to give it? Sir, I leave that question to answer itself or be answered hereafter by somebody else.

Now it is asked that this political slander, this charge against two of the sovereign States—I do not know that the Senator from Vermont will like that term, but I shall continue to use it as long as I remain a Senator upon this floor; his State chooses to use it and so does mine—that this political slander against two of the sovereign States of this Union shall be published to the extent of 10,000 extra copies to be paid for with democratic money, at least half of it. I wish my friends on that side would pay their own bills. When we desire to publish a slander of this kind, if we do desire it, and I hope we never shall, against the republican party, we will pay the bills ourselves; we will not ask our republican friends to join with us to pay the expenses of the transaction.

Senators have said on this floor, the honorable Senator from Indiana, whom I do not now see in his seat, and I regret to speak of an absent Senator, ventured to say on this floor, regardless of the amenities and courtesies that ought to govern Senators, that there were Senators here who dared not—dared not was the language; sir, I am within the rule of all parliamentary discussion; I will not be outside of it—he said there were Senators on this side of the House who dared not speak against this outrage in South Carolina. Sir, that was not courteous; that was outside of the amenities that govern in courteous deliberative assemblies. I trust that my honorable friend from Indiana in using that language used it in heat, without thought or reflection. He does not mean to say; he does not dare to say—let me use that word now toward him as he has used it—no, I take it back, sir; I regret that I have used it—he does not mean to say that honorable gentlemen occupying seats upon this floor would fail under any circumstances to denounce a cowardly outrage. He does not mean it; he cannot mean it. It cannot be true, and therefore he cannot mean it. I do not mean to accuse him of falsehood; far from it; but I mean to say that he spoke in the heat of debate. He would no more say that to my honorable friends from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] or Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] or North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] than they would say it to him; that he was afraid to denounce a man who had picked a pocket, for the inference would be that he was in league with the pickpocket. Whenever an assertion of that kind is made, the inference is that the parties who dare not denounce the act are in league with the men who would be guilty of an outrage that nobody can defend.

Sir, I admire and have admired for years the consistency and pluck of my honorable friend from Indiana. He certainly is deserving of the admiration of us all. Physically weak in his condition, he is yet here in his seat almost always. I am always glad to see him here; but I do not always admire his language any more than my friend from Vermont admires the courtesy and the elegance of the expression "bloody shirt." Let us look for a moment at another expression that my honorable friend from Indiana used that to me is laughable in its utter absurdity. He spoke with great and vigorous vehemence when he said that Tilden dare not say anything in his letter of acceptance against this Hamburgh matter. Well, upon my word, Mr. President, of all the laughable things that I have ever dreamed or heard of in my life it is that a man nominated for a public office, the highest public office in the land, should go dribbling about massacres or anything else, either massacres in Hamburgh or stealings in the Treasury Department, either massacres in Hamburgh or stealings in Saint Louis. I should hardly have supposed that Governor Hayes, in his letter of acceptance, would go to Saint Louis and would pitch into those rascals who had been stealing in the whisky ring there. I should rather have supposed that he would say what he did say, that the civil service of the Government should hereafter be honestly cared for in every Department of the Government. I do not intend to give his exact language, but I mean to give certainly the language of a gentleman. I think that is about the substance of what he said.

But my friend said Tilden dare not, he repeated it four times, that Tilden dared not introduce into his letter of acceptance anything about this Hamburgh massacre because—now look at it, look at the animus—because he expected certain southern States to vote for him in the fall. Mr. President, as a member of the democratic party, as a personal and political friend of that great man who is its leader in the coming battle, I say that that remark of the Senator from Indiana is an insult, an insult to the man, an insult to the party, an insult to every man who stands in the line of the democratic party. It ought not to have been made. Sir, the democratic party, from my friend, Mr. Tilden, down to myself, one of its humblest members, condemn crime everywhere; and it is not for the Senator from Indiana or any other man of God Almighty's molding to charge on the party to which I belong an offense of that character. If he does, I throw it back in his face as false and not to be tolerated among gentlemen on this floor, and it will not be tolerated without rebuke so long as I have the honor to be a member of this body, no matter who the man may be that makes the allegation.

Sir, it would be a nice state of affairs if Hon. Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, renowned as a public man of great sagacity, should have traveled to Washington and have obtained from the Senator from Indiana proper language in which to couch his letter of acceptance! Is it not a great pity that he did not consult the honorable Senator from Indiana as to what language he should use in his letter of acceptance? As he did not consult him, I desire the Secretary to read what I send to the desk, that shows the difference between the Senator from Indiana and the gentlemen who is the banner-bearer of the democratic party.

The Secretary read as follows:

The necessity of a reform in the scale of public expense, Federal, State, and municipal, and in the modes of Federal taxation, justifies all the prominence given to it in the declaration of the Saint Louis convention. The present depression in all the business and industries of the people, which is depriving labor of its employments and carrying want into so many homes, has its principal cause in excessive governmental consumption. Under the illusions of a specious prosperity, engendered by the false policies of the Federal Government, a waste of capitalhas been going on ever since the peace of 1865, which could only end in universal disaster.

The Federal taxes of the last eleven years reach the gigantic sum of $4,500,000,000. Local taxation has amounted to two-thirds as much more. The vast aggregate is not less than $7,500,000,000. This enormous taxation followed a civil conflict that had greatly impaired our aggregate wealth and had made a prompt reduction of expenses indispensable. It was aggravated by the most unscientific and ill-adjusted methods of taxation that increased the sacrifices of the people far beyond the receipts of the Treasury. It was aggravated, moreover, by a financial policy which tended to diminish the energy, skill, and economy of production and the frugality of private consumption, and induced miscalculation in business and an unremunerative use of capital and labor. Even in prosperous times the daily wants of industrious communities press closely upon their daily earnings. The margin of possible national savings is at best a small percentage of national earnings. Yet now for these eleven years governmental consumption has been a larger portion of the national earnings than the whole people can possibly save even in prosperous times for all new investments.

The consequences of these errors are now a present public calamity. But they never were doubtful, never invisible. They were necessary and inevitable, and were foreseen and depicted when the waves of that fictitious prosperity ran highest.

In a speech made by me on the 24th of September, 1869, it was said of these taxes: They bear heavily upon every man's income, upon every industry, and every business in the country, and year by year they are destined to press still more heavily unless we arrest the system that gives rise to them. It was comparatively easy when values were doubling under repeated issues of legal-tender paper money to pay out of the froth of our growing and apparent wealth these taxes; but when values recede and sink toward their natural scale the tax-gatherers take from us not only our income, not only our profits, but also a portion of our capital. I do not wish to exaggerate or alarm. I simply say that we cannot afford the costly and ruinous policy of the radical majority of Congress. We cannot afford that policy toward the South. We cannot afford the magnificent and oppressive centralism into which our Government is being converted. We cannot afford the present magnificent scale of taxation. To the Secretary of the Treasury I said early in 1865, there is no royal road for a government more than for an individual or a corporation. What you want to do now is to cut down your expenses and live within your income.

I would give all the legerdemain of finance and financiering, I would give the whole of it for the old homely maxim: "Live within your income." This reform will be resisted at every step, but it must be pressed persistently. We see to-day the immediate representatives of the people in one branch of Congress while struggling to reduce expenditures compelled to confront the menace of the Senate and Executive. Unless the objectionable appropriations be consented to, the operations of the Government thereunder shall suffer detriment or cease. In my judgment an amendment of the Constitution ought to be devised separating into distinct bills the appropriations for the various departments of the public service and excluding from each bill all appropriations for other objects and all independent legislation. In that way alone can the revisory power of each of the two Houses and of the Executive be preserved and exempted from the moral duress which often compels assent to objectionable appropriations rather than stop the wheels of the Government.

An accessory cause, enhancing the distress in business, is to be found in the systematic and unsupportable misgovernment imposed on the States of the South. Besides the ordinary effects of an ignorant and dishonest administration, it has inflicted upon them an enormous issue of fraudulent bonds, the scanty avails of which were wasted or stolen, and the existence of which is a public discredit, tending to bankruptcy or repudiation. Taxes, generally oppressive, in some instances have confiscated the entire income of property and totally destroyed its marketable value. It is impossible that these evils should not react upon the prosperity of the whole country. The nobler motives of humanity concur with the material interests of all in requiring that every obstacle be removed to a complete and durable reconciliation between kindred populations, once unnaturally estranged, on the basis recognized by the Saint Louis platform, of the "Constitution of the United States with its amendments universally accepted, as a final settlement of the controversies which engendered civil war." But in aid of a result so beneficent the moral influence of every good citizen, as well as every governmental authority, ought to be exerted, not alone to maintain their just equality before the law, but likewise to establish a cordial fraternity and good-will among citizens, whatever their race or color, who are now united in the one destiny of a common self-government. If the duty shall be assigned to me, I should not fail to exercise the powers with which the laws and the Constitution of our country clothe its Chief Magistrate to protect all its citizens, whatever their former condition, in every political and personal right.

Reform is necessary, declares the Saint Louis convention, to establish a sound currency, restore the public credit, and maintain the national honor; and it goes on to demand a judicious system of preparation by public economies, by official retrenchments, and by wise finance, which shall enable the nation soon to assure the whole world of its perfect ability and its perfect readiness to meet any of its promises at the call of the creditors entitled to payment. The object demanded by the convention is a resumption of specie payments on the legal-tender notes of the United States. That would not only restore the public credit and maintain the public honor, but it would establish a sound currency for the people. The methods by which this object is to be pursued and the means by which it is to be attained are disclosed by what the convention demanded for the future and by what it denounced in the past.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, these are the words, not of a lunatic, but these are the words of a sagacious, far-seeing statesman; a man who knows what he is talking about. Think of it for one moment, let it come home to this Senate that within eleven years there have been taken from the pockets of the people more than $7,500,000,000 in the way of taxes. Sir, the income of the people, as Mr. Tilden says, cannot stand this drain upon their resources. It is utterly impossible that they can stand it. We hope to see the same change in the United States after the election of Samuel J. Tilden, which I do not permit myself to doubt as I am not a heretic, that has occurred in the State of New York. The taxation of the State of New York before the accession of Mr. Tilden to power was $16,000,000 annually. After his accession to power it was $8,000,000. Now I desire every Senator to coolly and deliberately take the opinion which I utter into consideration. I say we cannot stand it, and nobody knows better than my distinguished friend from Massachusetts whom I now have in my eye, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that we cannot stand a continued taxation of $750,000,000 a year; the industries of the people will not warrant it; and therefore I say on the floor of the Senate, with the responsibility of a Senator attached to my saying, that four years more of personal government of this sort and you cannot pay your debts at all. I commend this to the consideration of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who gave me some tables to which I shall allude before I get through, that the United States are now paying and have been paying for the last eleven years $750,000,000 a year in the shape of taxes. They cannot stand under it; the industries of the country do not admit of a payment of that sum in the way of taxes; and therefore if this matter is continued for four years longer down go your notes and down goes the price of your bonds. There must be a change here such as there was in New York, where instead of $16,000,000 a year the taxation was reduced to $8,000,000 a year, and instead of $144,000,000 or $150,000,000 a year for the carrying on of the Government of the United States the figures must be brought down to $85,000,000 or $90,000,000 a year, so that the surplus may go to pay the debt of the country and thus keep its bonds at their price and keep its currency where it now is.

But I did not mean to be drawn into a discussion of that sort. It only came from a remark which Mr. Tilden used in his letter of acceptance. It will do to read again:

The nobler motives of humanity concur with the material interests of all in requiring that every obstacle be removed to a complete and durable reconciliation between kindred populations once unnaturally estranged on the basis recognized by the Saint Louis platform of the "Constitution of the United States, with its amendments universally accepted as a final settlement of the controversies which engendered civil war;" but in aid of a result so beneficent to the moral influence of every citizen, as well as every governmental authority, ought to be exerted, not alone to maintain their just equality before the law, but likewise to establish cordial, fraternal, and good-will among citizens, whatever their race and color, who are now united in the one destiny of a common self-government. If the duty shall be assigned to me I should not fail to exercise the powers with which the laws and the Constitution of our country clothe its Chief Magistrate to protect all its citizens, whatever their former condition, in every political and personal right.

Mr. President, if this be false, no matter what was said could not add to it; but if it be true, in the name of the common Father of us all, what more can be asked from any living man, a candidate for any place? If he is false to that, untrue to it, if he wrote it for the purposes of deceit and deception, if he wrote it for the purposes of getting votes, and not from a high sense of duty and honor, then of course the words mean nothing; but if as an honest man, if as a representative man of one-half of all the intelligence of this broad land, no, not one-half, but all of it; I say if he wrote it as an honest man, and as a representative of me, and you, and you and all the other democrats of this broad land, then the man who would ask for more is not honest; the man who would sneer at it would sneer at his dying mother. I say, sir, it is all that an honorable man says if he means it, and, God helping me, I believe he does; in my heart of hearts, I believe he does. I mean it. I mean the country to understand that he means it. The man who stands upon this floor, or any other floor, and undertakes to sneer down the honest language of an honest man may go before the people and they will sneer him down.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Senator yields to me——

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless the Senator from Connecticut himself desires an adjournment, I think we had better finish this political discussion and go on with important business to-morrow.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Ohio should recollect that it is extremely hot, and I am tired. I have agreed to yield for an adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator desires it himself, I shall not object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish the Senator to go on if it is not convenient for him.

Mr. EATON. I do not care whether I go on in the morning, if there is anything particular to be done then, or the next day or next week if we are going to stay here that long.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am afraid we are, and I suggest whether it would not be well to lay this aside informally and take up the subject that was before us when this was taken up.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Connecticut ought to have the privilege of concluding his speech. If this goes over it may not be taken up again.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no danger of that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like, if that motion could be withdrawn, to move for an executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 7, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

Several gentlemen rose and addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can recognize no gentleman, except for a correction of the Journal, before the morning hour to-day.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HARRISON. I think I am entitled to the floor to correct the RECORD as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. I find, sir, that in the RECORD of August 4, under the head of "Correction of error in enrollment," a motion was made by Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, to correct a bill. I find also in the proceedings of the Senate in the RECORD of August 5 that one of the Senators spoke of these corrections and errors in enrollment as of frequent occurrence. I wish, in behalf of the Committee on Enrolled Bills and also of the clerk, to state that these were not errors of enrollment, but were errors in the original bills. The bills were enrolled properly, and the gentleman who compared them, [Mr. BAKER, of New York,] who is now absent, feels it due to him that this correction should be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour commences at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock, and this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing.

TRACKS OF BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4066) requiring the removal of the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from certain streets in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in full, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ENGINEER CORPS.

Mr. BALLOU introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4067) to promote efficiency in the Engineer Corps; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in full, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. JANE B. WILCOX.

Mr. MEADE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4068) for the relief of Mrs. Jane B. Wilcox, of Jefferson County, in the State of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE. I call for the reading of that bill.

The bill was read in full, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT A. M'DONALD.

Mr. STENGER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4069) granting a pension to Robert A. McDonald; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH W. REED.

Mr. STENGER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4070) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Reed; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELIAS D. BRUNNER.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4071) granting a pension to Elias D. Brunner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT.

Mr. O'BRIEN (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4072) to provide for cheap transportation of freight between tide-water on or near the Atlantic Ocean and the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask that the bill be read at length.

Mr. FORT. I cannot see any reason for reading that bill; it is already printed.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire that the bill be read, in order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] may be informed as to its provisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] has a right to have the bill read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill; but before concluding,

Mr. SPRINGER said: I ask that the further reading of this bill be dispensed with. I believe the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] does not insist upon the further reading.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill; but before concluding,

Mr. LAWRENCE said: I suppose this reading is for the purpose of consuming the morning hour. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to introduce a joint resolution to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of this bill, and then he can introduce his joint resolution when the State of Ohio is called.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, I ask that the further reading be dispensed with.

There was no objection; and the bill, without further reading, was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4073) to amend section 2997 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I send a resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be so amended as to allow the committees of investigation to report at any time during this session.

Mr. HURLBUT. Simple House resolutions are not in order under this call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are not in order under this call.

Mr. HURLBUT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COX. This resolution can be offered under the second call of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be a second call.

Mr. LEVY. I desire to introduce a bill for the relief of John F. Cheney, a resident of Feliciana Parish, in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HALE. Let it be read.

Mr. COX. I desire to raise a point of order in regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] By reference to page 205 of Barclay's Digest——

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] rises to a point of order.

Mr. COX. My point of order is that by reference to Barclay's Digest, page 205, the following will be found:

A resolution to amend the rules may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules during the first call of the States and Territories in the morning hour of Monday, and thus constitutes notice, according to the usages of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If this is a resolution to amend the rules for reference to the Committee on Rules, it was clearly in order under this call. At the time the resolution was read the attention of the Chair was taken up by members speaking to him, and the Chair supposed it was a simple House resolution. The point of order of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is well taken. A resolution to amend the rules for reference to the Committee on Rules is in order during the first call of the morning hour, and constitutes the notice required for an amendment of the rules. The resolution, therefore, will be referred to the Committee on Rules, and printed.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the motion to refer by substituting the Committee on Appropriations for the Committee on Rules; and upon that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that reference.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman may object to it, and can show his objection by voting against it.

Mr. RANDALL. A proposition to change the rules should go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HALE. That is not a debatable motion, and I call for the regular order.

Mr. COX. I raise the point of order that the gentleman cannot make that motion.

Mr. HALE. This is the first time I ever heard the point made that a change of reference cannot be moved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot deprive the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] of his right to move to amend the motion to refer. The House can do what it pleases about the amendment.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Maine made his motion too late. The Chair certainly had stated that the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HALE. I rose in my place before the Chair made any announcement.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a point of order, and I desire the Chair to hear it, because it is a legitimate one. My point of order is that under the rules of the House a resolution to amend the rules must be referred to the Committee on Rules. We can only suspend a rule of the House by a two-thirds vote. A motion which may be ordinarily carried by a majority vote, such as a motion to refer some matter to the Committee on Appropriations, is not in order in this case, because the rule requires a resolution for an amendment of the rules to be referred to the Committee on Rules, and that rule cannot be suspended except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that the Chair has any doubt about the matter, but the answer to that point is that, although the rule declares that all subject-matters shall be referred to their appropriate committees, it has always been held that during the morning hour of Monday a motion may be made to refer a bill or resolution to any committee, and that motion must be voted upon.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say that as this proceeding, suggested by the gentleman from New York, is one which revolutionizes the proceedings of legislation, I would like to hear read the rule under which the Committee on Rules is appointed, that we may ascertain what authority the House has over this subject.

Mr. RANDALL. In what respect does this resolution revolutionize anything?

Mr. BANKS. Because under this rule, before four o'clock to-day, this House can have abolished the Supreme Court of the United States and placed upon the bench of that court any number of its members that it may choose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose any bill which the House might pass would have to be concurred in by the Senate and approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. BANKS. I am speaking of the action of the House.

Mr. COX. There is no revolution about this proposition; it is only intended to facilitate business.

Mr. BANKS. I ask for the reading of the rule which authorizes the appointment of the Committee on Rules, so that we may know what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman be kind enough to send the rule to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BANKS. It is not for me to send the rule to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COX. I understand there are only three minutes left of this hour. I desire the Chair to decide this question, so that I may have the benefit of the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think I can answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] The authority in the case is the same as the authority for nine-tenths of our legislation.

Mr. BANKS. I do not want to hear anything about the other nine-tenths.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I beg permission to say that the authority is a decision made by the last House on an appeal from the ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine, that a resolution to amend the rules could be referred to the Committee on Rules in the morning hour of Monday. That decision will be found on page 205 of the Digest.

Mr. BANKS. That decision of the Speaker is perfectly right—that a resolution to change the rules can be presented in the morning hour of Monday; that is by an express provision; but I want to know what the authority is for the appointment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX. I do not want to have the morning hour exhausted, as time is of the essence of this matter. It has never been disputed that all resolutions to amend the rules go to the Committee on Rules as of course; and no motion to refer to another committee is in order.

Mr. BANKS. Such a proposition as this does not go to the Committee on Rules as of course; and it never has been suggested in this House that when a proposition is made to refer a subject to one committee, the substitution of another committee might not be proposed by way of amendment. That is always allowed; and the motion of the gentleman from Maine is clearly in order.

Mr. HALE. The matter of reference must be for the House to settle.

Mr. COX. I will ask the Chair whether, under the rules, this is notice of this resolution? That is all I wish. I do not ask to have the resolution adopted now. I desire only to give the notice required by the rule.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to repeat his last statement, which the Chair did not hear.

Mr. COX. My last statement was that the offering of this resolution, whatever may be the action of the House upon it, is tantamount to notice, which is all I desire at this time, so that the Committee on Rules may bring the resolution back at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the decision of the Speaker of the last House it certainly is notice. During the last session the then Speaker of the House, as the Chair remembers, ruled distinctly that it was in order to present during the first call of the morning hour of Monday a resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules, and by implication that it was not in order to present it for any other reference; and that such presentation was tantamount to the notice required under the rules for a proposition to amend the rules. The Chair therefore holds that this resolution must be referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair overrule my motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does overrule it.

Mr. HALE. Then I take an appeal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. HALE. Then, as I understand, this matter is hung up on the appeal. It is not an agreeable thing for me to take an appeal from the decision of the Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will certainly entertain the appeal.

Mr. HALE. Then the matter stands suspended on the appeal.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has made the appeal after the expiration of the morning hour; and it is too late.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the appeal is entertained, I move to lay it on the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Pending that, I make the point of order that the morning hour has expired and this matter goes over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour does not necessarily expire unless some business of higher privilege arises to bring it to a close. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the Chair state his ruling from which the appeal is taken, so that the House may understand the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided it is in order during the first call on Monday to introduce a simple resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules; that its introduction and reading at that time is equivalent to notice; and reference to the Committee on Rules is in order at that time; that it is not in order during the morning hour of Monday to introduce a simple House resolution for reference to any other committee except the Committee on Rules. From that decision the gentleman from Maine takes an appeal.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair rules that it is not in order to move an amendment to the reference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has simply decided that it is not in order during the morning hour of Monday to introduce a simple House resolution for reference to any other committee.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. One question of order is already pending and the gentleman cannot rise to another as under the rules two points of order cannot be pending at the same time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thought the gentleman from Maine rose in reference to this same matter.

Mr. HALE. It is on the same matter. I want the ruling of the Chair distinctly as to the position of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York. I made a motion to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations, and the Chair overruled that motion. I reluctantly, only to save the point, took an appeal. Pending that the morning hour expired. I ask the Chair to state where the resolution is, because it claimed it is now in the Committee on Rules. I ask the Chair to rule where that resolution is. If it has gone to the Committee on Rules, then the appeal is useless.

Mr. RANDALL. It has gone to the committee by the decision of the Chair, and until that decision is reversed it will remain there.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a vote on my motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I demand a division of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 110, no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Before the vote is taken I should like to inquire of the Chair whether the resolution has not already gone to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is there, unless the decision of the Chair is reversed.

The question was taken; and the vote was—ayes 121, nays 11, not voting 153; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Blackburn, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cate, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Cook, Cox, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Durham, Eden, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Gause, Gibson, Goode, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Harrison, Hartzell, Hays, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Holman, Hooker, Hopkins, House, Hunton, Hurd, Thomas L. Jones, Kehr, Franklin Landers, Lane, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Luttrell, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, McMahon, Meade, Metcalfe, Milliken, Morgan, Mutchler, New, O'Brien, Odell, Payne, Phelps, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Randall, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Miles Ross, Savage, Scales, Sheakley, William E. Smith, Southard, Springer, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Teese, Terry, Thompson, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Ward, Erastus Wells, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Woodburn, and Young—121.

NAYS—Messrs. John H. Baker, Banks, Burleigh, Caswell, Joyce, Kimball, Magoon, O'Neill, Platt, Robinson, and Sampson—11.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Ballou, Bass, Bell, Blair, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Cannon, Cason, Chapin, Collins, Conger, Cowan, Crapo, Crounse, Culberson, Danford, Darrall, Davy, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Durand, Eames, Egbert, Ellis, Ely, Evans, Faulkner, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Fuller, Garfield, Glover, Goodin, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hartridge, Hatcher, Hathorn, Haymond, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Hill, Hoar, Hoge, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kasson, Kelley, King, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Lapham, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lynch, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, McFarland, Miller, Mills, Money, Monroe, Morrison, Nash, Neal, Norton, Oliver, Packer, Page, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, James B. Herr Smith, Sparks, Spencer, Strait, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Thomas, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Yeates—153.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CONGER stated that his colleagues, Mr. WALDRON and Mr. BRADLEY, were absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote is 121 yeas to 11 nays.

Mr. HALE. There is no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That fact being developed on the call of the roll, no motion is now in order except a motion to adjourn or that there be a call of the House.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; let us have a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence of the motion that there be a call of the House if insisted on.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As it seems to be the general wish, I withdraw the motion to adjourn, so we may have a call of the House.

The motion that there be a call of the House was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Abbott, Banks, Bass, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Chapin, Collins, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, Darrall, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Douglass, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Evans, Faulkner, Fuller, Garfield, Glover, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoge, Hoskins, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lynch, Money, Neal, Oliver, John F. Phillips, Plaisted, Pratt, Purman, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Schumaker, Seelye, Singleton, Sparks, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Throckmorton, Martin I. Townsend, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Warren, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will now see that the doors are closed. The calling of the roll develops the fact that one hundred and ninety-six members are present. What is the pleasure of the House.

Mr. COX. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. CASWELL. I rise to a question of order. The morning hour has expired, and I desire to move to suspend the rules——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot by that motion interrupt the proceedings under the call of the House.

Mr. CASWELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has already made that motion.

The motion of Mr. COX was agreed to; and all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on laying on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is that question, on which the yeas and nays have been called; and on that roll-call a quorum did not vote.

Mr. HALE. Before the roll is called again, let me suggest as regards this matter of investigating committees making reports that this side of the House has not objected to committees reporting.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to debate.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will object to my making a brief statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am objecting. I am not answering for the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE. When the minority reports are ready to be presented with the majority reports, this side of the House does not object and in such cases has not objected.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman give assurance that the same course will be pursued in this respect hereafter as heretofore? If it can be agreed that these reports may be promptly brought before the House and action taken upon them, all this proceeding can be withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. It is not for me to give an assurance of that kind for this side of the House. I can only call the attention of the gentleman to what has been done heretofore in the case of the reports of the Naval Committee and others. So far as I am aware, when committees are prepared to report and the majority and minority reports are both ready, we do not on this side of the House propose to object to these reports being made. But this resolution would leave us entirely at the mercy of a majority of the House, to present their report without being accompanied by the views of the minority.

Mr. SPRINGER. We do not intend to take any such advantage of it.

Mr. COX. Such a thing has not been done thus far, that a majority report has been presented without the minority report accompanying it. The only trouble has been that gentlemen have objected to the reception of both majority and minority reports.

Mr. HALE. Have we objected in a single instance where both sides of a committee were ready to report?

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman from Maine himself objected to a report which I attempted to present, when both the majority and the minority of the committee were ready to report.

Mr. HALE. In that case I suggested that the majority report should not be made until the minority report accompanied it.

Mr. RANDALL. All we desire is that these investigations shall be spread upon the record.

Mr. HALE. Whenever both sides of a committee are ready to report we will be prepared to receive the reports and to act upon them.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman give an assurance to that effect?

Mr. HALE. I give the assurance of what we have done before with reference to the very important reports of the Naval Committee, the Real Estate Pool Committee, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and others.

Mr. BEEBE. Did the gentleman not object when I presented the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department although I went to his seat and stated to him in his place in the House that both sides of the committee were ready to report?

Mr. HALE. I insisted in that case on the minority report going in along with the majority report.

Mr. BEEBE. The minority report was ready.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is entirely willing that this proceeding should go forward if it is conducted with reference to a settlement of the question at issue. But when it merely tends to a bitter discussion the Chair cannot consent to its going on.

Mr. COX. I did not engage in any bitter discussion. What I proposed was, that if we had any assurance that no objection would be made to the reception of both the majority and minority reports of investigating committees hereafter, this resolution would be withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] cannot give such an assurance. If such an assurance were given some member absent to-day might come in and say he was not bound by that assurance.

Mr. COX. That is true. I see the necessity for a rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to further discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on laying on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair; on which question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 7, not voting 152; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cate, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Cook, Cox, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Felton, Finley, Forney, Fort, Franklin, Gause, Gibson, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Harrison, Hartzell, Haymond, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hooker, Hopkins, Hunton, Hurd, Thomas L. Jones, Kehr, Franklin Landers, Lane, Levy, Lord, Luttrell, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, McFarland, McMahon, Meade, Metcalfe, Milliken, Mills, Morgan, Morrison, Mutchler, New, O'Brien, Odell, Payne, Phelps, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Randall, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Miles Ross, Savage, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Slemons, William E. Smith, Spencer, Springer, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Teese, Terry, Thomas, Thompson, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Ward, Erastus Wells, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Yeates, and Young—126.

NAYS—Messrs. William H. Baker, Caswell, Joyce, Magoon, Potter, Robinson, and Woodburn—7.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ashe, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bass, Blair, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Candler, Cannon, Cason, Chapin, Collins, Conger, Cowan, Crapo, Crounse, Culberson, Danford, Darrall, Davy, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Ellis, Ely, Evans, Faulkner, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Fuller, Garfield, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hartridge, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoar, Hoge, Holman, Hoskins, House, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kimball, King, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Lapham, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lewis, Lynch, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, Miller, Money, Monroe, Nash, Neal, Norton, Oliver, O'Neill, Packer, Page, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Rusk, Sampson, Sayler, Schumaker, Seelye, Singleton, Sinnickson, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, Southard, Sparks, Strait, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Waddell, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—152.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HARTRIDGE said: Upon all questions connected with politics I am paired with Mr. HOSKINS. If he were present I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote upon the call of the roll develops the fact that there is not a quorum voting.

Mr. COX. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Abbott, Ashe, Bass, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Chapin, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Collins, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, Darrall, Davy, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Fuller, Garfield, Glover, Goode, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoge, Hoskins, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lord, Meade, Money, Monroe, Neal, O'Brien, Oliver, John F. Philips, Plaisted, Purman, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Schleicher, Schumaker, Seelye, Sparks, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Van Vorhes, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Warren, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—95.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will now cause the doors to be closed. One hundred and ninety members are present, being more than a quorum. What is the further direction of the House?

Mr. COX. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The names of the absentees should first be called for excuses.

Mr. HURLBUT. Pending the motion of the gentleman from New York, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 103.

Mr. HURLBUT and Mr. LAWRENCE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires the doorkeepers to understand distinctly that the doors are to be kept closed. The proceedings under the call have not been dispensed with and a dilatory motion does not affect them.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 84) extending the time for redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 614) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investments, and requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the managers on the part of the Senate Mr. INGALLS, Mr. OGLESBY, and Mr. MCCREERY.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) in reference to the wreck of the United States monitor Tecumseh.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 1035) to provide for paying the expenses of the Joint Committee on Printing in making an inquiry in relation to the public printing.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

The question recurred upon the motion to adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 14, nays 162, not voting 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John H. Baker, Horatio C. Burchard, Frye, Hale, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Kasson, Kimball, Franklin Landers, Lynch, Nash, Pratt, Smalls, and Spencer—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Beebe, Blackburn, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, William R. Brown, Burleigh, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cate, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Conger, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Davis, Davy, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Eames, Eden, Egbert, Evans, Finley, Forney, Fort, Franklin, Freeman, Gause, Gibson, Goodin, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Haymond, Henderson, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hoar, Holman, Hopkins, House, Hunton, Hurd, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kehr, Knott, Lane, Lapham, Lawrence, Levy, Lewis, Luttrell, Lynde, Mackey, Magoon, Maish, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, McFarland, McMahon, Metcalfe, Miller, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Morgan, Morrison, Mutchler, New, Norton, O'Brien, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Payne, Phelps, Pierce, Piper, Platt, Poppleton, Potter, Rainey, Randall, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Robinson, Miles Ross, Rusk, Sampson, Savage, Scales, Sheakley, Sinnickson, Slemons, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Southard, Springer, Strait, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Teese, Terry, Thomas, Thompson, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Turney, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Wait, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, White, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Woodburn, Yeates, and Young—162.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Bass, Bell, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Campbell, Candler, Caswell, Caulfield, Chapin, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Cox, Crapo, Culberson, Darrall, De Bolt, Denison, Dibrell, Dobbins, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Felton, Foster, Fuller, Garfield, Glover, Goode, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoge, Hooker, Hoskins, Hunter, Hyman, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Lamar, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lord, Meade, Money, Neal, Oliver, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Plaisted, Powell, Purman, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schleicher, Schumaker, Seelye, Singleton, Sparks, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Thornburgh, Throckmorton, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Ward, Warren, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiting, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—109.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. WALLING, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. LEAVENWORTH. If he were here I would vote "ay;" I am doubtful how he would vote.

Mr. COCHRANE. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. ROSS, is absent by leave of the House on account of sickness.

Mr. ODELL. My colleague from New York, Mr. HEWITT, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. STONE. My colleagues, Mr. BUCKNER, Mr. DE BOLT, Mr. PHILIPS, Mr. GLOVER, and Mr. HATCHER, are absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that a warrant be issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without excuse.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. YEATES. Are excuses for absent members now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear excuses after the order has been issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. REAGAN. It may then be too late. I desire to make a statement in regard to one of my colleagues.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In regard to making excuses during a call of the House, it has been ruled both in the last Congress and in this one that proceedings under the order for the call of the House must go on, because otherwise the House might be occupied with closed doors for three or four days even in hearing and considering excuses for absent members. Consequently, it was ruled by Mr. Blaine in the last Congress and it has also been ruled in this Congress that the order must go to the Sergeant-at-Arms, after which excuses can be received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that to have been the order of proceedings heretofore, and will adhere to it now.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask leave of absence for one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It cannot now be granted.

After the lapse of some twenty minutes,

Mr. SCHLEICHER moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] is "not present" according to the roll-call. [Great laughter.]

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I was present, although my name may not appear upon the list.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair knows nothing except the official record, which shows that the gentleman is "not present."

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be considered as present.

Mr. PAGE. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then I will make the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. HOAR. Is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] "present?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is also "not present." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask the Chair whether it is in order at this time to move to revoke all existing leaves of absence except those granted to members on account of their own sickness or the sickness of members of their families?

Mr. COX. That cannot be done at this time.

Mr. BANKS. It is not in order to transact any business while the doors are closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It cannot be done at this time, of course.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice, then, that I shall make that motion at a proper time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has some doubt whether the motion can be made at all; but certainly it is not in order now.

Mr. CONGER. Those leaves of absence are granted by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HALE. Upon the point just stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] I suggest that when that is done, notice be also given that objection will be made to future requests for leave of absence.

Mr. COX. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine now that he is on his feet——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No business can be transacted at this time. Nothing can be entertained except some motion connected with the call or a motion to adjourn. All other business is out of order. Members can neither give any notice nor perform any other legislative act except such as the Chair has indicated.

Mr. CONGER. Does that preclude the making of miscellaneous remarks?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CONGER. Then I would like to have about fifteen minutes allotted to me for general remarks. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Take leave to print.

Mr. POTTER. If it will not take my colleague, Mr. CONGER, from the floor, I make the motion that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order at this time.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS appeared at the bar of the House and said: Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the order of the House I have now at this bar Mr. WALKER of New York, Mr. MEADE, and Mr. THORNBURGH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WALKER, you are reported as having been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WALKER, of New York. I have no excuse to make except that I was called out by some friends outside the Hall, and had this morning answered two roll-calls already.

Mr. COX. I move that he be discharged on the payment of costs.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from New York on what grounds he bases that motion?

Mr. COX. On public grounds. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I think then it should be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. [Renewed laughter.]

The motion of Mr. COX was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. THORNBURGH, you are reported as having been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I was contributing a little to the plethoric purse of our caterer below; and the "man and brother" who bore my order did not get back in time for me to return to this Hall to answer to my name. That is all the excuse I have.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the gentleman be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MEADE, you are reported as having been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MEADE. I was in my committee-room attending to some necessary business. The record will show that I have been here all the morning.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the gentleman be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms again appeared at the bar of the House and said: Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the order of the House, I have now at its bar Mr. LAWRENCE, Mr. BLAND, and Mr. SCHLEICHER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. LAWRENCE, you have been reported as absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I was present when the call of the roll commenced, and pending that call I went to the Senate to make inquiry about some bills. I returned to the House after the roll had been called, but before the number of absentees had been announced by the Speaker I rose and endeavored to get the attention of the Speaker so that my name might be called; but the Speaker, without observing me, announced the result; and the result was that I was here, though marked absent.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the gentleman be discharged.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 137, noes 10.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. SCHLEICHER, you are reported absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Mr. Speaker, I was in the cloak-room, and did not hear my name when it was called. When the list of absentees was called I came into the House and was informed my name had been omitted. I went to the Clerk's desk and asked my name be recorded, when the Clerk said it was too late. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I move the gentleman from Texas be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BLAND, you are reported absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BLAND. I have been in the Hall ever since the session began, and think I have voted on every roll-call except perhaps one or two.

Mr. COX. You have been out, I suppose, attending to the silver bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I move the gentleman be discharged on payment of costs——

Mr. BLAND. I have the floor and wish to conclude making my excuse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri must not be interrupted.

Mr. BLAND. I received a card from a Senator, and while conversing with him in the cloak-room my name was called and I was reported absent, although present all the time in the House. I have been in the House ever since the session commenced.

Mr. HOAR. I move the gentleman be discharged on the payment of costs in silver. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I move an amendment, that silver be not demanded of him until the passage of the silver bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Of course that makes it a legal tender.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts intend by his motion that the gentleman from Missouri shall be discharged on payment of fees?

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. LANE. I move that the gentleman from Missouri be discharged without payment of fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALKER,] who was discharged on payment of fees, be discharged without payment of fees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the fees will be remitted.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody under its order Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. TUCKER, you are reported as absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I had been in the House in the morning, but went over to the Senate Chamber to see a friend.

Mr. MILLS. Did you get any lemonade? [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. I may be permitted to correct the gentleman from Texas. I took a promenade, but it does not follow that I took any lemonade. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. Or cold tea?

Mr. TUCKER. Nor cold tea. That is my only excuse.

Mr. CONGER. Was the gentleman from Virginia in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. TUCKER. I suppose I was not. I was in the Hall this morning when my name was called on the first call of the House, but I was not on the last call.

Mr. CONGER. 'Tis a pity that the gentleman was "so near and yet so far." [Laughter.]

Mr. BANNING. I move the gentleman be discharged without payment of fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. I move all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 89.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 101.

Mr. O'BRIEN demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. O'BRIEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. Is it in order to move unanimous consent at the present time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not for the transaction of any business.

Mr. MILLS. Then I move all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was disagreed to, only 34 voting in the affirmative.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, under its order, Mr. ROBERTS and Mr. HENKLE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HENKLE, you are reported absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ROBERTS. I have been absent in the discharge of a public duty, serving my constituents and looking after their interests in the Navy Department.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move the gentleman be discharged.

Mr. HUBBELL. I could not hear the gentleman's explanation, and hope he will state it over again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the gentleman from Maryland will again state his excuse.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have been absent in the discharge of a public duty.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is very difficult to hear the gentleman, and I suggest he take the Clerk's desk so that members may vote intelligently on his excuse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the gentleman from Maryland will take the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ROBERTS took the Clerk's desk and proceeded to fan himself amid great laughter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland will now state his excuse.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am happy, gentlemen, to answer any question you may have to propound to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. YOUNG. I move the gentleman be allowed to print. [Laughter.]

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the excuse of the gentleman from Maryland, and while he occupies the floor he cannot be interrupted. When he has finished his statement a motion will then be in order to excuse him.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I propose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that no motion is in order until the gentleman from Maryland has been heard. The gentleman from Maryland will proceed with his statement.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am the victim of circumstances, [great laughter,] which are very disagreeable.

Mr. KASSON. That is sufficient. I move that the gentleman be discharged.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to refer the gentleman back whence he came, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that the gentleman from Maryland be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HENKLE, you are reported absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HENKLE. I had business at the Navy Department. I took the occasion of the call of States, supposing my presence would not be important, upon the theory that the fewer that were here the more business would be done, and I went to attend to it.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the gentleman's excuse be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move that my colleague, Mr. HENKLE, be discharged.

The motion of Mr. O'BRIEN was agreed to.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS appeared at the Bar and said: Mr. Speaker, in pursuanc of the order of the House I now have at its bar Mr. O'BRIEN, of Maryland. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. O'BRIEN, you are reported absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was not aware of the fact that I was absent. I was present in the House at the time the last vote was taken on a call of the yeas and nays, and I voted "ay." I believe that was on a motion to adjourn. And I took it for granted that the fact that I was allowed to vote on that motion excused me, even if I had been absent when the roll was called for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman vote on the call of the House?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was not here on the call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman was constructively absent. What is the pleasure of the House?

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the gentleman from Maryland be discharged.

The question being taken on a division by sound,

The Speaker pro tempore stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. BRIGHT called for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to; and Mr. O'BRIEN was discharged.

Mr. LANE. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 86, noes 90.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

Several MEMBERS. Let there be a division first.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I will take a division first.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 91.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. PAGE. That motion has just been voted down.

Mr. STEVENSON. The motion to adjourn has been made since that.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion, which in fact came from the other side of the House: that we dispense with all further proceedings under this call on condition that all majority and minority reports of investigating committees may be presented to the House and that without sending this to the Committee on Rules we may take a vote now to suspend the rules, so as to allow that to be done when the reports are ready to be presented to the House for its action.

Mr. HALE. I do not desire that this shall be provided for under an imperative rule of the House. But I presume that when we get out of these proceedings and go into the House, it can then be agreed that in all cases where the majority and minority reports are ready both may be presented, and that no objection shall be made.

Mr. COX. My proposition is that if either report is ready, or if both reports are ready, one or the other may be presented.

Mr. HALE. But the gentleman must see that that does not obviate the trouble. All we want is that these committees may only report at any time when both sides are ready.

Mr. COX. O, no; that will not do.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman knows that we have yielded in every case to allow the presentation of reports.

Mr. CLYMER. Does not the gentleman from Maine perceive that all that gentlemen representing his side of the House would have to do to prevent a report from gentlemen representing this side of the House would be to say they are not ready?

Mr. HALE. The gentleman must in that regard trust something to the make-up of these committees. There has been no case where the majority were ready to report but with a little conference the minority have got ready too. Almost all the important committees of investigation have already reported, and this side has interposed no bar or demur in the way of a report in a single case; and we do not propose to do so now.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HALE. We do not want to be in the power of the majority, so that the majority report may be rushed in at any time and the minority get no hearing; and I assure the gentleman that the proposition that the two branches of the committee shall get in their reports at the same time and have them printed together, and go to the country together and to the press together, is made in good faith. It has always been done heretofore this session. The Committee on Naval Matters and the Committee on the Real-Estate Pool, the Committee on the Expenditures in the War Department and the Committee on the Insane Asylum reported so that the two reports should go in simultaneously, and it is fair that they should go before the country together.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's proposition then is this: That until the minority are ready with their views or report the majority shall not come in and make their report.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman from New York know of a single case in which the minority of a committee has in any manner obstructed the presenting of reports on fair notice given?

Mr. COX. But the majority have never obstructed the minority in making their reports or presenting their views.

Mr. HALE. But by universal practice the minority has always been permitted to present its views and has been allowed to submit a resolution, and the other day the Speaker ruled that the resolution of the minority must be voted on although they had not presented it.

Mr. COX. The views of the minority of a committee come in by courtesy and grace. The majority have a right to make the report, and the majority should control the matter. We go outside and say to the minority, you bring forward your reports and let both receive the action of the House and all will be well without any change of the rules.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from New York will remember the majority of a committee are not required to be ready with their report until the committee has been called in the morning hour under the rules of the House. That is the practice of this House and the practice of this whole session.

Now, in conceding the right of the majority of a committee engaged in some investigation to report at any time, the minority of the House is making a vast concession, and in view of that unprecedented concession, therefore, I hope the gentleman will agree to comply with the proposition of my friend from Maine, that an opportunity shall be afforded to the minority of the committee to get ready if the majority are to be allowed to give in their report before the time which the rules and practice of the House permit. The suggestion that under such a rule the minority of a committee would prevent the committee from reporting at all can be very easily obviated.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman knows that if the matter of making these reports is to be confined to the rules of the House these committees cannot be reached during the present session.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from New York will see that during the last ten days of the session the majority may come to the House with a report and move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. Ah! When we have fixed a time for final adjournment.

Mr. HOAR. When a majority of a committee come to the House and say, We are ready with our report and we notified the minority of the committee that it was ready two days before or one day beforehand, the House is sure to let that report come in.

Mr. COX. I think I can fall in with the suggestions made on the other side of the House. I propose that when a majority report comes in within two days after that notice has been given to the minority the minority report should be allowed to come in within the time for which notice was given and be printed with the majority report.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman one practical question which will throw some light on my mind and perhaps on the minds of others.

Mr. COX. Is my proposition accepted?

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman one question. What committees of investigation are ready or propose to report which have not already reported?

Mr. COX. I know of several that will be ready to report to-morrow, but I cannot answer that question in full.

Mr. HALE. But it would be very proper to confer with the minority members before the report is made. I can conceive of a case, for instance, like that of the report of the Naval Committee, accompanied by a vast bulk of testimony where forty-eight hours would not perhaps be sufficient, and certainly not twenty-four hours, to enable the minority report to be ready; and if there are any important investigation committees yet to report I desire to ask what they are.

Mr. COX. Then the gentleman would like that the minority report should be made up from the majority report, and not from the evidence.

Mr. HALE. The minority ought certainly to see the majority report before they make their own.

Mr. COX. Why?

Mr. HALE. Why, they may agree to the majority report and have no minority report to make.

Mr. COX. I hope my proposition will be acceptable to the other side of the House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I have no objection to gentlemen attempting to make any agreement that will bind the House when the doors are not closed, but a proposition agreed to when the doors are closed does not bind the House when the doors are open. We do not care if you choose to sit here with closed doors, but if you want to make agreements then let the House proceed to do business with open doors.

Mr. COX. Well, the country will see that the minority are trying to rule the majority in the important matter of investigation.

Mr. HALE. The country will see nothing of the kind.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order. When this colloquy descends into political tirades I object to its continuance.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time will the minorities of these committees want to prepare their minority report. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HALE. It is not the time, that is not the question, but that the report shall go to the country together and to the press together. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

The Sergeant-at-Arms then appeared at the bar of the House having in custody Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, and Mr. HOGE, of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WELLS, you have been reported as absent from the session of the House to-day without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I was present at the first call of the House and answered to my name. I then left and went to the Senate on important business, and just as I returned the doors were closed.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] be discharged.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It occurs to me that that is not the proper way to put the question. If the House should refuse to discharge the gentleman, what then will be done? The question should be, Will the House discharge the gentleman with or without the payment of fees? I move that he be discharged without fees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is the better form of the motion; however, in the opinion of the Chair, the other means the same thing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the House shall vote that the gentleman be not discharged, then what will be done with him?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would interpret that to mean that he shall not be discharged without fees.

The motion to discharge without fees was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HOGE, you have been absent from the session of the House to-day without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HOGE. I have only this to say: I went over to Baltimore this morning and expected to return in time for the meeting of the House. I went over there to purchase some American flags to circulate in my district during the coming campaign.

Mr. SPRINGER. American flags?

Mr. HOGE. Yes, American flags. I expect to put on them the names of Hayes and Wheeler; but they are not on yet.

Mr. GOODIN. I move that the gentleman be discharged without fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. GARFIELD, you have been absent from the session of the House to-day without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GARFIELD. Peccavi.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he has ever before offended in this manner?

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps I have.

Mr. WILLARD. I move that the gentleman be discharged without fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not hear the excuse of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. CLYMER and others. That is too late; regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will probably find it in the RECORD to-morrow. It was a plea of guilty. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 50, noes 84.

Mr. LANE. I move that the House now take a recess until seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then appeared at the bar of the House having in custody Mr. VAN VORHES, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. VAN VORHES, you have been reported as absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. VAN VORHES. I am not aware of having been absent from any of the roll-calls to-day in a call of the House. I supposed that I answered to each when my name was called, and still think I did so. I was absent from the House when this proceeding commenced, and did not vote on the motion relating to the decision of the Chair, because I was not in the House when it was made and did not know to what it related. I intended to respond and still think that I responded to my name at each call of the roll under a call of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move that the gentleman be discharged without fees.

Mr. COX. I hope so, because the gentleman is one of the most vigilant of our members.

The motion of Mr. MILLIKEN was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the name of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VORHES] be stricken from the Sergeant-at-Arms's list of absentees.

Mr. VAN VORHES. I suppose I can demand that as a matter of right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the statement of the gentleman the Chair will direct the correction to be made.

Mr. MAISH. I move that the name of Mr. SCHLEICHER, of Texas, be stricken from the list of absentees, as he was in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] stated to the House that he did not answer to his name when called. His name can be taken from the list of absentees by unanimous consent.

Mr. RUSK. That is right.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask that my colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, be excused; he is absent on account of serious indisposition.

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say on behalf of Mr. LAMAR that he was here until near the time when the call was made, but on account of sickness was obliged to leave in company with one of the officers of the House. I move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I ask unanimous consent to make a "miscellaneous remark."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Not by unanimous consent?

Several MEMBERS. Take leave to print.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York desire to speak with reference to the matter before the House?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. My remark refers to the proceedings before the House; and it is this——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must not proceed with his remarks until the question of unanimous consent is determined. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, we are most of us fathers of honest children; and some of us have grandchildren. I beg to suggest that in this state of the weather we have played children long enough. I have on your desk a serious application for leave of absence from to-morrow morning; and it will be very great injustice to me if through this fooling that leave of absence be not granted. I for one am prepared to say that having sat here through these proceedings this morning, I cannot see how they can be justified to our own sense of manliness or to the judgment of the American people. There may be reasons why the proposition of my colleague from New York [Mr. COX] should be resisted. I have voted against it; but there is no sound reason why we, having come to years of discretion, should waste our time in this way, endangering, it may be, our lives; for I contend that we are not only wasting our time, but there is many a man on this floor whose life is to a certain extent put in jeopardy by the further protraction of these proceedings. I move, therefore, that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 52, noes 90.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I submit to the serious judgment of the House that this call is entirely useless and will work no good. I hope, therefore, that the House will consent to suspend further proceedings under this call. Other gentlemen may not know as I have known, and may not have suffered as I have suffered, the injurious and dangerous effects of the impure and heated air of this House, which is perfectly unbearable, imperiling the health of almost every gentleman who is kept here. I hope, therefore, that it will be the pleasure of the House not to continue these proceedings. I move that all further proceedings under this call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House and said: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the order of the House I have now at its bar the gentleman from New York, Mr. DAVY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. DAVY, you are reported as having been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DAVY. I was not absent when the roll was called. I was present and answered to my name.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to know whether the gentleman regards himself as present in the House when he is seated in the gallery?

Mr. DAVY. I was not in the gallery when the roll was called.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move that my colleague be excused and that he be returned by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the place whence he came. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is but one proper motion. The Chair hopes that gentlemen have about exhausted their wit.

Mr. THORNBURGH. As the gentleman states that he was present and answered to his name, I submit that he should not be recorded among the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will direct that his name be placed with those answering upon the roll-call.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS again appeared at the bar of the House, and said: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the order of the House I have now at its bar the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MONROE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MONROE, you are reported as having been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MONROE. I have only to say that I was within the bar of the House when the roll was called and supposed that I answered to my name.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman state that he answered to his name?

Mr. MONROE. My opinion is that I did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's name will be recorded among those answering to their names.

Mr. HOGE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 56, noes 72.

Mr. GOODIN. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. COX. Before the question is taken on that motion, I beg to say to my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] that if he will consent to require only two days' notice after the majority reports are ready for the minority reports to come in, I think the arrangement will be satisfactory.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the proposition being acted on with closed doors.

Mr. HALE. I should be repeating myself in saying what the minority want here is when any investigating committee reports a minority report shall go in at the same time. That is what we think should be done. Now, if any time or notice can be agreed upon, that notice and that time should apply in the committee, and not in the House; that is, the majority report should not be put in and given to the press and the country and the minority come in afterward tailing along, but the majority of the committee desiring to report shall give in writing to the minority of the committee, say three days' notice, and after that, if the minority does not get ready, then the majority shall have the right to report. I do not see any objection to that, because then the two could go to the country together.

Take the case of the whisky-ring committee that has been taking testimony clear up to the present time. I do not know but somebody may have a report ready in that committee now and three day's notice would not be long enough to prepare a proper minority report. I am aware we are getting hopefully toward the end of the session and therefore something must be yielded to that, but sufficient notice should be given to committees which have taken vast masses of testimony. Any committee wishing to report, I propose shall give in writing, because that fixes it, to the minority of the committee, notice when it will present its report in the House.

Mr. KASSON. And submit the report to the minority.

Mr. HALE. And submit the report to the minority, and then at the end of three days, unless the minority is ready, the majority shall submit its report.

Mr. RANDALL. We may agree to adjourn and go home before that time.

Mr. BEEBE. That does not apply, I suppose, to committees which have already reported and the reports and testimony ordered to be printed and recommitted. There are some cases where the minority have agreed with the majority in submitting report.

Mr. HALE. That does not interfere with the reports which have been already made. I make the proposition to the House.

Mr. MORRISON. It cannot be agreed to with that length of time.

Mr. FRYE. One exception can be made, and that is where the majority and minority of a committee agree to report; that is, both the majority and minority agree to report at the same time; and that would cover every case where there was fair dealing, so that there need not be any delay at all.

Mr. RANDALL. Make it two days.

Mr. COX. There will be no objection in cases where the majority and minority agree to report. But three days is too long in the closing hours of the session.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman must see we have not delayed this. He says two days are too long. Why were not the reports brought in before?

Mr. MORRISON. Because they were not ready.

Mr. BEEBE. It could not have been done in some cases.

Mr. COX. How is it essential for the minority that the majority report should be submitted before they can make their minority report? Are the gentlemen willing to agree two days' notice shall be given by the majority to the minority, without bringing in the majority report in the first instance until the minority are ready to submit their report? I think that would be fair.

Mr. CONGER. That could not be done.

Mr. HOAR. How can there be such a minority report? What the gentleman calls a majority report is a report of the committee. How could there be a report of a committee unless all of the committee had seen it?

Mr. COX. They generally discuss these things in committee and come to some understanding as to their divergence of views, even before either of the reports is written.

Mr. FRYE. In some reports the minority were not consulted at all.

Mr. HOAR. It is in violation of parliamentary law.

Mr. HALE. When there is agreement between the majority and minority they can report at any time; but the gentleman will see that the minority ought to have as much time to prepare a report as the majority, and they cannot begin to prepare the views of the minority until they have seen the majority report. It may be that the minority may agree to the majority report. They should have an opportunity to see whether they can or not, and when they find they cannot agree to it, they ought to have time in which to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will agree to the proposition of two days' notice there will be no difficulty on this side of the House. I think that is generous and fair.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I shall object to any arrangement of this kind being made with closed doors. I insist that when the doors are closed this House can transact no business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is not transacting business now. Gentlemen are endeavoring to make a preliminary arrangement. The gentleman from Illinois need not be disturbed upon that point.

Mr. CONGER. I think that the gentlemen who have this talk should go to the cloak-rooms and not disturb members.

Mr. COX. I would suggest that the gentleman from Michigan should go there himself. He is more out of order than anybody else.

Mr. WAIT. If any proposition of this kind is to be agreed to, I think we should understand whether the day on which the notice is given is to be included in the two or three days or whether it is excluded. If that is not understood a controversy might spring up in regard to that point.

Mr. COX. The proposition, as I understand it, is that the two days shall be forty-eight hours, counting from the time the notice is given.

Mr. HALE. The two days, or the three days, would be reckoned from the time the notice is given.

Mr. Speaker, I am informed by gentlemen from one of the committees to which I have alluded, which has been taking a large mass of testimony, that there is no expectation of any report being presented from that committee, because the testimony is not complete and is still being taken. That removes a portion of the difficulty. Now I for one have no objection to the arrangement being made if this point be conceded, that the two reports shall come in at the same time. That is the point we have been struggling for all along, and in regard to which we have made agreements heretofore in cases where committees have reported. I have no objection for one that upon written notice of a majority of the committee wishing to report, to the minority, and the report being submitted, the committee may report within two days. It is too short, I am aware; still we are near the close of the session, and we have no desire to obstruct any report that is legitimately made, the other side being given a chance to be heard.

Mr. COX. I am prepared to say, and I think I speak for a large number here, that, so far as I understand the gentleman from Maine, that would be satisfactory. When the notice is given to the House——

Mr. HALE. As I understand it, there is to be no notice given to the House. Notice is to be given in the committee. As in the case of a matter in court, this notice is a service on the other side, and a copy of the report is given to the minority or read to them; and then they have two days to prepare their report. Then the two shall be presented to the House together. Or, if the minority is in default at the end of the two days, the majority presents its report alone.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it be satisfactory to the gentleman from Maine that, after the committee has agreed upon the majority report, then two days after that time that committee may make its report, and the minority of the committee may then submit its report at the same time? Is that satisfactory?

Mr. HALE. The only object of my proposition in regard to notice is to prevent controversy and to protect the rights of the minority. After notice is given in writing, of which the chairman will keep a copy, no question will then arise whether under the rule we are about to make the Speaker would rule the majority of the committee entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. I think there can be no accommodation of this thing unless the arrangement be upon the basis that when the majority report comes in and is offered to the House forty-eight hours from that time the minority report may come in also.

Mr. HALE. That would give the majority the opportunity of coming in with their report, putting it on the records, and sending it to the country when the minority had no opportunity of reporting at the same time.

Mr. COX. It is part of my proposition that they shall be printed at the same time.

Mr. FRYE. That arrangement would give an opportunity to a committee of putting in a report on the last day of the session and deprive the minority of all opportunity of presenting their views.

Mr. COX. That is not the intention.

Mr. HALE. My proposition is that the majority shall give the minority two days' notice.

Mr. BANKS. I would like to say a word or two on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is recognized.

Mr. SAVAGE. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] proceeds, I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine whether it is his proposition that notice should be served upon all the members of the minority of the committee or upon only one of them?

Mr. HALE. Any difficulty in regard to that can easily be obviated by the majority preparing their report and submitting it to a single member of the minority, and announcing in the House that in forty-eight hours from that time they will present their report. I think we have made a fair proposition. If gentlemen on the other side do not see fit to accept it, we must go on as we have been doing.

Mr. YEATES. Would not a notice in the House be sufficient?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I wish to know if I understand the gentleman from Maine correctly. I understand his proposition to be this: That when a committee agrees to make a majority report the majority shall give two days' notice to the minority; and at the expiration of two days, whether the minority are ready to report or not, the majority may then present their report. If my understanding of the proposition is correct, I think we ought to agree to it.

Mr. BANKS. At this period of the session it seems to me that the demand of the gentleman from Maine for three days is too much.

Mr. HALE. I have yielded this point and ask now only two days.

Mr. BANKS. The proposition also that notice shall be given in committee is not a reasonable one as the minority may defeat that proposition by not attending. If notice of forty-eight hours is given in the House in the presence of some member of the minority of the committee and taken notice of by the Speaker, that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. After the report is agreed to?

Mr. BANKS. Of course, after the report is agreed to in committee. The notice shall be given by the chairman or any other member of the committee making it in the presence of some member of the minority committee, of which the Speaker shall take notice, and forty-eight hours shall then be allowed. That notice ought to be quite sufficient for the minority. Usually the minority report is very brief; oftentimes it consists merely in dissent to the chief propositions of the majority, and forty-eight hours, with the time for preparation already had by the minority and by all members of the committee, ought to be sufficient to present such a dissent as would satisfy the minority.

Mr. WAIT. It does seem to me, sir, that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine that the majority shall give a copy of the report to the minority is a fair one, because the minority report is always a response to that of the majority. They should therefore have their copy of the report of the majority. If they have attended to the case and have understood the testimony, in forty-eight hours they could make a response to the report of the majority; but if the report comes into the House they do not have an opportunity to examine it in advance and to make up their own report. The two days' time which they have to respond is too short. I believe the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is a fair one, that when the notice is given then the report itself shall be handed over to the committee so that they may prepare their statements in answer and present them to the House at the same time.

Mr. BANKS. The proposition of the gentleman who has just taken his seat is not a reasonable one. The minority of the committee has no right to the possession of the report of the majority; they must take their knowledge of it from the proceedings of the committee, and they cannot claim possession of it. I repeat that I think if forty-eight hours' notice is given after the proceedings of the committee have been concluded in the presence of a member of the minority of the committee and of the House and taken notice of by the Speaker it ought to be sufficient for this side of the House.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me that the report of the majority of the committee after having been adopted should be left with the clerk of the committee so that any member of the committee may have access to it and have an opportunity to express his views in regard to it. The idea that they should have no access to it so as to be enabled to present their views seems very inconsistent with the desire to give the minority a fair chance to express their views to the House. The report should be left with the clerk of the committee, accessible to every member of the committee in whatever time may be allowed.

Mr. YEATES. It seems to me that the report of a committee is agreed upon in the committee-room and it is the duty upon notice of all the members of the committee to be there, and if they see fit to be absent, and if they are notified in the House that a report will be made in forty-eight hours, that is all they should claim. Why should any minority have rights extended to them that do not belong to them by parliamentary usage? If they see fit to be absent, then it is their fault, and the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely correct. Why, we never could get a report from any committee if a minority of that committee saw proper to stay away in the manner in which the gentleman from Connecticut suggested. No, sir; let the chairman of the committee notify them that there will be a meeting on such a day, and when they meet let the majority have their report ready, and if the minority do not see fit to come, let him notify them that the report will be made in forty-eight hours.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is a fair one.

Mr. YEATES. Certainly it is.

Mr. RANDALL. It is that a member who desires to make in behalf of a committee a report shall rise in the House and publicly give it notice that forty-eight hours thereafter the majority report, as indicated, will be made to the House; and if the minority do not avail themselves of the opportunity of expressing their views, it is their loss.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to one point in his remarks. Is it understood that this notice shall be privileged?

Mr. RANDALL. Of course.

Mr. COX. I desire to submit a resolution. I do not know whether the proposition will need any modification, but I hope not; my resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the investigating committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after two days from the time the committee have agreed to their report and submitted the same to the minority, who shall have leave at the same time to submit their views to the House.

Mr. YEATES. How are you going to find the minority if they choose to be absent?

Mr. COX. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. GARFIELD. That seems to be a fair proposition; there may, however, be some cases where notice has already been given and now without any expectation that report will be thrown in immediately; the report might be made at once.

Mr. RANDALL. Some of the committee have a right to report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that; but there ought to be some notice given after this time. The two days should not be considered as running for any period previous to the present time.

Mr. COX. I propose to add, at the suggestion of gentlemen here, the words, "and if the minorities of said committees shall be absent, then that notice shall be given in the House."

Mr. HALE. That is fair.

Mr. COX. I propose also to put in forty-eight hours instead of two days.

Mr. HALE. Let there be this understanding, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] suggested, that the forty-eight hours in all cases shall not be reckoned from any time past of the present.

Mr. RANDALL. That would take away from the committees, who now have the right to report at any time, the right to report except upon forty-eight hours' notice.

Mr. HALE. Not at all. But there might be the case of a committee that cannot now report, and that needs this solvent to enable them to report; that has already agreed upon its majority report. Now if this side of the House agrees to this proposition they might come in here now and say, "Why, we agreed to our report for the majority six days ago."

Many MEMBERS. "O, no!"

Mr. HALE. Then let it be understood that this agreement is prospective, not retrospective.

Mr. SPRINGER. And also that where the majority and the minority of a committee are now ready to report they can report at any time?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. YEATES. The arrangement to date from this day.

Mr. HALE. From this day.

Mr. BEEBE. How will that arrangement affect the cases where the majority and the minority reports have been printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider? Could not those committees report at any time, the minority being ready?

Mr. YEATES. They have already reported.

Mr. WAIT. I cannot see the embarrassment the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] speaks of. If the majority and the minority are both ready to report, then they can report at any time.

Mr. STONE. As this matter seems to be arranged, I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. GOODIN. That motion is already pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is only awaiting the time when there is a concurrence between the two sides of the House on this matter. Of course no business can be transacted while the doors are closed. The first question in order is upon the motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, which motion is now pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] I ask leave to submit a resolution in the following form:

Resolved, That the investigating committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after forty-eight hours from the time the majority have agreed to their report and the fact has been announced to the House, which announcement may be made at any time; and in all cases where the majority and minority reports are now ready the reports may be made at any time.

Mr. HALE. That is an entirely different proposition from the one we have agreed to with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. SPRINGER. In what respect is it different from that?

Mr. HALE. I do not care to argue it; it is very evident that it is different.

Mr. STONE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. By the permission of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] I will read what I understand to be in substance the proposition from the other side, and which I think is a fair one.

Mr. STONE and others called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GOODIN] that all further proceedings under the call of the House be dispensed with.

The question was taken upon the motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call; and upon a division there were—ayes 91, noes 81.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SPRINGER called for tellers.

Mr. COX. Gentlemen around me desire me to again read the proposition of accommodation which I read a moment ago.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. We are dividing upon a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call. There are several gentlemen who object to proceeding with any business with closed doors. We have no objection to the agreement proposed.

Mr. COX. If there is no objection, then let me by, unanimous consent, again state it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already stated that no business can be transacted by the House while the doors are closed and certain members are prohibited from entering who have a right to be here. The Chair has entertained by unanimous consent propositions for the settlement of this question. Of course nothing can be acted upon finally until further proceedings under the call have been dispensed with.

Mr. COX. I will read the proposition:

Resolved, That the investigating committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after forty-eight hours from the time the committee have agreed to their report and submitted the same to the minority, who shall have leave at the same time to submit their views to the House; but if the minority is absent from the meeting of the committee then notice shall be given in the House itself.

Mr. HALE. That is a fair proposition, and unless that can be agreed to there is no use in talking any further about it.

Mr. BEEBE. Will there be objection to adding that in all cases where both the majority and minority are ready both reports may be made at any time?

Mr. COX. Nobody will object to that.
Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I object to that with closed doors.
Mr. BEEBE. I put the question to my friend from Maine.
Mr. HALE. What is the question?
Mr. BEEBE. Is there objection where the majority and minority are both ready to their reporting at any time?
Mr. HALE. Of course there is no objection to that. This agreement does not apply to such a case as that.
Mr. RUSK. I call for the regular order of business.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GOODIN,] that all further proceedings under this call be dispensed with.
Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my call for tellers and for a further count.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion for further proceedings under the call of the House was agreed to upon a division—ayes 91, noes 81. The Doorkeeper will now open the doors.
Mr. COX. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk.
Mr. HALE. When we resume the regular business of the House, the first thing pending is the appeal. Now, if this resolution is to be submitted and adopted, it is understood of course that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] and the appeal are withdrawn.
Mr. SPRINGER. There is no objection to that.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the motion to suspend the rules will suspend all previous proceedings. The motion pending before the House is on laying upon the table the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair by the gentleman from Maine.
Mr. HALE. But if the gentleman from Virginia withdraws the resolution which he sought to have referred, then the appeal is withdrawn; and this resolution is substituted for all those proceedings. That is fair.
Mr. SPRINGER. That is right.
Mr. COX. Before submitting my resolution I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] to withdraw the resolution which he offered to amend the rules.
Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that resolution.
Mr. HALE. It had better be understood that I withdraw the appeal and the gentleman from Virginia withdraws his resolution, and the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is substituted for all those proceedings.
Mr. COX. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the investigating committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after forty-eight hours' notice from the time the committee have agreed to the report and submitted the same to the minority, who shall have leave at the same time to submit their views to the House; and if the minority is absent from the meeting, said notice of the same shall be given in the House.

Mr. CONGER. Before this resolution is acted on, I would like to know in what condition the regular business now stands.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which he has read.
Mr. CONGER. But, Mr. Speaker, we were dividing upon ordering the yeas and nays; and that is the regular order.
Mr. SPRINGER. All those proceedings have been withdrawn by unanimous consent.
Mr. CONGER. I do not so understand.
Mr. CASWELL. I beg to remind the Chair that I called his attention to the fact that the morning hour had expired, and moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will recollect that the House was dividing.
Mr. CASWELL. The Chair ruled me out.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks he was right in so doing.
Mr. CASWELL. Is not this a similar proposition?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The circumstances are different.
Mr. RUSK. Let the proposition of the gentleman from New York be read by the Clerk.
Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Before that is done, I wish to ask whether the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] is understood to be withdrawn?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia has withdrawn it.
The resolution of Mr. COX was again read.
Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman should add that this is to operate prospectively.
Mr. COX. That is understood.
Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We want to understand distinctly whether the appeal is withdrawn by the gentleman from Maine, and the notice to amend the rules withdrawn by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]
The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has been already stated.
Mr. HALE. The appeal and the resolution have been withdrawn; and this takes the place of the whole proceeding.
The motion of Mr. COX to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:
An act (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers.

WORKS AT SOUTHWEST PASS, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Engineers relative to the clause in the river and harbor bill affecting works at Southwest Pass, Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the passage of the bill to repeal the resumption-day clause of the act of January 14, 1875.
Mr. HOAR. I object.
Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I desire to state that, if permitted, I should vote "no."
Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House various requests of members for leave of absence.
Mr. MCMAHON. I object; I do not propose to stay here all the time myself and let others go away.
Mr. RANDALL. We are elected to stay here and attend to the public business.
Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Exception should be made in cases where members ask for leave of absence on account of sickness in their families.
Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote on it; I move they be excused.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked unanimous consent to lay these requests for leave of absence before the House. That unanimous consent has been granted; and the question now is, Shall the requests be granted or refused?
Mr. RANDALL. But I made the motion to adjourn.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. But unanimous consent was granted to lay these requests for leave of absence before the House.
Mr. RANDALL. That permission has been granted from time to time, but it has always been by unanimous consent. Objection being made and the regular order being demanded, of course the question must be put on the motion to adjourn. The motion of itself precludes and prevents the asking of leave of absence.
Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken.
Mr. RANDALL. No, I am not mistaken.
Mr. SPRINGER. Nothing can prevent this House from adjourning when it wants to.
Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules.
Mr. MCMAHON. I demand the regular order of business.
Mr. RANDALL. I now move the House adjourn.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Although the House has given unanimous consent to the presentation of requests for leave of absence, nevertheless the gentleman from Pennsylvania now moving to adjourn, the question must be put on that motion, as the motion to adjourn takes precedence of all other questions. It is for the House to decide whether it will adjourn now or vote on the requests for leave of absence.
Mr. GARFIELD. The granting of these requests for leave of absence will not leave you without a quorum.
Mr. RANDALL. Yes, it will.
Mr. MORRISON. And that is just what the gentleman from Ohio wants.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 68.
Mr. COCHRANE demanded the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.
Mr. SAVAGE. I demand tellers.
Tellers were not ordered.
So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:
By Mr. COOK: The petition of Henry Love, executor of the estate of James Love, deceased, that he be paid the amount heretofore adjudged to be due the father of the deceased by the Interior Department for services rendered as a surgeon's mate in the First Georgia Continental Battalion in the revolutionary war against Great Britain, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.
By Mr. HOUSE: The petition of William Webster, that Congress take such steps as will secure his restoration to his lands and other property obtained in New Zealand prior to the establishment there of British authority, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL: The petition of 200 citizens of Weedsport, Cayuga County, New York, for the re-establishment of the fast-mail service on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of Thomas N. McCoffey, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Memorial of John Harlow, of Tennessee, to have his name restored to the Army roll of the Tenth Tennessee Infantry Regiment, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 8, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. MCCREERY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers in reference to a clause in the river and harbor bill as passed by the Senate which affects the works at the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi River.

Mr. WEST. I move that the communication lie on the table and be printed. The matter has been acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS. Had it not better be referred to the Committee on Appropriations? They have the matter now in charge, I understand.

Mr. WEST. The bill has been reported and is before the Senate. I have no objection to the reference; but I cannot conceive that there should be any action upon it in committee, as the bill has been reported here. The Senate is competent to act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, that the communication lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 100.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has precedence.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 791) for the relief of Ethan Ray Clarke and Samuel Ward Clarke, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1020) to punish embezzlement in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 998) for the pardon of deserters from the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS it was Ordered, That Mrs. Mary B. Hook have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the establishment of the Territory of Pembina, subject to morning business.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that, because, as he knows, that bill will cause a good deal of debate.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky rise to present morning business?

Mr. MCCREERY. I rose to ask for the present consideration of House bill No. 567, which is in the order of business. I have tried several days to get the floor to call it up. I am sure it will occupy but a small portion of time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There are some reasons why I think I ought to have the indulgence of the Senate for the consideration of this bill for the establishment of Pembina Territory. It has been reported three successive sessions favorably by the Committee on Territories. It was reported unanimously at this session, four months ago, and has stood near the head of the Calendar for nearly that period of time. When reached on the Calendar the other day its consideration was objected to on the ground that it was too important a bill to be considered on that call. If it is so important, and I believe it is an important bill, it is too important for me to allow it to sleep without an effort for its consideration. I do not believe it will create any extended discussion. I believe in three minutes it can be shown to the satisfaction of the Senate that the bill should pass, and I should be very glad if the bill could be taken up and considered. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] and a similar bill was before the Senate and discussed at considerable length during the last Congress. If it is in order, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCCREERY. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to give me five minutes to take up my bill after the bill organizing Pembina is taken up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will yield five minutes for that purpose.

Mr. SPENCER. I also ask the Senator from Nebraska when he gets his bill up to yield to me for the consideration of the House joint resolution No. 100.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to take up the bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporary government therefor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether this bill is likely to give rise to debate. I gave notice the other day that I desired the Senate to consider this morning the bill to perfect the revision of the laws. That is a bill of great public concern, and I shall not feel that I have performed my duty if I do not press the consideration of it upon the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think this bill will lead to any extended discussion. If it shall, I will say to the honorable Senator that I gave notice several days ago that I should call the bill up at the earliest practicable moment, and I said that I believed it was as important a bill as was likely to be considered at the present session.

Mr. BOUTWELL. We shall differ about that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe it affects the rights of citizens of the United States who have a right to be heard, and it has been now on the Calendar for about four months or a much longer time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me we had better go on with the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the doctrine; one thing at a time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to any yielding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read in committee, so that we may see what we have.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill has just been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not hear it.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any written report with this bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is a report which was made at the last Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read. I suppose it states the general ground upon which this action proceeds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, it states the general ground.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. Boreman, from the Committee on Territories, March 23, 1874:

The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporary government therefor, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

The same bill was before this committee at the second session of the Forty-second Congress, and on February 8, 1872, a favorable report was made thereon, as follows:

"It is proposed by this bill to establish and provide a temporary government for a new Territory out of that part of the Territory of Dakota lying north of the forty-sixth degree of north latitude.

"The present Territory of Dakota contains 150,932 square miles, being in extent about four hundred miles from north to south, and something less than that in width from east to west. It appears from the report of the late census that in 1870 it contained a population of 14,181, exclusive of Indians; but it is now believed, from the best evidence your committee have been able to obtain, that at this time its population numbers more than 25,000.

"The more populous and growing settlements are in the extreme northern and extreme southern portions of the Territory, respectively, the intervening region, except immediately on the eastern border, being in great part uninhabited and without roads or other avenues of communication. There being no direct route of travel between these distant settlements, those residing in the region of Pembina, or indeed in any part of the more northern sections of the Territory, in going to Yankton, the capital, as many of them must necessarily do in the transaction of business with the officers and courts of the Territory, are compelled to travel a distance of from one thousand to fifteen hundred miles, and this by the nearest practicable route; and the same is the case with the judges and other officers in going from the capital to attend to their respective duties in the northern portions of the Territory.

"The Territory for which it is proposed by this bill to provide a government is a parallelogram, extending from Minnesota, on the east, for something less than four hundred miles, to Montana, on the west, and from the British possessions, on the north, two hundred miles to the boundary of the remaining Territory of Dakota, on the south, and has an area of about 70,000 square miles. It contains a population now of not less than 10,000, having received considerable accessions by immigration since the taking of the late census; and it may be added, when separated from Dakota, will leave the latter with a population as large as the whole Territory had in 1870. The contemplated Territory will have a larger population than many of the Territories heretofore established had when they were organized, as may be seen from the following:

Mississippi, organized in 1789, population	8,850
Indiana, organized in 1800, population	5,641
Michigan, organized in 1805, population less than	4,000
Wiscousin, organized in 1836, population	7,000
Minnesota, organized in 1849, population	6,077
Washington, organized in 1853, population	1,201
Dakota, organized in 1861, population	4,837
Nevada, organized in 1861, population	6,857
Arizona, organized in 1863, population	5,000

"The climate and seasons of the new Territory are about the same as in the adjoining State of Minnesota. The land lies beautifully, being comparatively level, and nearly every part of it being susceptible of cultivation. The soil is good, and produces all the grains, vegetables, and fruits common to the Northwestern States. The Northern Pacific Railroad, located as it is through the entire length of the Territory from east to west, and being now in process of construction, will soon supply the means of direct and speedy communication with all parts of the country. And the present indications are that this Territory will continue to rapidly improve and increase in population as it has for two or three years past, thereby extending and adding to the substantial prosperity and wealth of the nation; and it is believed that these desirable results will be greatly facilitated and rendered more certain by the establishment of the temporary government contemplated by this bill."

Since making the above report the Northern Pacific Railroad has been completed to Bismarck, on the Missouri River, a distance of two hundred miles from the western boundary of Minnesota.

Bismarck is a considerable town, and many other small towns and villages have sprung up along the railroad and elsewhere in the Territory; large numbers have been added to the population; immigration still continues, and no doubt is entertained that with the opening of the present spring the influx of population will exceed that of any preceding season.

The following extract from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on the 14th instant, by Hon. M. K. Armstrong, present Delegate from Dakota, your committee believe is a fair and reliable statement of the present condition of that portion of Dakota for which the bill under consideration proposes a separate organization.

"Two hundred miles of the Northern Pacific Railroad have been pushed westward across that Territory from the fertile valley of the Red River to the navigable waters of the Upper Missouri. Two newspapers are published in the proposed Territory, and stirring and enterprising towns have been built up at Fargo, Jamestown, and Bismarck on the said railroad, while immigration and settlement are rapidly filling up the accessible river valleys. Steamboats navigate the Red River nearly two hundred miles into the proposed Territory, returning with thousands of tons of freight for the Hudson Bay settlements; while along said stream in Dakota new towns and mills are being established. Nearly four hundred miles of telegraph line are in operation, and at Pembina, Grand Forks, Fargo, and Richville quite a trade is already carried on in the way of shipping and reshipping freights. United States courts are held at Fargo, Bismarck, and Pembina, and a United States land office has recently been established at the former place, while the settlers are urgently petitioning for a land office at Bismarck to accommodate the increasing settlements in the Missouri Valley. Many large steamboats ply for several hundred miles through the proposed Territory on the waters of the Missouri, and pass far above the mouth of the Yellowstone into Montana, carrying Government freight for the forts and agencies, and mercantile goods for the mining districts. Already several thousand people have gone into this northern territory and are preparing farms, homes, and villages, in anticipation of the favorable action of Congress upon this bill."

It is proper, also, to add that the Legislature of Dakota have twice—in 1871, and again in 1873—memorialized Congress in behalf of the establishment of this new Territory, in which they state with great force the facts which induce them to do so, and urge it as a matter of justice to those inhabiting the proposed Territory, as well as of interest and advantage to the country generally.

To meet the objection that the establishment of another Territory will entail additional charge on the Treasury, the committee submit the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant requesting to be informed of "the charge upon the Treasury for each of the respective existing Territories, and the items that make up the same."

In reply I inclose herewith a statement showing the expenditures under heads of appropriations on account of each Territory during the fiscal years 1872 and 1873. The items of expenditure for fuel, furniture, repairs, lights, &c., are so numerous that it is not practicable to give them in detail.

I am, very respectfully, WM. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. A. I. BOREMAN,
Chairman Committee on Territories, United States Senate.

Aggregate expenditure for the nine Territories for two years, $490,803.78. One-ninth of the above is the average expenditure for one Territory for two years, and is $54,533.75⅓. One-half of the last-named sum shows the average annual expenditure of one Territory, and is $27,266.87.

This communication and statement show the separate and aggregate expenditure out of the Treasury for all the Territories for two consecutive years, thus including the expenses of a session of the Legislature in each, and enabling us to fix the average annual charge on the Treasury for a territorial government. This average, as may be seen above, is $27,266.87, and is a small outlay for the benefits realized from such a government.

It must be conceded that the development and growth of this Territory will tend to add to the wealth and prosperity of the nation, and it can be no less apparent that the thousands of hardy and enterprising people within its boundaries, who, by the sacrifices, energy, and industry indispensable to success in border life, are thus contributing to the resources of the country, have a right, even though it necessitates a small annual draught on such resources, to demand a recognition of their situation, wants, and interests by the establishment of a local government that will be accessible for the transaction of their necessary business at only a reasonable expenditure of their time and means.

The committee, therefore, report back said bill with some verbal amendments, and recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course, at some day or other this will be a proper bill in substance; but it does not appear to me from the statement of the report and with the number of people there now that it is wise to set up a distinct territorial organization, which costs the people a good deal of money and costs the United States a good deal. Of course the organization has to be just as expensive, just as many offices and places, substantially, as if the people were much more numerous than they are. I do not think that in this late stage of the session we ought to hurry a bill of this kind through, and I move therefore to postpone its further consideration until the first Monday in December, which will leave it its place for consideration next winter, when we shall have more recent information about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I trust that motion will not prevail. The bill has been pending upon the Calendar now for four months in the Senate. If anybody is in fault, perhaps I am. I deferred calling it up because it was near the head of the Calendar, and I thought that when the Senate proceeded to the consideration of bills upon the Calendar it would be reached in its proper order and passed without any struggle or objection. I was mistaken in that view, and having failed, in the light of those facts, I perhaps failed to do my duty in not urging it earlier upon the consideration of the Senate. But as a matter of right to the citizens of the United States who have settled in Northern Dakota, I believe this bill should be considered at the present session. It has been repeatedly petitioned for by the inhabitants of the Territory, and twice at least memoralized for by a unanimous memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota. There are special and particular reasons why, as a matter of right to the inhabitants of the Territory and as a matter of economy to the General Government, this Territory should be organized.

The present Territory of Dakota extends from Nebraska on the south to the British possessions on the north, a distance of four hundred miles, and from Minnesota on the east to Montana on the west, almost the same distance. It contains an area of 150,000 square miles; more than three times greater than the State of New York; nearly three times as large as all New England. The present settlements in the Territory of Dakota are comprised in two separate and distinct communities, entirely separate and distinct from their geographical position. The inhabited portion of Southern Dakota, the old-settled portion of Dakota, is along the Missouri River. Its commercial relations are with Nebraska, Sioux City, and through Iowa to Chicago. Northern Dakota, that portion which this bill proposes to create into a new Territory, is settled for two hundred miles along the Northern Pacific Railway and along the Red River of the North. Its commercial relations are with Du Luth, Saint Paul, and Milwaukee.

The business relations of the two portions of the Territory are entirely separate and distinct. The members of the Legislature from the northern part of the Territory of Dakota are often compelled in the winter to travel as far east as Chicago in order to reach the capital. They have been paid for sixteen hundred miles mileage for that travel. So it is to reach the supreme court; so it is in enforcing the United States laws; the expenses of the extra mileage for this wide extent of travel will very nearly make up for the additional expense of the creation of the new Territory. I believe that a wise policy and a just regard for the rights of the citizens of the United States who have gone there to make it their home demand that this bill should be passed and passed at this session.

I trust the Senator from Vermont will not press his motion, but that we may be allowed to vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone the bill until the first Monday in December next.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 10, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion and let the vote be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I made the motion because I thought it was right, and if I withdraw it I should do what I thought was wrong. I do not think the bill ought to be hurried through without more time to consider it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a quorum present. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Cockrell, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Howe, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, and Withers—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Ferry, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, McMillan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Spencer, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—23.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I think this bill ought to pass. There are already two hundred miles of railroad in that Territory; the northern portion of it is settling up very rapidly; and I think it is a fact that is not generally understood that one of the best farming regions in the United States lies in this proposed new Territory. There are several farms already being opened in it of from one thousand to three thousand acres. Two thousand or three thousand acres have been already broken upon several farms. There is one farm opened or partially opened by a company of over thirty thousand acres, and from three thousand to four thousand acres are now under the plow.

The people of that portion of the territory (and it is settling so rapidly that the population is becoming heavier there than in any other part of it) are compelled in order to reach the capital of the present Territory to travel some eight to twelve hundred miles, to come over the railroad through Minnesota and by way of Chicago or Dubuque westward through Iowa, until they reach the capital of their Territory. It seems to me that there is a very good reason for the passage of this bill, and without taking the time of the Senate I hope it may be passed.

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the capital?

Mr. WINDOM. Yankton, the present capital, I will say at the suggestion of my colleague, is situated in the southern part of the Territory, but there is no way of reaching it by the modern means of communication except what I have stated, some eight to twelve hundred miles.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MORTON] until he returns on all political questions, and not regarding this as a political question, I vote yea.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cragin, Ferry, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Kernan, Key, Merrimon, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, and Wadleigh—21.

So the bill was passed.

J. E. PANKEY.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. BOGY. I wish to make a motion in connection with the subject just before the Senate before the bill is disposed of.

Mr. McCREERY. I want the bill taken up, and then the Senator can make his motion. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for the payment to J. E. Pankey of $1,029.12 for unused and uncanceled (tobacco) revenue-stamps which have been returned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and are now on file in his office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. McCREERY. There is a report from the House committee with a letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Finance.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN from the Committee of Claims in the House of Representatives on the 20th of May, 1876:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky, report:

The bill directs the payment to J. E. Pankey the sum of $1,029.12 for unused and uncanceled (tobacco) revenue-stamps which have been returned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and are now on file in his Office.

The letter of the Commissioner accompanying the bill, of date April 4, 1876, addressed to the chairman of this committee, shows that the claimant returned the above amount of stamps to the Commissioner, and your committee are of opinion that the bill for his relief should pass, with an amendment striking out the words "with interest thereon from the 1st day of April, 1872," which occur in the sixth and seventh lines of the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask to finish the reading of the report which was suspended yesterday of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] from the special committee. It was laid over on account of the minority report not being quite ready, and it is now hung up between heaven and earth. I ask that it be read before the Senate so as to get it into the files in the regular way.

Mr. BOGY. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the report made by the Senator from Massachusetts be laid before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the minority report.

Mr. BOGY. I thought I had the floor. I desire to make a motion in connection with the Pembina bill. The Senator from Kentucky would not allow me at that time to go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BOGY. I desire to propose a change of the name of the Territory, and if I give the reasons I think the Senate will adopt the change unanimously.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this can be disposed of in a moment.

Mr. BOGY. I yielded to the Senator from Kentucky a while ago. I move to reconsider the bill passed a few moments ago for the creation of the Territory of Pembina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can enter the motion, but another matter is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

AFFAIRS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand now that these reports are laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I do not ask to have them read clear through if anybody does not want to have them read, but let them be printed in the RECORD, so that we can read them without reading them here, if that is agreeable to everybody.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to both reports being printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BAYARD. Including the minority views?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. It is so ordered.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The special committee appointed under a resolution of the Senate adopted on the 31st of March last, and instructed to inquire how far the rights of the people of Mississippi, guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and secured especially by the fifteenth amendment, were violated by force, fraud, or intimidation at the election held in that State on the 2d of November, 1875, respectfully submit to the Senate the testimony taken, with the conclusions of the committee thereon.

The testimony will fully support the allegation that force, fraud, and intimidation were used generally and successfully in the political canvass of 1875.

But before proceeding to a detailed statement of the facts, and conclusions sustained and warranted by the proof, the committee think it proper to refer to the suggestions and excuses offered in justification of the outrages committed.

It has been alleged that Governor Ames was an unfit person to hold the office to which he was elected in the year 1873; but, on the contrary, the committee find from the evidence as well as from general report in Mississippi that Governor Ames was not only not amenable to any just charge affecting his personal integrity, his character as a public officer, or his ability for the duties of chief magistrate of that State, but that his fitness in all these particulars was sustained by the testimony of those who were not in accord with him politically. The committee refer especially to the testimony of Hon. J. A. P. Campbell, appointed by the existing government one of the judges of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi.

The evidence submitted tends strongly to show, what cannot be denied, that there were many persons in office in the State of Mississippi, especially in elective offices, in the several counties, who were either incapable or dishonest; and there were a few of the same character connected with the State government. The conduct of these persons, however, was not approved by the governor nor by the masses of the republican party.

Complaints and charges against a class of persons called "carpet-baggers" are frequent in the depositions of witnesses opposed to the republican party in the State. It is to be admitted that a small number of the immigrants from other States misused the confidence of the black people, secured office, and betrayed the trusts confided to them. But the number of such persons, compared to the whole number of immigrants, was very small; and it is but just to say that the great majority are intelligent, upright, and brave men from the North, who are entirely incorruptible, and who, in peril of their lives, are now struggling against serious odds to maintain their political opinions and to secure a just administration of the government.

It is alleged that during the last six or eight years the expenses of the State have been unnecessarily increased and that heavy taxes have been imposed for which no adequate return has been received by the people. Comparisons are made between the rate of taxation previous to the war and since the year 1870, and the conclusion is drawn that large sums of money are extorted from the people and wasted, or through negligence and extravagance misapplied.

It is undoubtedly true that taxes are higher in the State of Mississippi than they were previous to 1860; but the rate of increase is far less than in some of the northern States, where no serious complaints are made against the administration of public affairs.

It is to be observed also that previous to the war taxes were not levied for the support of schools in Mississippi; indeed, there was no system of public instruction; and that since the war school-houses have been erected in all parts of the State for the education of the children of both races, and large sums of money have been expended annually for the maintenance of schools, including schools for training teachers.

It is also true that previous to the war the taxes were imposed upon slaves and upon business, while since the war the taxes have been laid chiefly upon personal property and upon land.

In 1873 the State expenses were $953,000; in 1874, $908,000; and in 1875 the expenses were only $618,000. The State debt, not including trust-funds, is only $500,000.

A tax of $1.60 upon each person will pay the public debt and meet the current expenses for a year. (Testimony, page 8.)

Attorney-General Harris makes the following statement in regard to taxation for the period of twenty-six years. He says:

"Take, for example, twenty years of democratic rule in Mississippi, and see what amount of money their own records show were expended, and they held uninterrupted sway, as we can best ascertain from the reports of the auditor and treasurer, made to biennial sessions of their Legislature. Take the twenty years from 1850 to 1870 and compare it with six years of republican rule, from 1870 to 1875, inclusive, the following is shown:

Expenditures:
1850	$295,933 48	1860	$663,536 55
1851	226,407 41	1861	1,824,161 75
1852	802,579 76	1862	6,819,894 54
1853	229,288 45	1863	2,210,794 23
1854	584,296 84	1864	5,446,732 06
1855	311,578 19	1865	1,410,250 13
1856	784,896 79	1866	1,860,809 89
1857	1,067,086 57	1867	625,817 29
1858	614,659 00	1868	525,678 80
1859	707,015 00	1869	463,219 71
	5,623,741 49		20,208,894 95
			5,623,741 49
Total expenditures for twenty years			25,832,646 44

Now, take the republican administration for six years. Expenditures for—

1870	$1,061,249 90	1873	$953,030 00
1871	1,319,626 19	1874	908,330 00
1872	1,098,031 69	1875	618,259 00
	3,478,906 78		2,479,619 00
			3,478,906 78
			5,957,525 78

"Total expenditures for six years, $5,957,525.78.

"The twenty years of democratic administration show an annual average of $1,291,632.32. The six years of republican administration show an annual average of $992,920.96.

"This may be claimed to be unfair, as it embraces four years of the war; but, for the sake of fairness, let us strike out the four years of the war, or the amount expended during those four years, 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864, and add in lieu thereof the amount expended in 1860, $663,536.55, and we have an expenditure of $12,184,019.06, or an annual average of $699,200.95, as against $992,920.96. From this it would appear that the republican administration has been more expensive than the democratic administration; but there are several reasons for this: Before the war the taxes were paid in gold and silver, and everything much cheaper than since the war; and in January, 1870, when the republicans came into power, State warrants were worth about sixty or sixty-five cents on the dollar; the capitol and mansion were dilapidated; the penitentiary and lunatic asylum were too small, and had to be extended and repaired, and all the improvements cost nearly two prices, because payments were made in warrants at their reduced value. And the judiciary system was rendered more expensive to the State by dispensing with the probate court, the expenses of which had been formerly paid by the counties; this jurisdiction was given to the chancery court, and the number of citizens had more than doubled, and all departments of State government rendered necessarily more expensive. And, again, the school system has been carried on at an expense very large, a thing that had never existed before the war. The expenditures for school purposes in the six years have been about $320,000 per annum. Let us add a few items which have been necessary since the war, and for which no expenditures were ever made by the democracy, by way of annual averages, and it will be seen at a glance why it is that the expenditures have been larger than formerly:

For school purposes, (as above)	$320,000
Probate-court business by the chancery court, (probates' salaries by the counties,) (Code, 1857, p. 423)	36,700
Average annual improvements on public buildings, about	100,000
County record, &c., furnished, (destroyed during the war, and exhausted, &c.)	12,500
Making an average per annum of	469,200

"Taking this from the average, $992,920.96, leaves $523,720.96. These were necessary expenses, never incurred by a democratic administration. The only common-school system in the State before the war seemed to be a well-organized system to squander the school fund of the State as rapidly as the same was donated to the State by the Government, as the history of the fund will show. Take these items from the annual expenditures of the six years of republican administration, and the average is reduced per year to $523,720.96; thus showing the average annual expense of the republican administration to be, on the old basis of State expenses, actually $75,480 less than the average expenses under the democratic rule of twenty years, with less than one-half of the citizens to be governed, and at a time when expenditures everywhere were largely in advance of former years. Many other items of extraordinary expenses have been incurred since January, 1870, not included in these statements.

"This, I think, shows a fair statement of the expenditures for the last twenty-six years, twenty years of democratic rule and six years of republican rule.

"The taxes have been increased and decreased for the various State purposes, for the six years alluded to, as follows: 1870, 5 mills on the dollar; in 1871 it was 4 mills; in 1872, 8½ mills; in 1873 it was 12½ mills; in 1874 it was 14 mills; in 1875 it was 9½. In the last three years there was a school tax as follows: 1873 and 1874 a school tax of 4 mills, and for 1875, 2 mills. This is included in the above estimate, and the counties were restricted in their levies for county purposes as follows: By act of 1872 the counties were prohibited from levying a tax which, with the State and school tax added, shall not exceed 25 mills on the dollar, and in 1875 they were restricted to 20 mills on the dollar.

"It seems that the real complaint of the people of the State, as to the burden of taxation, grows out of the fact that the taxable property of the State is, in the main, unproductive; and to evade the tax the tax-payers, in giving their property to the assessor, place it far below its actual value, and continue year after year to reduce the taxable values of the property."

The statements made by Hon. G. E. Harris, attorney-general, Captain H. T. Fisher, and Mr. E. Barksdale are referred to as presenting both sides of the case, and furnishing the best means at the command of the committee for a just judgment.

The testimony taken tends to show that those who participated in the means by which the election of 1875 was carried by the democratic party rely, for justification, upon the facts of maladministration, as set forth in the testimony submitted with this report.

In the opinion of the committee, those errors and wrongs, if admitted to the extent claimed, furnish no justification whatever for the outrages and crimes established by the testimony.

It is also alleged in justification of the acts of intimidation, and of the crimes committed during the canvass and at the election, that Governor Ames had organized, or attempted to organize, a force, termed the negro militia. At the time of the riot at Clinton, on the 4th of September, 1875, which resulted in the death of at least thirty persons, there was no military organization in the State. The sum of $60,000 had been appropriated by the Legislature at its preceding session, for the organization and support of a military force; and the event at Clinton, in connection with the fact of disturbances in other portions of the State, led Governor Ames to attempt its organization. At the same time he issued the following proclamation:

PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Jackson, September 7, 1875.

Whereas persons have formed themselves into military organizations in various parts of the State without sanction of law, and such organizations are moved to the support of each other from point to point in counties and from one county to another without the approval or consent of the peace officers of such counties, and without the knowledge or authority of the state government; and

Whereas such organizations have overthrown civil government in Yazoo County, set it at defiance in Hinds County, and created distrust and fear in Warren and other counties, causing the loss of many lives and compelling many persons to flee from their homes; and

Whereas such action has already caused great injury to the interests of the people, and, if persisted in, will result in incalculable evil:

Now, therefore, I, Adelbert Ames, governor of the State of Mississippi, do hereby make proclamation and command all persons belonging to such organizations to disband forthwith; and I hereby require all citizens to render obedience to and assist the peace officers of the various counties in the preservation of peace and order and the enforcement of the laws of the State.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Mississippi to be affixed, this the 7th day of September, A. D. 1875.

[L. S.] ADELBERT AMES.

By the governor:

JAMES HILL, Secretary of State.

Some of the officers selected by him were native-born white citizens who had served in the late war on the side of the confederates, and he solicited and accepted recruits from the white as well as from the black population. (See testimony of General Hurst, page 87.)

This effort on the part of the governor, it is now claimed, was the occasion seized by the democrats for organizing and arming themselves, ostensibly to resist the black militia; but, in fact, such organization had been effected previously, as is shown by the testimony concerning the Clinton riot, and in the end it became the means by which the colored inhabitants and the white republicans of the State were overawed, intimidated, and deprived of their rights as citizens. (See testimony of Hon. H. Swann, pages 307, 308; W. A. Montgomery, page 546; and others.)

These organizations were the instruments also by which numerous murders were committed upon persons who were then active, or who had been active, in the republican party.

By the terms of the peace conference entered into by General J. Z. George, the chairman of the democratic State committee, and Governor Ames, on the 13th of October, 1875, the attempt to organize the militia was abandoned, General George on his part agreeing to secure a peaceful election and the full and free enjoyment of the elective franchise by every citizen. The stipulation on the part of the governor was faithfully kept, but the promise made by General George was systematically disregarded by the democrats in the larger portion of the State.

The outrages perpetrated by the white people in the canvass and on the day of election find no justification whatever in the acts or the policy of Governor Ames concerning the State militia.

The effort on his part to organize the militia for the preservation of the public peace seems to the committee to have been not only lawful but proper, and the course of the democrats in organizing and arming themselves to resist the governor in his efforts to preserve the public peace was unlawful, and the proceedings should have been suppressed by the State authorities if possible, and, in case of failure on their part, by the Government of the United States.

The constitution of the State provides that the militia shall consist of the able-bodied male citizens between the age of eighteen years and the age of forty-five years, and the Legislature provided for its organization by an act passed at its first session in the year 1870. It was the duty of the governor to use the militia for the suppression of such riots as those of Vicksburgh and Clinton, and this without regard to the question whether the white or the black race was most responsible therefor.

In the opinion of the committee the riot at Clinton was in harmony with the policy previously adopted by democrats in that vicinity, and designed to intimidate and paralyze the republican party. The testimony shows that the riot was inaugurated by a body of eight or ten young men from Raymond, who acted, apparently, under the advice of the Raymond Gazette, a democratic newspaper, edited by G. W. Harper, an aged and highly respected man, according to the testimony of Frank Johnston, W. A. Montgomery, (page 559,) and others.

The riot occurred September 4, and the Raymond Gazette, as early as June or July, gave this advice:

"There are those who think that the leaders of the radical party have carried this system of fraud and falsehood just far enough in Hinds County, and that the time has come when it should be stopped—peaceably if possible, forcibly if necessary. And to this end it is proposed that whenever a radical pow-wow is to be held, the nearest anti-radical club appoint a committee of ten discreet, intelligent, and reputable citizens, fully identified with the interests of the neighborhood and well known as men of veracity, to attend as representatives of the tax-payers of the neighborhood and county, and true friends of the negroes assembled, and that whenever the radical speakers proceed to mislead the negroes, and open with falsehoods, and deceptions, and misrepresentations, the committee stop them right then and there, and compel them to tell the truth or quit the stand."

Nor do these outrages find any excuse in the statement made repeatedly by witnesses, that the negroes were organizing or threatened or contemplated organizing themselves into military bands for the destruction of the white race. The evidence shows conclusively that there were not only no such organizations, but that the negroes were not armed generally; that those who had arms were furnished with inferior and second-hand weapons, and that their leaders, both religious and political, had discountenanced a resort to force. Many rumors were current among the whites that the negroes were arming and massing in large bodies, but in all cases these rumors had no basis.

In a sentence, it may be asserted that all the statements made that there was any justifiable cause for the recent proceedings in Mississippi are without foundation.

On the other hand, it is to be said, speaking generally, that a controlling part and, as we think, a majority, of the white democratic voters of the State were engaged in a systematic effort to carry the election, and this with a purpose to resort to all means within their power, including on the part of some of them the murder of prominent persons in the republican party, both black and white.

There was a minority, how large the committee are unable to say, who were opposed to the outrages which by this report are proved to have taken place. This minority, however, is for the time overawed and as powerless to resist the course of events as are the members of the republican party. Under more favorable circumstances they may be able to co-operate with the friends of order and redeem the State from the control of the revolutionary element.

(1.) The committee find that the young men of the State, especially those who reached manhood during the war or who have arrived at that condition since the war, constitute the nucleus and the main force of the dangerous element.

As far as the testimony taken by the committee throws any light upon the subject it tends, however, to establish the fact that the democratic organizations, both in the counties and in the State, encouraged the young men in their course, accepted the political advantages of their conduct, and are in a large degree responsible for the criminal results.

(2.) There was a general disposition on the part of white employers to compel the laborers to vote the democratic ticket. This disposition was made manifest by newspaper articles, by the resolutions of conventions, and by the declarations of land-owners, planters, and farmers to the workmen whom they employed, and by the incorporation in contracts of a provision that they should be void in case the negroes voted the republican ticket.

(3.) Democratic clubs were organized in all parts of the State, and the able-bodied members were also organized generally into military companies and furnished with the best arms that could be procured in the country. The fact of their existence was no secret, although persons not in sympathy with the movement were excluded from membership. Indeed their object was more fully attained by public declarations of their organization in connection with the intention, everywhere expressed, that it was their purpose to carry the election at all hazards.

In many places these organizations possessed one or more pieces of artillery. These pieces of artillery were carried over the counties and discharged upon the roads in the neighborhood of republican meetings and at meetings held by the democrats. For many weeks before the election members of this military organization traversed the various counties, menacing the voters and discharging their guns by night as well as by day. This statement is sustained by the testimony of Captain W. A. Montgomery, Captain E. O. Sykes, J. D. Vertner, leading democrats in their respective counties, as well as by the testimony of a large number of trustworthy republicans.

(4.) It appears from the testimony that, for some time previous to the election, it was impossible, in a large number of the counties, to hold republican meetings. In the republican counties of Warren, Hinds, Lowndes, Monroe, Copiah, and Holmes meetings of the republicans were disturbed or broken up, and all attempts to engage in public discussion were abandoned by the republicans many weeks before the election.

(5.) The riots at Vicksburgh on the 5th of July and at Clinton on the 4th of September were the results of a special purpose on the part of the democrats to break up the meetings of the republicans, to destroy the leaders, and to inaugurate an era of terror, not only in those counties, but throughout the State, which would deter republicans, and particularly the negroes, from organizing or attending meetings, and especially deter them from the free exercise of the right to vote on the day of the election. The results sought for were in a large degree attained.

(6.) Following the riot at Clinton, the country for the next two days was scoured by detachments from these democratic military organizations over a circuit of many miles, and a large number of unoffending persons were killed. The number has never been ascertained correctly, but it may be estimated fairly as between thirty and fifty.

Among the innocent victims of those days of horror and crime was Mr. William P. Haffa, a white man, a teacher by profession, a justice of the peace by the choice of his fellow-citizens, and a candidate for re-election upon the republican ticket. He was a resident of Philadelphia with his family until the year 1870, when he emigrated to Mississippi for the purpose of planting. The story of his assassination as related by his wife is here given in full:

ASSASSINATION OF MR. HAFFA.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 7, 1876.

Mrs. ALZINA F. HAFFA sworn and examined.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Have you lived in Mississippi; and, if so, how long?

Answer. Yes, sir; it will be seven years next February since I went there.

Q. Where did you live before that?

A. In Philadelphia, my native place.

Q. What was your husband's name?

A. William P. Haffa.

Q. Did you go to Mississippi with him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. He is not living now?

A. No, sir.

Q. Will you state to the committee the time when he died and the circumstances of his death?

A. Do you desire me to state anything previous to that?

Q. You can state just what took place in Mississippi that you think important.

A. We were there about two months and a half or three months——

Q. When did you go there?

A. In February.

Q. What year?

A. Eighteen hundred and seventy; seven years next February. Mr. Haffa went there for the purpose of raising cotton and corn.

Q. Where did you live?

A. In Hinds County, third district.

VISITED TO DEFINE HIS POLITICS.

Q. Near what town?

A. I cannot tell you how many miles from Vicksburgh, I don't remember; but we lived within a few miles of Auburn, Mississippi; I think it was two or three miles. After we had been living there about three months we were waited upon by the owners of the land, and they asked Mr. Haffa whether he was a friend to the white people or to the nigger, using a profane word. They called him outside and I followed him and stood at the door and heard what they said.

Q. Do you know who these people were?

A. Frank and William Bush, the owners of the land. William Bush was not an owner, but Frank was. William Bush was the agent for his wife and did all the business connected with the estate, which belonged to his wife. Her name was Mollie Bush.

Mr. Haffa said he was a friend to any one, be he black or white, that was deserving of his friendship. They then said to him, "We understand that you are a friend of the nigger," using profane language; and they made some other remarks, I don't remember what; but they went away, and a short time after that they came back and inquired for him. He was not in; he was out in the field. They went out there where he was, and my little boy, who was out there, said that they used some insulting language toward Mr. Haffa, and that they threatened him. He came in very much excited from the field and said to me, "Mamma, I am afraid there will be difficulty here."

ELECTED JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

Then the colored people nominated him for squire—magistrate—and he received his appointment from Governor Alcorn, who was then governor of Mississippi. That raised the indignation of the white people. They declared no northern man should come down there and rule them. So they sent up a number of petitions to have him removed. Governor Alcorn said there was nothing against him that he could find out, and unless there was something else against him than his birth he could not do anything, as long as it was the desire of the majority of the people, who are colored people.

So then he fulfilled his office for two years, and the first election came on and he was renominated for the same position, and he was elected by the people at that time. Then he had occasion to have some business with these people, the Bushes.

MR. HAFFA LASHED.

Q. Was it private or public business?

A. I have forgotten now; I cannot say. They came to the house one Saturday afternoon; I don't know what time it was, but anyhow they got the colored people all to leave the premises except one, an old colored woman; she could not get away. They came to the house and asked me if Mr. Haffa was in. I said, "Yes." They said they wanted to see him. I went to the door as usual—I always went to the door when there was white people come around, for I was very much afraid of them myself.

So they got him out by a tree a short distance off, and they had hitched their horses to that tree. I watched them, and they took a cowhide and commenced to lash him very freely with it. I ran out and grasped him around the waist. They said, "We will show you what southern blood is." Mr. Haffa never said a word. I said, "Mr. Bush, you have a wife in heaven and a child also, here; remember what your fate will be. I am here among strangers." He says, "Well, you have got no business to be down here among such an illiterate class of people."

MRS. HAFFA INJURED.

And, finally, I kept on, and I presume it lasted over an hour, perhaps two hours; and they kept on until they got up to the house, and then Frank Bush took hold of me and threw me violently against a sill in front of the door, and the effects of it I have never got over yet. I was laid up in consequence of it for about a month. I was taken to Jackson, Mississippi. Senator Caldwell, of Mississippi, a colored man, paid my expenses there, which cost him $50. I was there for a month to be recuperated; I was not ab'e to be home at all; they had no hopes of me.

In the mean time Mr. Haffa had gone to Jackson to make his bond for his position as magistrate for the second term. He was there for a few days and then went back and attended to his business, leaving me there.

HER HUSBAND INSULTED—HER BOY FIRED AT.

Then I went home, and there was nothing of any moment occurred for several months. Then Robinnett, a brother-in-law of these Bushes, met Mr. Haffa coming from the depot with my little boy, who was on a mule, and Mr. Haffa was on a horse. Robinnett came up to Mr. Haffa and took hold of his whiskers, and told him he wanted him to come down off his horse and he would have it out with him there. Mr. Haffa somehow got away from him and put spurs to his horse, and the horse ran, and then Robinnett fired at my little boy.

ATTEMPT AT ASSASSINATION.

Owing to the excitement he could not get out any warrant to have the man arrested, and there was never anything done with him. So, repeatedly after that, the Bushes made attempts at Mr. Haffa, and Mr. Haffa had always somebody with him wherever he went. He had to be guarded by the colored people. Even in going to the stable, which was no farther than from here across the street, he was afraid of his life. One evening after he came home from the depot—he went there generally of a Saturday to get his mail—a son of a member of the board of supervisors—I think he was a supervisor; he was an officer anyhow; his name was Fatheree. I always answered the door if anybody called at night, and, in fact, in the day-time as well as night, for I thought I might do better than Mr. Haffa—he came to the door and says: "Is Mr. Haffa in?" Says I, "Yes, sir." He says, "I wish to see him on business." I said, "Won't you alight and walk in?" He said, "No." I went in and told Mr. Haffa, and I went out with a candle, and he says to me, "Mamma, you go in; it is too cold for you here, you will take cold." The young man says to him, "Send your wife in; I want to talk about business and it is not prudent for ladies to be present." There was a colored woman, a school-teacher, there, standing by me. Mr. Haffa then spoke in a more emphatic manner than usual, for me to go in, and I went to turn around with the candle to go in when this colored woman just shook her head that way, [indicating,] and I said, "I will not go in;" and I turned, and at that moment saw a pistol aimed at Mr. Haffa. He had it cocked, but Mr. Haffa snatched it from his hand, and made him get down off his horse, and put him in the cotton-house and locked him up until next morning. In the morning he knocked at the door and prayed to be let out, and asked Mr. Haffa's pardon, and said he did not intend anything.

Mr. Haffa thought, probably, on account of the feeling, that it would be better to be lenient than to use harsh means, though he had him in his power, so he let him out; and said he, "Squire, won't you give me my pistol?" It was a small Derringer pistol. Mr. Haffa said, "I don't know that I will." He said, "Will you give it back to me, please? I will promise you I won't do any such thing as that again, and I am very sorry for it, but I was put up to do it." Mr. Haffa said, "Who put you up to do it?" and he would not say who it was; and he gave him back his pistol, and he went home.

Two or three days after that his mother called on me—Mr. Haffa was absent at the time—and made an apology to me for the conduct of her son. Mr. Haffa says, "We will think nothing about it; we will let it slide, as long as he made reparation for it. In that way probably I can overcome them by kindness."

MRS. HAFFA TEACHES SCHOOL AND ADVISES COLORED VOTERS.

Then he came on North here and remained a year, and left me there as teacher. I have been teacher there ever since the public schools have been in vogue. The school-house was only twenty or thirty yards from my house, and we held all our club meetings there, and in the absence of Mr. Haffa I attended to the business of the colored people; was their secretary part of the time, and I did various other things for them.

During the election of McKee the colored people waited on me and asked me if I would persuade them to vote for McKee. They left it all to me whether he was the right kind of a man for them to have to represent them in Congress. I had heard Mr. Haffa speak very happily of Mr. McKee as well as several of his intimate friends at Jackson, one of whom, I think, was Captain Fisher; so I said to them, "Vote for McKee; vote the republican ticket straight through; don't allow anything to influence you against voting that ticket." They had implicit confidence in me from the fact of my being there so long; and they always consulted me in every respect during Mr. Haffa's absence.

I taught day-school and night-school up to the day of Mr. Haffa's murder. He came back, I don't remember exactly what time, but I think it was in May—April or May, somewhere.

MR. HAFFA TEACHES SCHOOL.

Q. How long ago was it?

A. I think it was three years ago last May, if my memory serves me right. The colored people waited on him and asked him if he would take their school to teach, about seven miles from there. He said he did not know whether he would or not. They asked him if he would take an office at the next election. Said they, "We are determined to have you somewhere, because we are afraid we are going to lose you. We are very much afraid of that, and you have got to remain here with us."

He always consulted me in every question; said he, "Mamma, what would you advise me to do?" Said I, "Do just as you think best. If you think it will be remunerative, perhaps you had better take the school." He said he would give them an answer. So they came again, and he finally determined to take the school, and he taught the school up to the time he was assassinated.

WARNED OF IMPENDING DANGER.

The school closed on Friday, and the public school was opened the following Monday and on Monday, the 6th of September—I have forgotten whether it was between two and three or three and four o'clock in the morning—but my affidavit that I made out in Jackson has the precise time, but I have forgotten now. There was a number of colored people waited on Mr. Haffa on the Sunday before. He attended their Sunday-school, and always preached there Sunday for the colored people; and he came back and they said to him, "Squire, don't you feel afraid of your life? Don't you feel timid?" He said, "No, I am not timid." They said that the white people said they were going to destroy very many, and that they were not going to escape a limb, and that he was mentioned as one of them. Said, he, "O, no; there is so much braggadocio about them, I don't suppose they will harm me now, after we have been living here so many years, and they have attempted it so often."

A FEDERAL OFFICER APOLOGIZES FOR HIS NEGLECT OF DUTY.

I neglected to say that when we were first struck, how he would take it to court and a gentleman that has a United States position, he came to him and apologized for not doing his duty to him. I think he is now United States marshal. When we first went there he was sheriff, and the Bushes were wealthy, and he said, "Mr. Haffa, it is no use for you to be butting yourself against the bricks while you have no money and the Bushes are wealthy, and you might as well drop the case right away, for you can't gain anything."

But Mr. Haffa laid his damages at $10,000. I heard Mr. Haffa say that himself; and he got defeated out of it. Through Mr. Lake not sending the papers to the proper place at the circuit court our damages were all lost and we never got anything.

When the election came around again Lake came to Mr. Haffa and apologized to him. He said, "I am very sorry for what has happened; it was my fault that those papers did not reach their destination." Says Mr. Haffa, "Is it so?" Says he, 'Yes.'"

Q. Do you remember Mr. Lake's first name?

A. No, sir. They told me that he had a position there when I was in Jackson.

THE ASSASSINATION OF MR. HAFFA DESCRIBED.

We were aroused by the barking of our dog furiously on the morning of the 6th of September. I hallooed, "Who is there?" and no answer. I repeated it, and there was no answer. And then Mr. Haffa got up and said, "Who is there?" They said, "We will let you know who is there;" or, "You will know who is there," or something to that effect; and I said, "My God; they have the yard full of men." I presume there were from fifty to seventy-five men barricading the whole of the house. And they had not only armed themselves with one or two weapons, but they had some of them half a dozen, because I could see them. They had them buckled around them, besides the musket that they carried.

They tried to unfasten the door to get in, but we had a small crevice where we could insert our foot between the door and the sill, and I inserted my foot between the door and the sill and kept the door closed, and they could not get in. My daughter assisted me also. Finding they could not get in they finally took one of the fence-rails and broke the door down and part of the furniture; and we were hallooing all the time, "Murder! murder!" and no one came to our assistance. They could hear me halloo "murder" for about two miles, as the neighbors told me afterward. Finally, Mosely, the agent of the Singer sewing-machine, came up to me and choked me, and held a revolver close to my head. Before he choked me I said, "I am not afraid; if you will take me and spare my husband that is all I ask." And Mosely said to me, when I called his name several times, "Sh—! sh—!" I had a nursing baby then, and it was lying on the bed, screaming. After I was choked so I could not halloo any longer, my daughter came, and she left me and went over to her father; and they broke a shutter off the window and fired at Mr. Haffa; and my little boy told me yesterday—I have him at boarding-school, at least at a house out in Germantown—he said that he would take oath any time that it was Jimmy Whitehead who fired one of the shots at Mr. Haffa; and Sid. Whitehead, the owner of the land that we rented our land from, he had threatened Mr. Haffa's life several times, which the children know of.

They fired twice, and I went to him, and he asked me to take him to the bed; so my daughter and I assisted him to the bed; and—we had no light; it was utter darkness there—and says he to me, "Mamma, I want water." As soon as I could get a light I gave him water and laid him down, and ran out for assistance, and sent my little boy over to some colored people, and they came rushing over.

Finally Sid. Whitehead came along and refused to let me have a physician; he said it was no use, that he would die anyhow. Mr. Haffa spoke as strongly as I am speaking, and he asked for water, and that was all he asked for. He said, "Mamma, I am going to die," and he asked God to have mercy on his soul, and he laid his head on my shoulder and expired.

THE WIDOW FORCED TO DENY THAT SHE KNEW ONE OF THE ASSASSINS.

So after the colored people had laid him away I said to Mr. Sid. Whitehouse, "Mosely is the one that choked me; and he held a revolver at my head;" and Sid. Whitehouse said, "You know Mr. Mosely was not here." I said, "Yes, sir; he was;" and he spoke out—that is Jimmy Whitehead—to say that I had to recall those words for the sake of my life. They made me recall it, and say it was not him.

PROFANE LANGUAGE—ABUSE OF NORTHERN PEOPLE—A COFFIN REFUSED.

They came there together and set up the first night—Whitehead and two or three other gentlemen—and they did nothing but use profane language all the time, and abuse the northern people. They said that they would show them that they were fully armed now and ready for war at any time, and that they could not rule over them and do as they pleased with them.

They would not allow me to have a coffin for him at all. Colonel Griffin, formerly United States Senator here—so he told me—he came and said, "Mrs. Haffa, I regret this very much." Says he, "I cannot get a coffin for you, for they won't allow any travel through."

Do you want to know anything about the other men that were assassinated the same day?

ASSASSINATION OF A FATHER AND SON.

Q. If you know any others you may specify them. You have not yet given the date of the night when this took place?

A. This was the 6th of September, 1875. Well, after Mr. Haffa was gone, the colored people, who were very friendly toward us, all the colored people, they were there, and they said, "Well, I would like to see any one come to my house and kill me in as brutal a manner as they did the squire. We have lost our best friend." The names of the people who said this were Stevens; and his wife said, "I must go home." He says to her, "Yes, you better go home, for I will be the next one." Mr. Whitehead said, "Dolph"—his name was Adolph—"you better be careful how you talk, or the men will be after you." So about 11 o'clock these men came back to see if Mr. Haffa was gone, and they were looking like hungry wolves; the most fiendish-looking men I ever saw. They said, "Any colored people secreted about your premises here?" Says I, "No, sir." There was nobody in the house then but my children and Mr. Haffa. I said, "There is nobody here, but you are privileged to come in and examine the premises, and look up the chimney." Two of them alighted, and came in and looked around, and they said that was all they wanted to know.

They went over to these colored people's houses, and took the Stevenses, father and son, out, and stood them on a stump and shot them, and killed them instantly.

Q. Did you know these people who came to your house the last time?

A. No, sir; I could not know them.

Q. Were they disguised in any way?

A. No, sir; not the last time, they were not; the first time they were disguised. They did not give them any warning, any more than they did Mr. Haffa, when they came in the house and took them out.

They said they had a large day's work on hand, and that they had to commence early; and during that day they perpetrated a number of murders. They were after Senator Caldwell, but I don't know whether they got him at that time or not; I never found out.

THE WIDOW ORDERED TO LEAVE.

Mr. Whitehead then gave me ten days' notice to leave; and so the colored people harbored me. I could not get away from there, as no one came in and out of the depot, for they were afraid to go there.

Mr. Haffa was buried in a rude box, and just the colored people and my son went along. He was just wrapped up in a sheet; they would not allow it in any other way.

Mr. Whitehead said that I must leave, that we were looked upon as spies here. The colored people harbored me until I got a conveyance to take me to the depot. Finally, there was a man, an intimate friend of Mr. Haffa's, came out with three pistols belted around him, and said he would take us in.

THE COLORED PEOPLE DISARMED.

They disarmed all the colored people through the country there, took their arms from them, and would not allow them to have any; and before I left for the depot they made the colored people break up their clubs, and every one of them joined the democratic clubs; they compelled them to do so or their life, one or the other. They were given ribbons, and I could see them marching along to the democratic clubs at Auburn and Utica; they went to and fro.

CAPTAIN MONTGOMERY GIVES HELP.

We went to the depot, and there they sent for Captain Montgomery. I had no money, and I was obliged to leave everything; I had not even a change of clothing; and Captain Montgomery raised me a purse of between thirty and forty dollars, and I went to Jackson. I had to make some purchases there for the children; and after I got there I was taken into Mr. Wolf's house, the superintendent of education, and his family received me very kindly. He was an intimate friend of Mr. Haffa's, and he said he would do all he could for me; but he could not have me there at his house at all, because his life would be in jeopardy; but said that he would call on the governor, and that he would send his officials around to take my affidavit, and he would secrete me at the hotel and pay my board while I was there. This is the document that he drew up, [exhibiting paper.]

And he went around among the republican members of the government, and he was chagrined at the republicans not doing more than they did. Governor Ames donated $5 and gave me a ticket half way to Cincinnati; and after I arrived at Cincinnati with my three children I had to beg my way on to Philadelphia. I was only a few hours at Mr. Wolf s house, and then was taken to the hotel there.

Q. How many children have you?
A. I have two; I have lost my baby.
Q. What is your age?
A. Thirty-eight.

The story of the murder of Square Hodge, a colored man, Sunday morning, September 5, is thus told by his wife:

ASSASSINATION OF SQUARE HODGE.

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, June 19, 1876.

ANN HODGE (colored) sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Question. How old are you?
Answer. Eighteen years old.
Q. Have you been married?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is your husband's name?
A. Square Hodge.
Q. Where do you live now?
A. Eight miles below Raymond.
Q. Do you know anything about the Clinton riot last September?
A. I was not there. I know my husband came home; he was there.
Q. What day of the week was that?
A. On Saturday. The riot was on Saturday.
Q. Did your husband come home to your place?
A. Yes, sir; he came home Saturday night, in the night.
Q. Was he hurt?
A. He was shot in the arm.
Q. Could he use his arm?
A. No, sir; he could not use it all. He had it in a sling.
Q. Did he tell you how he got hurt?
A. Only that he got shot. That is all he told me.
Q. Did he stay at home that night?
A. Yes, sir.

WHITE PEOPLE CAME FOR HIM.

Q. On Sunday morning what happened?
A. The white people came there after him in the morning.
Q. Who were they?
A. Henry Quick, Willy Locke, Bryan McDonald, John McDonald, George Allen, John McNeir, and Allen Grafton came.
Q. Any more?
A. No, sir; I did not know any more. Two or three, I didn't know them.
Q. Did they have horses or come on foot?
A. All riding.
Q. On horses?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did they have any guns?
A. Yes, sir; guns and pistols.
Q. They came to your house?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was in the house besides yourself?
A. Me and my brother there and another brother.
Q. Who is he?
A. John Jones.
Q. Who else?
A. My other brother, Lewis, and brother William, and my mother and little children.
Q. How many children?
A. Five of them.
Q. Have you any children yourself?
A. Yes, sir; I have two.
Q. Did these men come in the house?
A. Allen Grafton and John McNeir came in. The rest staid around the house.

THEY FIND HODGE.

Q. What was done?
A. They made my brother come out from under the bed—my brother John—and asked where Square was, and said, "Is he in the room?" and I did not tell, and said I did not know, at first. Then he asked if they had been at the Clinton riot, and I said that I did not know. Then he said, "If you don't tell, I will shoot your God damned brains out." They made him come out from under the bed, and started to shoot under the house—mother put the children under the house; she was scared and put the children under the house, and they gone around. There is two doors in the house. They had pistols pointed under the house, and I told them that nobody was under but the children. Then they came into the house, but could not find Square, and they went out right where he was, and snatched off the weather-boards, only one in the room, and the other went outside the door and snatched the weather-board and turned back the bed, and made him come out, and called him a damned son of a bitch, and said he must come with them. Mr. Quick says, "I told you this; if you had listened to me you would not have come to this," and they told him to put his shoes on, and I got them and said I will put them on; and I had to put them on and could not tie them very well; and some one said, "Let the God damned shoes be; he don't need any shoes." I put my brother's coat on him, and they carried him before them.

Q. On the horse?
A. No, sir; he walked before them away toward Raymond.
Q. Now what happened?
A. Nothing else.

"THEY KILLED HIM."

Q. What became of your husband?
A. They killed him. I never did find him for a week, until the next Saturday.
Q. Where did you find him?
A. Near about a mile and a half to the last bridge to Raymond, in the swamp.
Q. Who found him?
A. A colored man who was running off, keeping out of the way of the rebs, too, and he come across the body, and went and got a spade, and dug a hole and put a blaze on the trees all the way out, and then we got the news; and Mr. Quick he took and made a box for us, and he loaned us a wagon, and we went after him that Saturday.

THE BODY FOUND.

Q. You found his body?
A. The buzzards had eat the entrails; but from the body down here [indicating] it was as natural as ever. His shoes were tied just as I had tied them. The skull bone was on the outside of the grave, and this arm was out slightly and the other was off. Some we didn't find. We picked up the rings of the backbone. We got the pocket-book, and there was the hat hanging up, and this ring was put on the tree and the black one was on the ground; this one.

By Mr. BAYARD:

Q. Did you ever take an oath before?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know the meaning of taking an oath?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know what the consequences are of swearing falsely?
A. No, sir.

ASSASSINATION OF SENATOR CALDWELL.

An equally horrid crime was the murder of Senator Caldwell and his brother, at Clinton, Christmas night. A history of the events of that evening is given by Mrs. Caldwell, which we here quote in her own words.

Mrs. MARGARET ANN CALDWELL (colored) sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. What is your name?
Answer. Margaret Ann Caldwell.
Q. Where do you live?
A. In Clinton, Hinds County.
Q. Was Mr. Caldwell, formerly senator, your husband?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was his first name?
A. Charles.
Q. When did he die?
A. Thursday night, in the Christmas. Him and his brother was killed.
Q. You may state to the committee what you know of his death.
A. I know when he left the house on the Thursday evening, in the Christmas, between dark and sundown. In the beginning of the day he was out on his fox-chase all day. The first commencement was an insult passed on his nephew, and he came out home.

STORY OF HIS ASSASSINATION.

Q. Who was that?
A. David Washington; he is in Washington City now. He is there in business; watchman in the Treasury Department now; has been ever since October, I think. So they picked a fuss; Waddy Rice in George Washington's blacksmith shop in Clinton. They commenced talking this way: I think David asked. "How many did he kill on the day of the Moses Hill riot; who did he shoot?" David said that he did not know as he shot anybody; said he didn't know that he shot anybody. They told him, he said, "he came there to kill the white people, and if he did, to do his work in the day, and not to be seeking their lives at night." David came immediately back to my house. His uncle was at the fox-chase. I said, "Don't go out any more. Probably they are trying to get up a fuss here."

His uncle sent him down for something. He staid in the house until he came.

That was about four o'clock in the evening, and some one had told about the fuss picked with his nephew, and he walked down town to see about it, I suppose. He was down town a half hour, and came back and eat his dinner, and just between dark and sundown he goes back down town again. He went down town knocking about down there. I do not know what he was doing down there, until just nearly dusk, and a man, Madison Bell, a colored man, came and says, "Mrs. Caldwell, you had better go down and see about Mr. Caldwell, I think the white folks will kill him; they are getting their guns and pistols, and you had better go and get your husband away from town."

I did not go myself; I did not want to go myself, but went to Professor Bell and said would he go and get him. Mr. Bell went, and he never came back at all until he came back under arrest.

I was at my room until just nearly dark.

The moon was quite young, and the chapel bell rang.

We live right by it. I knew the minute the bell tolled what it all meant.

And the young men that lived right across the street, when the bell tolled they rushed right out; they went through the door and some slid down the window and over they sprang; some went over the fence. They all ran to the chapel and got their guns. There was one hundred and fifty guns there to my own knowing; had been there since the riot, at the Baptist chapel. They all got their guns.

I went down town, and then all got ahead everywhere I went; and some of them wanted to know who I was, but I hid my face as well as I could. I just said "woman," and did not tell who I was.

As I got to town I went to go into Mr. Chilton's store and every store was closed just that quick, for it was early, about six o'clock. All the other stores were closed. Chilton's was lit up by a big chandelier, and as I went over the lumber-yard I saw a dead man. I stumbled over him, and I looked at him, but I did not know who it was, and I went into Chilton's, and as I put my foot up on the store steps, standing as close may be a few feet, (everything was engaged in it that day,) there was Judge Cabinis, who was a particular friend of my husband; a particular friend to him. He was standing in the center with a gun with a blue strap, in the center of the jam; and as I went to go in they cussed me and threatened to hurt me, and "make it damned hot for me," and the judge among the balance; but he said he didn't know me afterward. And they all stood; nobody would let me go in; they all stood there with their guns.

I know there was two dead men there, but I did not think it was my husband at the time.

I stood right there, and as I stood they said to me, "If you don't go away they would make it very damned hot for me;" and I did not say anything, and walked off, and walked right over the dead man. He was right in my path where I found the body. He was lying broadside on the street. I did not know who he was. I then stooped and tried to see who he was, and they were cursing at me to get out of the town—to get out.

Then I went up, and there was Mrs. Bates across the street, my next-door neighbor. I seed her little girl come up by us and she said, "Aunt Ann, did you see my uncle here?" I said, "I did not. I saw a dead body on the street; I did not see who he was." She said, "What in the world is going on down town?" Says I, "I don't know, only killing people there." She says, "Aaron Bates's hand is shot all to pieces, and Dr. Bangs is killed." He was not killed, but was shot in the leg; nobody killed but my husband and brother.

I went on over to the house, and went up-stairs and back to my room and laid down a widow.

After I had been home I reckon three-quarters of an hour, nearly an hour, Parson Nelson came up—Preacher Nelson—and he called me. I was away up-stairs. He called several times, and I heard him call each time. He called three or four times, and says, "Answer; don't be afraid; nobody will hurt you." He says, "Don't be afraid; answer me;" and after I had made up my mind, I answered him what he wanted; and he said, "I have come to tell you the news, and it is sad news to you. Nobody told me to come, but I come up to tell you." I didn't say anything. "Your husband is dead," he said: "he is killed, and your brother, too, Sam."

I never said anything for a good while. He told me nobody would hurt me then; and when I did speak, says I, "Mr. Nelson, why did they kill him?" He says, "I don't know anything about it." He said just those words: "I don't know anything about it." He says, after that, "Have you any men folks about the place?" I says, "No." He says, "You shan't be hurt; don't be afraid of us; you shan't be hurt."

I never said anything whatever. He went off.

Sam's wife was there at the same time with three little children. Of course it raised great excitement.

After a length of time, Professor Hillman, of the institute, the young ladies' school or college, he brought the bodies to the house; brought up my husband, him and Frank Martin. Professor Hillman and Mr. Nelson had charge of the dead bodies, and they brought them to the house; and when they brought them, they carried them in the bed-room, both of them, and put them there; they seed to having them laid out, and fixed up and all that.

Mr. Nelson said in my presence, I listened at him, he said, "A braver life never had died than Charley Caldwell. He never saw a man died with a manlier spirit in his life."

He told me he had brought him out of the cellar.

You see when they had shot Sam, his brother, it was him who was lying there on the street. They shot him right through his head, off of his horse, when he was coming in from the country, and he fell on the street. He was the man I stumbled over twice I did not know who he was. When they shot him, they said that they shot him for fear he would go out of town and bring in other people and raise a fuss. He found out, I suppose, that they had his brother in the cellar, so he just lay there dead; he that was never known to shoot a gun or pistol in his life—never knew how.

Mr. Nelson said that Buck Cabell carried him into the cellar; persuaded him to go out and drink; insisted upon his taking a drink with him, and him and Buck Cabell never knowed anything against each other in his life; never had no hard words. My husband told him no, he didn't want any Christmas. He said "You must take a drink with me," and entreated him, and said, "You must take a drink." He then took him by the arm and told him to drink for a Christmas treat; that he must drink; and carried him into Chilton's cellar, and they jingled the glasses; and at the tap of the glasses, and while each one held the glass, while they were taking the glasses, somebody shot right through the back from the outside of the gate window, and he fell to the ground.

As they struck their glasses, that was the signal to shoot. They had him in the cellar and shot him right there, and he fell on the ground.

When he was first shot he called for Judge Cabinis and called for Mr. Chilton; I don't know who else. They were all around, and nobody went to his relief; all them men standing around with their guns. Nobody went to the cellar, and he called for Preacher Nelson, called for him, and Preacher Nelson said that when he went to the cellar-door he was afraid to go in, and called to him two or three times, "Don't shoot me;" and Charles said "Come in," he wouldn't hurt him, and "take him out of the cellar;" that he wanted to die in the open air, and did not want to die like a dog closed up.

When they taken him out he was in a manner dead, just from that one shot; and they brings him out then, and he only asked one question, so Parson Nelson told me, to take him home and let him see his wife before he died: that he could not live long.

It was only a few steps to my house, and they would not do it, and some said this. Nelson carried him to the middle of the street, and the men all hallooed, "We will save him while we've got him; dead men tell no tales." Preacher Nelson told me so. That is what they all cried, "We'll save him while we got him; dead men tell no tales."

Whether he stood right there in the street while they riddled him with thirty or forty of their loads, of course, I do not know, but they shot him all that many times when he was in a manner dead. All those balls went in him.

I understood that a young gentleman told that they shot him as he lay on the ground until they turned him over. He said so. I did not hear him.

Mr. Nelson said when he asked them to let him see me they told him no, and he then said, taking both sides of his coat and bringing them up this way so, he said, "Remember when you kill me you kill a gentleman and a brave man. Never say you killed a coward. I want you to remember it when I am gone."

Nelson told me that, and he said he never begged them, and that he never told them, but to see how a brave man could die.

They can find no cause; but some said they killed him because he carried the militia to Edwards', and they meant to kill him for that. The time the guns were sent there he was captain under Governor Ames, and they said they killed him for that; for obeying Governor Ames.

After the bodies were brought to my house, Professor Hillman and Martin all staid until one o'clock, and then at one o'clock the train came from Vicksburgh with the "Modocs." They all marched up to my house and went into where the two dead bodies laid, and they cursed them, those dead bodies, there, and they danced and threw open the melodeon, and sung all their songs, and challenged the dead body to get up and meet them, and they carried on there like a parcel of wild Indians over those dead bodies, these Vicksburgh Modocs. Just one or two colored folks were sitting up in the room, and they carried on all that in my presence, danced and sung and done anything they could. Some said they even struck them; but I heard them curse and challenge them to get up and fight. The Vicksburgh Modocs done that that night. Then they said they could not stay any longer.

Then the day after that Judge Cabinis asked me was there anything he could do, and I told him, I said, "Judge, you have already done too much for me." I told him he had murdered my husband and I didn't want any of his friendship. Those were the words I told him the next day, and he swore he did not know me that time; but I saw Judge Cabinis with this crowd that killed my husband. I saw him right in the midst, and then he made his excuse. He said he did everything he could for Charles, and that he was crazy. Well, they could not tell anything he had done.

They said Aaron Page was shot during the fuss.

In the league that was held here in that town, that day my husband was buried, they all said that he did not shoot him. They said that Aaron Page was shot accidentally; that my husband did not kill him. All started up from picking a fuss with his nephew.

As for any other cause I never knew; but only they intended to kill him because for carrying the militia to Edwards's; for obeying Governor Ames; and that was all they had against him.

THE MODOCS AFTER THE CLINTON RIOT.

At the same time, when they had the Moss Hill riot, the day of the dinner in September, when they came over that day, they telegraphed for the Vicksburgh "Modocs" to come out, and they came out at dark, and when they did come, about fifty came out to my house that night; and they were breaking the locks open on doors and trunks; whenever they would find it closed they would break the locks. And they taken from the house what guns they could find, and plundered and robbed the house. The captain of the Vicksburgh "Modocs," his name is Tinney.

Q. What day was that?

A. The day of the Moses Hill riot, in September.

THREATS AGAINST MR. CALDWELL AFTER THE CLINTON RIOT.

Q. When; the Clinton riot?

A. The 4th day of September. They came out, and Tinney staid there, and at daybreak they commenced to go, and he, among others, told me to tell my husband that the Clinton people sent for him to kill him, and he named them who they were to kill—all the leaders especially, and he says, "Tell him when I saw him"—he was gone that night; he fled to Jackson that evening with all the rest—"we are going to kill him if it is two years, or one year, or six; no difference; we are going to kill him anyhow. We have orders to kill him, and we are going to do it, because he belongs to this republican party, and sticks up for these negroes." Says he, "We are going to have the South back in our own charge, and no man that sticks by the republican party, and any man that sticks by the republican party, and is a leader, he has got to die." He told me that; and that "the southern people are going to have the South back to ourselves, and no damned northern people and no republican party; and if your husband don't join us he has got to die. Tell him I said so." I told him what he said. I did not know Tinney at the time; and when I saw my husband enter I told him, and he knew him from what I said, and he saw him afterward and told him what I said. He just said that he said it for devilment. They carried on there until the next morning, one crowd after another. I had two wounded men. I brought them off the Moses Hill battle-field, and these men treated me very cruelly, and threatened to kill them, but they did not happen to kill them.

CLINTON RIOT.

Next morning, before sun-up, they went to a house where there was an old black man, a feeble old man, named Bob Beasley, and they shot him all to pieces. And they went to Mr. Willis's and took out a man, named Gamaliel Brown, and shot him all to pieces. It was early in the morning; and they goes out to Sam. Jackson's, president of the club, and they shot him all to pieces. He hadn't even time to put on his clothes. And they went out to Alfred Hastings; Alfred saw them coming. And this was before sun-up.

Q. This morning after the Clinton riot?

A. On the morning of the 5th; and they shot Alfred Hastings all to pieces, another man named Ben. Jackson, and then they goes out and shoots one or two farther up on the Madison road; I don't know exactly; the name of one was Lewis Russell. He was shot, and Moses Hill. They were around that morning killing people before breakfast. I saw a young man from Vicksburgh that I knew, and asked him what it all meant.

Q. Who was he?

A. Dr. Hardesty's son; and I asked him what did it mean, their killing black people that day? He says, "You all had a big dinner yesterday and paraded around with your drums and flags. That was impudence to the white people. You have no right to do it. You have got to leave these damned negroes; leave them and come on to our side. You have got to join the democratic party. We are going to kill all the negroes. The negro men shall not live." And they don't live; for every man they found they killed that morning and did not allow any one to escape them, so he said. So he told me all they intended to do about the colored people for having their dinner and parading there, and having their banners; and intended to kill the white republicans the same; didn't intend to leave any one alive they could catch; and they did try to get hold of them, and went down on Monday morning to kill the school-teacher down there, Haffa, but he escaped. Jo Stevens and his son, Albert Stevens, I believe, was his name—they just murdered them right on through. These people staid there at the store and plundered it, and talked that they intended to kill them until they got satisfaction for three white people that was killed in that battle here. I can show who was the first white man that started the riot; and I can show you I have got his coat and pants, and I can show you how they shot him. They blamed all on my husband; and I asked what they killed Sam for; asked Dr. Alexander. They said they killed him because they were afraid he would tell about killing his brother. They killed my husband for obeying Governor Ames's orders, and they cannot find anything he did. He didn't do anything to be killed for. Then they have got his pistols there and they won't give them to me. I have asked I don't know how many times.

The outrages were generally confined to the republican counties where it was necessary to overcome the republican majority by unlawful means; but in two or three counties, as Wilkinson and Issaquena, there was comparative peace at the election and during the canvass.

Captain William A. Montgomery, a leading democrat and a commander of five military companies, with the designation in rank of major of battalion, testified that in some of the counties there was no military organization; that in those counties the democrats did not try to carry the election. This appears to have been true of the two counties named; but since the election, namely, in December and May, 1876, great outrages, attended with violence and murder, have been perpetrated, and evidently with the design of overawing the colored voters and preparing them to submit to a democratic victory in the coming election.

The attention of the Senate is directed to the testimony concerning the events in Issaquena County, which took place in the month of December last. A Colonel Ball, an officer in the confederate service during the war, who at the time of the outrage was officiating as a clergyman, took command of a body of armed and mounted men Sunday morning, December 5, and traversed the country below Rolling Fork during the day; and that night the men of his command took from their homes at least seven unoffending negroes and shot them in cold blood. Within the next two days five other leading negroes were summoned to Rolling Fork, and there compelled to sign a statement by which they became responsible for the good conduct of all the negroes in their vicinity, with the exception of fourteen, who, in fact, by that stipulation, were made outlaws, and, as a consequence, fled from their homes and their families and abandoned their property. (This statement may be found in the testimony of W. D. Brown.) Reference is made to the testimony of W. D. Brown and William S. Farrish, both democrats and participators in the outrages, although they did not admit that they had personal knowledge of the killing of either of the seven men who were massacred on the night of the 5th of December.

(7.) The committee find, especially from the testimony of Captain Montgomery, supported by numerous facts stated by other witnesses, that the military organization extended to most of the counties in the State where the republicans were in a majority; that it embraced a proportion not much less than one-half of all the white voters, and that in the respective counties the men could be summoned by signals given by firing cannons or anvils; and that probably in less than a week the entire force of the State could be brought out under arms.

(8.) The committee find that in several of the counties the republican leaders were so overawed and intimidated, both white and black, that they were compelled to withdraw from the canvass those who had been nominated, and to substitute others who were named by the democratic leaders, and that finally they were compelled to vote for the ticket so nominated under threats that their lives would be taken if they did not do it. This was noticeably the case in Warren County, where the democratic nomination of one Flanigan for sheriff was ratified at the republican county convention, held in Vicksburgh, the members acting under threats that if it were not done they should not leave the building alive. Similar proceedings occurred in other counties.

(9.) The committee find that the candidates, in some instances, were compelled, by persecution or through fear of bodily harm, to withdraw their names from the ticket, and even to unite themselves ostensibly with the democratic party. J. W. Caradine, a colored candidate of Clay County, was compelled to withdraw his name from the republican ticket and to make speeches in behalf of the democratic candidates and policy. An extract from his testimony is herewith given, as follows:

They told me that I would have to go round and make some speeches for them; that I had risen up a great element or some kind of feeling in the colored men that they never could get out of them for the next ten years to come with the speeches I had made, and that I had to go around and make some speeches in behalf of them in some way, or else I might have some trouble. They told me if I would do that I could demand some respect among them, and have no further trouble with them.

Q. What did they say would be the consequence if you did not go with them and make speeches?

A. They did not say if I did not do it what would be done, as I remember; but they came to my house and fotched a buggy for me, and told me I had to go with them to make speeches for them. And they said, "You know what has been said and what has been done; you have got to go along if you don't want any further trouble." I then got in and went along with them, and they did not really appreciate my speeches at length; but I went along with them and made three speeches; and they had some fault to find with my speeches at last, but I have never had any trouble with them since.

(10.) The committee find that on the day of the election, at several voting-places, armed men assembled, sometimes not organized and in other cases organized; that they controlled the elections, intimidated republican voters, and, in fine, deprived them of the opportunity to vote the republican ticket.

The most notable instance of this form of outrage occurred at Aberdeen, the shire town of the county of Monroe. At half past nine o'clock on the day of the election a cannon in charge of four or five cannoneers, and supported by ten or twelve men, a portion of the military company of that town, was trained upon the voting-place and kept in that position during the day, while the street was traversed by a body of mounted, armed men under the command of Captain E. O. Sykes, of Aberdeen. Captain Sykes testified that he did not know the men under his command, but admitted finally that they were probably from Alabama, and that they had come there upon the suggestion or the request of a Mr. Johnson, who was a member, as was also Captain Sykes, of the democratic committee of the county of Monroe.

Captain Sykes had also given orders that the ford-ways across the Tombigbee River, over which negroes from the east side having a right to vote at Aberdeen must pass, should be guarded by squads from the military company under his command.

During the night preceding the election the draw in the bridge crossing the river was turned, so that there was no passing from the east to the west of the Tombigbee River during the early part of the day of election.

As a matter of fact, the republican voters who had assembled abandoned the polls between ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and Captain J. W. Lee, the sheriff of the county and a leading republican, a man who had served during the war in the confederate army, abandoned the polls and took refuge in the jail, of which he was the custodian.

This statement in regard to Monroe County is set forth in detail by Captain Lee, and it is corroborated in all essential parts by Captain Sykes, a democrat, and the principal actor in the events of the day. Similar outrages were perpetrated in Claiborne, Kemper, Amite, Copiah, and Clay Counties.

(11.) The gravity of these revolutionary proceedings is expressed in the single fact that the chairman of the republican State committee, General Warner, owes the preservation of his life on the day of the election to the intervention of General George, chairman of the democratic State committee, as appears from a dispatch sent by General George to Messrs. Campbell and Calhoun, and a reply thereto, both of which are here given:

To CAMPBELL and CALHOUN, Canton, Mississippi:

If Warner goes to Madison, see by all means that he is not hurt. We are nearly through now, and are sure to win. Don't let us have any trouble of that sort on our hands. He will probably be at his store to night.

J. Z. GEORGE.

CANTON, 2, 1875.

To General GEORGE:

Your telegram of last night saved A. Warner at Calhoun.

GART. A. JOHNSON.

The circumstances of this affair are given in the testimony of Chase.

The testimony of General Warner, to which attention is invited, gives a detailed account of his experience, showing that the fears of General Warner's friends were well founded, and that the intervention of General George was essential to his personal safety.

(12.) The committee find in several cases, where intimidation and force did not result in securing a democratic victory, that fraud was resorted to in conducting the election and in counting the votes. In Amite County, the legally appointed inspectors of election, to whom in Mississippi the duty is assigned of receiving and counting the ballots, were compelled by intimidation to resign on the morning of election, in order to secure a fraudulent return. The inspector so forced to resign was a democrat, a man of established character for probity at his precinct—Rose Hill.

"When the voting began," said General Hurst, an eye-witness, "the democratic club drew up in line and demanded that Straum should not act as one of the inspectors of election. They said, 'We don't want you, not because you are dishonest, but because you will not do what we want you to.' He said, 'If that is the case, I will go,' and they got a man by the name of Wat Haynes and appointed him inspector."

General Hurst, who was brigadier-general of the State militia in that county, thus explains what resulted:

"When it was time to close the polls I asked one of the inspectors if he wanted a guard placed over the ballots, so that they would be unmolested while they were counting the votes. I thought that he was a very honest, high-minded man. He said, 'I am afraid to count these votes.' He had been notified by this party of Louisianians, and told what they were going to do with the box. Wat Haynes, when I told him I had concluded to place a guard around there that night, said: 'Don't you do it; I want to manipulate that box to-night. We want to carry this thing.'"

The party of Louisianians referred to were a company of outlaws, notorious in that district, whom the democrats had invited to come into that precinct, and who fired at a crowd of colored citizens when they were in line waiting to deposit their votes. About seventy of them were thus driven into the woods.

Nor was this the only precinct at which armed invaders from adjoining States took conspicuous part in the election. It is testified to both by republicans and democrats that they came over from Alabama and helped to swell the democratic vote in the counties adjoining that State.

In Amite County the republican sheriff, the superintendent of education, and other officers were driven into exile as soon as the polls were closed. Here the pretext that the officers were obnoxious to the people, or that the negroes and northern men monopolized the offices, is refuted by the facts that both Parker and Redmond, who were expelled, were offered the democratic nomination for sheriff; that the republican candidates for sheriff, circuit clerk, chancery clerk, treasurer, coroner, and three of the five supervisors were white men, leaving only the assessor and two supervisors to be colored, which, as Mr. Parker remarks, "as four-fifths of the republican voters were black, was the best that we could do." There were only three northern men on the republican ticket, and two of them had married southern women; all the others were natives of the State.

(13.) The evidence shows that the civil authorities have been unable to prevent the outrages set forth in this report, or to punish the offenders. This is true not only of the courts of the State, but also of the district court of the United States, as appears from the report of the grand jury made at the term held in June last, when the evidence of the offenses committed at the November election and during the canvass was laid before that body.

In support of this statement reference is made to the testimony of J. W. Tucker, and to the letter written by him to Colonel Frazee as well as to the report made by the grand jury to Hon. R. A. Hill, judge of the district court for the northern district of Mississippi. (See document evidence, pp. 150, 151; tes. of H. P. Hurst, p. 98.)

(14.) The committee find that outrages of the nature set forth in this report were perpetrated in the counties of Alcorn, Amite, Chickasaw, Claiborne, Clay, Copiah, De Soto, Grenada, Hinds, Holmes, Kemper, Lee, Lowndes, Madison, Marshall, Monroe, Noxubee, Rankin, Scott, Warren, Washington, and Yazoo, and that the democratic victory in the State was due to the outrages so perpetrated.

(15.) The committee find that, if in the counties named there had been a free election, republican candidates would have been chosen and the character of the Legislature so changed that there would have been sixty-six republicans to fifty democrats in the house and twenty-six republicans to eleven democrats in the senate; and that consequently the present Legislature of Mississippi is not a legal body, and that its acts are not entitled to recognition by the political department of the Government of the United States, although the President may, in his discretion, recognize it as a government de facto for the preservation of the public peace.

(16.) Your committee find that the resignation of Governor Ames was effected by a body of men calling themselves the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, by measures unauthorized by law, and that he is of right the governor of the State.

(17.) The evidence shows, further, that the State of Mississippi is at present under the control of political organizations composed largely of armed men whose common purpose is to deprive the negroes of the free exercise of the right of suffrage and to establish and maintain the supremacy of the white-line democracy, in violation alike of the constitution of their own State and of the Constitution of the United States.

The events which the committee were called to investigate by the order of the Senate constitute one of the darkest chapters in American history. Mississippi was a leading State in the war of the rebellion and an early and persistent advocate of those fatal political heresies in which the rebellion had its origin. To her, in as large a degree as to any other State, may be charged justly the direful evils of the war; and when the war was ended the white inhabitants resisted those measures of equality which were essential to local and general peace and prosperity. They refused to accept the negro as their equal politically, and for ten years they have seized every fresh opportunity for a fresh denial of his rights. At last they have regained supremacy in the State by acts of violence, fraud, and murder, fraught with more than all the horrors of open war, without its honor, dignity, generosity, or justice.

By them the negro is not regarded as a citizen, and whenever he finds a friend and ally in his efforts to advance himself in political knowledge or intellectual culture, that friend and ally, whether a native of the State or an immigrant from the North, is treated as a public enemy. The evil consequences of this policy touch and paralyze every branch of industry and the movements of business in every channel.

Mississippi, with its fertile soil, immense natural resources, and favorable commercial position, is in fact more completely excluded from the influence of the civilization and capital of the more wealthy and advanced States of the Union than are the distant coasts of China and Japan. Men who possess capital are anxious to escape from a State in which freedom of opinion is not tolerated, where active participation in public affairs is punished often with social ostracism, always with business losses, and not infrequently, as the record shows, with exile and the abandonment of property through fear of death.

Consequently, lands depreciate in value, the rewards of labor become more and more uncertain, taxes more and more burdensome, the evils of general disorder are multiplied and intensified, and by an inevitable rule of social and public life, the evils themselves, reacting, increase the spirit of disorder. Unless this tendency can be arrested, every successive chapter in the annals of that State will be darker and bloodier than the preceding one.

This tendency cannot be arrested by the unaided efforts of the peaceful, patriotic, and law-abiding citizens. There is a small body of native white persons, who, with heroic courage, are maintaining the principles of justice and equality. There is also a small body of men from the North, who, with equal courage, are endeavoring to save the State from anarchy and degradation. If left to themselves, the negroes would co-operate with these two classes.

But arrayed against them all are a majority of the white people, who possess the larger part of the property; who uniformly command leisure, whether, individually, they possess property or not; who look with contempt upon the black race and with hatred upon the white men who are their political allies; who are habituated to the use of arms in war and in peace; who in former times were accustomed to the exclusive enjoyment of political power, and who now consider themselves degraded by the elevation of the negro to the rank of equality in political affairs.

They have secured power by fraud and force, and, if left to themselves, they will by fraud and force retain it. Indeed, the memory of the bloody events of the campaign of 1875, with the knowledge that their opponents can command, on the instant, the presence of organized bodies of armed men at every voting-place, will deter the republican party from any general effort to regain the power wrested from them. These disorders exist also in the neighboring States, and the spirit and ideas which give rise to the disorders are even more general.

The power of the National Government will be invoked, and honor and duty will alike require its exercise. The nation cannot witness with indifference the dominion of lawlessness and anarchy in a State, with their incident evils and a knowledge of the inevitable consequences. It owes a duty to the citizens of the United States residing in Mississippi, and this duty it must perform. It has guaranteed to the State of Mississippi a republican form of government, and this guarantee must be made good.

The measures necessary and possible in an exigency are three:

1. Laws may be passed by Congress for the protection of the rights of citizens in the respective States.

2. States in anarchy, or wherein the affairs are controlled by bodies of armed men, should be denied representation in Congress.

3. The constitutional guarantee of a republican form of government to every State will require the United States, if these disorders increase or even continue, and all milder measures shall prove ineffectual, to remand the State to a territorial condition, and through a system of public education and kindred means of improvement change the ideas of the inhabitants and reconstruct the government upon a republican basis.

The views of the minority are as follows:

On December 15, 1875, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] submitted the following resolution:

"Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, whereby the freedom of the ballot was in a great measure destroyed, a reign of terror established, ballot-boxes stuffed, spurious tickets imposed upon voters, so that a popular majority of more than 25,000 was overcome, and in its place was given an apparent but fraudulent majority of more than 25,000; and whereas the Legislature thus chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body; and whereas if these allegations are true a great number of the citizens of the United States have had their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of the said allegations and the circumstances attending said election, with power to visit said State to make their investigations, to send for persons and papers, and to use all necessary process in the performance of their duties; and to make report to the Senate before the end of this session of their investigation and findings."

He supported its adoption by a series of speeches, the last of which was dated January 19, 1876, the true history and inspiration of which will hereafter be noted in considering the testimony taken before the committee. The resolution slept until the 27th of March, 1876, when an amendment was proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] and accepted by Mr. MORTON, as follows:

"Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi (in 1875) for members of Congress and State officers and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds committed upon and violence exercised toward colored citizens of that State and the white citizens disposed to support their rights at the election, and especially that the colored voters, on account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were, by intimidation and force, deterred from voting or compelled to vote, contrary to their wishes, for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed, and their right to the free exercise of the elective franchise, as secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, thus practically denied and violated, and that such intimidation has been since continued for the purpose of affecting future elections; and whereas the people of all the United States have an interest in and a right to insist upon the enforcement of this constitutional amendment, and Congress, having the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot properly neglect the duty of providing the necessary legislation for this purpose: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be apppointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of these allegations, and to inquire how far these constitutional rights have, in the said election, been violated by force, fraud, or intimidation, and to inquire and report to the Senate, before the end of the present session, whether any, and, if so, what, further legislation is necessary to secure to said colored citizens the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights; and that said committee be empowered to visit said State, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony on oath, and to use all necessary process for these purposes."

After debate in the Senate, the resolution was adopted. In the course of this debate, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] made the following declaration:

"For seventy years the spirit of hypocrisy and misrepresentation dominated over the slave-holding section of this confederacy. They continually presented themselves to the country and to the world as the friends of the Union, and it was a lie from first to last. They were the enemies of the Union; and when the Union did not answer the chief purpose which they had, and the only purpose they had, the preservation of the institution of slavery, they made war upon the Union. The Senator from Delaware was the political supporter and ally and the substantial defender of the men who made war upon the Union, who clung to the Union for seventy years under the falsehood that they were its friends. They were its enemies all the while. Slavery, the spirit of slavery, is and ever has been the enemy of the Union, and it is so to-day. The troubles in the South are due to the spirit of slavery, and the time has come when I am forced to confess to myself and with reluctance to say here that I do not in my heart believe that any man educated under and obedient to the influence of slavery can be the friend of a Union that is designed to establish and preserve equality. The North will do well to take heed and to trust no man who was brought up under the influence of slavery, controlled by its spirit, and dominated by its power, and is not yet extinct."

The committee, as finally appointed under the resolution, consists of Messrs. BOUTWELL, (chairman,) CAMERON of Wisconsin, MCMILLAN, BAYARD, and MCDONALD, thus omitting in the organization of the committee the mover or amender of the original resolution. The first meeting of the committee was held on the —— in the Capitol; and, at the second or third meeting, the clerk of the committee, Mr. Bartlett, was appointed stenographer, and Mr. James Redpath, of Massachusetts, was selected in his place as clerk, and has continued with intelligence and efficiency to fill that position, having been present at all the sessions of the committee. On the —— a resolution was offered in the committee by Mr. BAYARD that the testimony should be taken with open doors, which was rejected by the committee, Mr. BAYARD and Mr. MCDONALD voting in the affirmative. But a small portion of the testimony has as yet been printed, nor has any report of the committee been made; but Mr. Redpath, the clerk, having had the fullest opportunity of hearing the testimony of the witnesses and having had charge of all communications to the committee, has been enabled, in advance of the committee, to submit a public report over his own signature, of which the following extract will convey a distinct idea of his views. Speaking of the Union men of the South, or the original whigs, and the vigorous part they took in the contest, he says:

"Still they were Union men; but the Union they once knew was gone forever. They tried to begin where they left off, ignorant of the fact that while they fought a moral revolution has been going on in the North; that it was no longer Webster or Clay, but the man whom they had hanged at Charlestown as a felon who was now the ideal leader of a regenerated nation."

These references are made to the utterances of the chairman, and of the clerk selected by him to accompany the committee, and make public impression of affairs in Mississippi, and the remedy to be applied, because it indicated fully to the undersigned that from the first it would be naturally impossible for them, with their ideas of constitutional duty, to subscribe to the deductions of those who, however intelligent or conscientious, started out upon the proposed investigation upon such a platform of ideas.

While writing this report, the undersigned have read with surprise and regret the message of the President of the United States, dated July 31, 1876, transmitting to Congress certain correspondence relating to the murders lately committed at Hamburgh, in South Carolina.

In this message he has seen fit to use the following language:

"But recently a committee of the Senate of the United States visited the State of Mississippi to take testimony on the subject of frauds and violence in elections. Their report has not yet been made public, but I await its forthcoming with a feeling of confidence that it will fully sustain all that I have stated relating to fraud and violence in the State of Mississippi.

"U. S. GRANT."

In his letter of the 26th of July to Governor Chamberlain he had stated:

"Mississippi is governed to-day by officials chosen through fraud and violence, such as would scarcely be accredited to savages, much less to a civilized and Christian people."

This last statement, come it from whom it may, we pronounce in the face of the testimony taken by this committee, and not yet printed, to be untrue and unwarranted by the facts disclosed.

The tone of animosity to the white people of the South which breathes throughout the President's message and letter is unmistakable. In his message of July 31, six days subsequent to this letter, the President says: "The report [on Mississippi] has not yet been made public." Why should he anticipate?

We hold it, and believe it will be so held by right-thinking men everywhere, discreditable for the Chief Magistrate thus to have exhibited such evidence of prejudice against any portion of his fellow-citizens.

It adds, however, but another proof to the many given heretofore that the heart and mind of President Grant are closed to all sense of justice where his political opponents, especially in the Southern States, are concerned.

Other attempts to forestall public opinion in relation to the affairs in Mississippi have been made, calculated to grossly mislead. Two attempts to fasten obloquy upon one of the undersigned, [Mr. BAYARD,] and at the same time to convey unjust impressions against the people of Mississippi, may be noted.

[Special dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

"WASHINGTON, July 25.

"THE REPUBLICAN REPORT IN MISSISSIPPI.

* * * * * * *

"Another case illustrative of the general conclusions arrived at by the majority of the committee is that of a native of Philadelphia. He settled near Vicksburgh and was with his family. He had been appointed a justice of the peace by the governor of the State, and his wife opened a school for the instruction of the poor. He was subsequently a candidate for office. On one night fifty armed men dashed upon his premises and shot him down without a word of warning and in the presence of his wife and family. When the story of this wife was told by her own lips to the committee, Senator BAYARD, one of the committee, ejaculated, 'I don't believe it.'

"After the murder, according to the report, the assassins hovered about the house and would not permit the wife to enact even the rites of sepulture. They dragged the bleeding corpse from the arms of the distracted woman, pitched it into a pig-wallow, and left. Senator BAYARD, affected by the narration, repeated, 'I won't believe it under oath.' The report says that these 'banditti,' for it states they compare with Italians of the same class, live upon the people. They are dissolute and indolent, generally the sons of planters impoverished by the war, or the remnant of that class of adventurers who fastened upon the institution of slavery as the camp-follower lives upon an army."

Mr. BAYARD never even saw the witness referred to, who was examined in his absence, and he never made any statement even similar in language or character to that falsely attributed to him. Yet this vicious falsehood has already had wide circulation.

In the New York Times of the 27th of July we find the following letter and preceding comments:

"Senator BOUTWELL has also received a letter from a colored witness who testified in Mississippi, from which it will be seen how the democracy of that State propose to treat those who obeyed the summons of the Senate Committee:

"'DEAR SIR: I having been summon before your investigationg to give a sworne testimony in regard to the late election, which I did, and I told nothing but the truth. Yesterday I was met by an armed mob in the streets of ————,* and compelled me to say that I swore a —— —— lie. And told me I had either to say that I swore to a —— —— lie or leave the city or die. The excitement grew so intense that I was compell to take back what I said before the committee. I was also met by another mob at ———— the same day that I was before the committee and compelled to do the same before I got home. I w'd not be supprised if I were not mob before you receive this letter. If you read this letter where Senator BAYARD can hear it he will write down here and let these democrats know it, and I will be murdered as soon as I appear on the streets. Therefore it will be best fore me fore you to keep this to yourself and other republicans.'

"Of course every one who knows Senator BAYARD will smile at this suspicion, but it shows the state of terrorism still maintained by the banditti of Mississippi."

For what reason and with what intent this letter was so published may be inferred from the letter itself and the editorial use of it.

It will be observed that the committee were instructed by the resolution to inquire into alleged violations of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the necessity of new and appropriate legislation for its enforcement; and it would seem that the scope of the investigation was intended to have been confined to that object. But in the investigation conducted by the majority, nearly every right and power of the State of Mississippi, heretofore supposed to be among the reserved powers belonging to the States, and not justly subject to exterior control, has been made the subject of the most wide-spread, unrestrained inquiry. The social habits, domestic institutions, personal and individual dealings and contracts, local police arrangements, and whole classes of subjects heretofore supposed to be under the sole control of the State and county governments, and even family affairs, have been made the subjects of inquisition.

The limitations upon the powers of Congress in its relation to the internal affairs of the States have been lately the subject of careful deliberation and adjudication by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases involving the validity of legislation by Congress in pari materia with that now proposed by the resolution.

In the recent case of the United States vs. Cruikshank, Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court and said:

"We have in our political system a Government of the United States and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the other, and each has citizens of 'ts own, who owe it allegiance, and whose rights within its jurisdiction it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State, but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he has under the other. (Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace, 74)

"Citizens are the members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community, and who, in their associated capacity, have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their general welfare and the protection of their individual as well as their collective rights. In the formation of a government the people may confer upon it such powers as they choose. The government when so formed may, and when called upon should, exercise all the powers it has for the protection of the rights of its citizens and the people within its jurisdiction, but it can exercise no other. The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

* The printed testimony having been withheld, the blank references to the depositions of witnesses are necessarily left unfilled, which is owing to the sudden and unexpected appearance of the report of the majority before the testimony was even delivered to the printer.

"The government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also for certain purposes a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers as enumerated and defined it is supreme and above the States; but beyond, it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction.

"The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other national; but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen cannot complain because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return, he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.

"The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone; its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States."

Then again:

"The third and eleventh counts are even more objectionable. They charge the intent to have been to deprive the citizens named, they being in Louisiana, 'of their respective several lives and liberty of person without due process of law.' This is nothing else than alleging a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder citizens of the United States being within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of Louisiana. The rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man. 'To secure these rights,' says the Declaration of Independence, 'governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.' The very highest duty of the States when they entered into the Union under the Constitution was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these 'unalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator.' Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

"The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guarantee against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society."

These propositions were unanimously laid down by the court, in considering alleged violations of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, but are equally applicable to the discussion of the relative powers and duties of the Federal and State governments under any and all provisions of the Constitution.

In the case of The United States vs. Reese, decided at the same time, the court says:

"Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and the manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion, shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected.

"The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one. It prevents the States, or the United States, however, from giving preference in this particular to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption this could be done. It was as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, &c., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now it is not. If citizens of one race, having certain qualifications, are permitted by law to vote, those of another, having the same qualifications, must be. Previous to this amendment there was no constitutional guarantee against this discrimination. Now, there is. It follows that the amendment has invested citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is within the protecting power of Congress.

"That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This, under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment, Congress may enforce by 'appropriate legislation.'

"The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment. The effect of article 1, section 4, of the Constitution, in respect to elections for Senators and Representatives, is not now under consideration. It has not been contended, nor can it be, that the amendment confers authority to impose penalties for every wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at State elections. It is only when the wrongful refusal at such an election is because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude that Congress can interfere and provide for its punishment.

* * * * * * *

"The courts enforce the legislative will when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. Within its legitimate sphere Congress is supreme and beyond the control of the courts, but if it steps outside of its constitutional limitations and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to, and when called upon in due course of legal proceedings, must, annul its encroachments upon the reserved power of the States and the people.

* * * * * * *

"We must, therefore, decide that Congress has not, as yet, provided by 'appropriate legislation' for the punishment of the offense charged in the indictment, and that the circuit court properly sustained the demurrers and gave judgment for the defendants."

In subordination to the principles thus laid down by the authority of the tribunal of last resort in our country, the undersigned would have been disposed to confine their investigation to subjects plainly within the jurisdiction of Congress, without infringing upon any of the reserved rights of the State of Mississippi, believing it to be the cardinal feature of our institutions that the equality of the States in the Union must ever be respected, and that any practice which invades so necessary a principle must place in jeopardy not only the rights of a single State, but, in their turn, the rights of all the remaining States; and that a power which is conceded to be applicable to the overthrow of the autonomy of any one State is liable to be used for the destruction of any other State, and that there is no safety for any unless the rights of each are guarded.

The condition of the State of Mississippi is to be considered at three periods of time.

First. In the spring of 1875, before the commencement of the political canvass, in which the alleged outrages upon the rights of citizens under the fifteenth amendment are said to have occurred;

Second. Its condition during the election itself, on the 2d of November, 1875; and,

Third. Its condition as discovered by the committee at the time of their visit in June, 1876.

For a proper understanding of the entire case we propose to recite, by the light of the testimony and supported by its facts, what we believe to have been the true condition of Mississippi in the spring of 1875. At the time of preparing this report, however, but a small part of the testimony has been printed; and although we trust to be enabled to insert the proper references before it is submitted, yet the absence of the printed testimony interferes materially with one of our objects, i. e., to make no assertions, but to let the witnesses speak for themselves, and to substantiate every fact by reference to its basis.

It has been said by high authority that it was difficult to draw an indictment against a whole people. Equally difficult is it to establish any rules of evidence that would sustain so vague an indictment. And in the present inquisition it would become plain to all who shall read the depositions and observe the mode of interrogation employed that every rule which the experience of mankind has established as essential for the regulation of evidence and the ascertainment of truth has been disregarded in the course of this investigation. So that the great bulk of the testimony which has been taken is such as would not be received in any court of justice in this country to convict the meanest felon of the pettiest offense.

Every rule of evidence followed by courts in the administration of justice has been entirely disregarded. Every rule which experience has shown is essential for the elucidation of truth has been thrown aside, and opinion, hearsay, wild rumor, anything and all things which excitement, prejudice, hate, love, or fear can suggest, have been poured in without discrimination or check.

No individual, no community, can be safe against such an order of things.

The usual tests of discrimination between truth and falsehood having been abandoned, the result cannot be satisfactory to any just mind.

The argument that the charge is vague and against a whole community only makes the effect worse.

When a false principle is adopted, the wider its application the more dangerous it becomes.

This is observable in the examination from the first witness to the last. Adelbert Ames, the ex-governor of Mississippi, who was called and examined on the 27th of April, and at page 29, on the third day of his examination, in which he had made the most wholesale and sweeping assertions of facts of violence and intimidation, was asked:

Q. You have referred to various acts of violence and intimidation; have you personal knowledge of any of those acts?

A. I never saw an act of violence performed.

Q. Did you ever see an act of intimidation performed?

A. No; I never saw an act of violence performed.

Q. Then what you have said is derived from the information of other people?

A. Yes, sir.

And on page 32—

Q. I ask you, do you know the fact whether there was any resistance to process, when issued, in that State?

A. That statement I have made; I would say that I do not know of any facts of that kind.

And again—

Q. Do you know of a case where process of the courts has been returned with that statement?

A. I do not.

In fact, if the testimony touching the subjects within the scope of the resolution of the Senate could be reduced to such, as is receivable under the rules of evidence, as recognized by courts of justice and by this Senate while sitting as a court, the testimony taken in Mississippi by this committee would be confined to a dozen pages of manuscript. The rest is rumor, hearsay, and opinion. Not only so, but nearly all the witnesses examined for what may be termed the prosecution of the white people of the State of Mississippi were defeated candidates in the election of 1875 or other interested supporters or persons who had lost office and failed of re-appointment. Most of the witnesses, when pinned down by cross-examination to give names of persons concerned and dates, were directly and flatly contradicted as to those facts, and many of the occurrences either shown to have been not only untrue, but impossible, or else accompanied by facts which subjected them to a totally different construction.

A large body of these witnesses were negroes of the most ignorant and uncivilized description, who did not hesitate to state anything, and whose declarations were frequently of the wildest and most absurd character. Thus at page ——, in the deposition of ——, Dr. Holland, of Madison County, is represented as giving utterance to profanity in the following style:

Whereas by the deposition of Judge Campbell, of the supreme court, page —

Q. Did you know Dr. Holland, of the county?

A. I do; he is the man whose name was connected with that arrest.

Q. What manner of man is he?

A. A very highly respectable man; one of the most amiable, mild-mannered, good-natured men I ever knew.

Q. What is his age?

A. I suppose him to be about forty years of age.

Q. Do you know whether Dr. Holland is a man who is profane in his speech?

A. He is one of the most pious, devoted, Christian men I ever knew; remarkable among men in that respect.

Q. Would you believe it possible that Dr. Holland would interlard his conversation with profanity?

A. It is utterly inconsistent with his character, and I should regard it as impossible unless I could hear it, or it was attested by witnesses whose veracity I could not question at all.

and Major Powell, page ——, and Captain Key, at page ——, Dr. Holland is testified to be a gentleman of singular purity and piety, a strict and conscientious professor of religion, and a "pillar" of the Baptist church in his community. See also the case of ——, page ——, in Aberdeen, in which Mr. E. O. Sykes and his brother, Mr. T. B. Sykes, the mayor of Aberdeen, both of them professors of religion and gentlemen of the most admitted purity of language and conduct, are described as monsters of profanity.

The case of ——, page ——, testifying of Mr. Preasley, the judge of election at Calhoun precinct, in Madison County, rudely taking tickets from colored men, tearing them up and throwing them on the ground in the sight of the witness, is denied by Judge Cunningham, the republican judge of election present on the occasion, by Preasley's own statement and that of several bystanders. (See page ——.) Witnesses thus set free to state anything and everything that malice could suggest, partisan animosity encourage, and ignorance assist, rendered it difficult to confute, by reason of the vagueness and uncertainty of their statements. The value of the testimony of Ann Hodge, colored, can be readily estimated, page 421:

By Mr. BAYARD:

Q. Did you ever take an oath?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know the meaning of taking an oath?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know the consequences of swearing falsely?

A. No, sir.

In short, the proverbial difficulty of proving a negative was imposed upon the white people of Mississippi, who, by the ruling of the majority, were not suffered to be present even by their representatives while the testimony was being taken.

The reconstruction policy of Congress had fully and perfectly forced the institutions of the State of Mississippi into the most entire subjection and conformity with its provisions. What Mississippi was at the time of the last election of Governor Ames in 1873, she was "the work of reconstruction by Congress." The will of her people, their tastes, their prejudices, their virtues, and their faults, had been melted and run into a mold fashioned by the will of Congress alone. If her institutions were defective, if they were not conducive to the ends of good government, if they were arranged with an unwise disregard of the condition and wants of her people, that people are no more responsible than the population of France, for they had no voice. Such as she was in 1873 the Congress of the United States had made her. The State constitution was molded in accordance with the will of Congress. The legislation under it had been enacted by men placed in power by the Federal Government. The ruling principle of that legislation seems to have been to lead as much power as possible directly into the hands of the executive, in which the reins were placed. The institution of suffrage was of course the proposed basis, and to control this the machinery of elections was placed absolutely in the hands of the governor, who had the sole power to appoint those officers who in their turn had the power of appointment of the registrars of every county, who in their turn appointed the election officers throughout the State in their respective counties, and supervised the elections and returns, thus gathering the whole control of elections in a single executive hand.

This was the state of things when Governor Ames took his seat on the 1st day of January, 1874, elected in the month of November previous. There was not an official of the State who was not a member of the republican party. There was not a county official to be appointed by the governor who was not in close affinity with him. In all the republican counties, and all were republican in which negroes were in a majority, every official was a member of the same party. Thus we see that the entire control of the State was in the hands of Governor Ames and his party associates. At page 30 of his deposition the fact is stated by him as follows:

Q. You have stated the violence and intimidation to have existed in the republican counties of the State?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have not referred to violence in any but republican counties?

A. No, sir.

Q. Such is the fact, is it not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were not then all these justices of the peace, chancellors, the judiciary, and the machinery for choosing juries, in the hands of the dominant party in those counties?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I need not ask you if all the United States officers in that State were not members of the republican party; that was so, was it not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then the grand juries and the petit juries, and the judges, and the sheriffs, and the supervisors, by whom the jurors were selected, were all controlled by the dominant party in those counties.

A. They were all belonging to the dominant party.

Of course every official of the Federal Government, district judges, district attorneys, marshals, deputy marshals, supervisors, postmasters, revenue officers, were all of the same party and necessarily active adherents. It may be truly said that there was no trace whatever of official power in the State of Mississippi in the hands of the democratic party until the 1st day of January, 1876.

Now, let us consider into what a condition, social, moral, and financial, Mississippi was brought, in the spring of 1875, under the administration which has just been described. The population of Mississippi, by the census of 1870, had a total of 827,922 souls. Of these 382,896 were white people, 444,201 colored people, and the remainder Indians and persons not classed. The State was divided into seventy-three counties. The negro majority was thus about sixty thousand, but was distributed chiefly in the rich river counties and on the richer cotton-producing lands of the State, in which they greatly outnumbered the white population, and in these counties their large numerical majority was consolidated.

The domestic institutions of the State had been completely revolutionized, and the relations of the white and black races had not been permitted to adjust themselves into that harmony and good feeling which the interests of both made so essential to happiness and good order. The whites, as the result of the war, were impoverished to a most painful extent, which must impress itself upon any person who visits the State, which presents even to a casual eye unmistakable evidences of wide-spread and lamentable prostration. This brings with it increased privation to the colored people, who never had property, and who depended, necessarily, upon property-owners for their support. When their employers were ruined the blow fell severely upon the employed. Theirs was a common lot, and that which struck down and crippled the one fell also heavily upon the other.

Unfortunately the new and arbitrary political conditions imposed upon both races by the will of Congress were disturbed by the presence of a class of unscrupulous, needy, and rapacious adventurers, who came down to fill the political offices to which prejudice against the southern whites on the part of those who held power in the Federal Government and the absolute ignorance and incompetence of the negroes prevented those whites from being appointed. The result was, as the testimony everywhere discloses, that the State and Federal offices to which any considerable emolument was attached fell into the hands of white men newly arrived within the borders of the State, ignorant and unsympathetic of the wishes and feelings of the white population, and bent wholly upon using the political material which they found ready at their hands in the shape of masses of ignorant, superstitious, and suspicious negroes to sustain themselves in office and power. Instead of encouraging the colored population to relations of amity and confidence with the whites who gave them employment and furnished them with the means of subsistence, it has been plainly the object and intent of these political adventurers to increase the distrust between the races and to encourage on the part of the blacks and intensify the instinct and feeling of race opposition. In this by means of low arts they have been unhappily too successful, and the negroes of the State of Mississippi have been banded together in an unthinking mass, under the lead and blind control of a handful of northern strangers, with here and there a native white man.

Throughout the testimony it is evident the white people of Mississippi, in the interests of the entire community, made every attempt to penetrate this alliance against them, and resorted to every means of combination and alliance with their political opponents to procure even a tolerable and decent administration of public affairs. Since 1868 they had given up their party name and candidates, had voted for Dent, a republican, had voted for Alcorn, a republican, and essayed in every way to appease and mollify the party led by Governor Ames; but all in vain. They witnessed the selection of men either incompetent or criminal, or both, for important offices in the State. They saw their best men, most virtuous, experienced, and able citizens passed by in contempt. They saw men notoriously vicious, and justly proscribed, taken into the confidence and friendship of Ames and placed in authority. (See the case of William Gray, negro brigadier-general, page —, and his character described by a republican witness, Putnam, p. —. Also, see Judge Shackleford, p. —; W. A. Ferguson, p. —; Judge John A. C. Watson, p. —.)

Cardozo, the forging clerk of the circuit court and defrauding State superintendent of public instruction; Davenport, the negro forger and county clerk; O. P. Lee, white, aide-de-camp, defaulter and red-handed murderer of two black committee-men; Morgan, the sheriff of Yazoo County, with the indictment for the murder of Hilliard, his republican predecessor and contestant, hanging over him; Davis, colored lieutenant-governor, the vendor of pardons of any crime for money; these are specimens of the men whom he took to his confidence and made his political associates, and to complaints against whom he accorded such treatment as in the case of the application to him by the mayor of the little town of Greenville, in Washington County, soliciting protection against repeated acts of incendiarism in which Brigadier-General Gray was implicated and subsequently indicted for arson. Governor Ames sending no reply to this supplication for protection, placed the letter in the hands of Gray himself, who flaunted it in triumph in the face of the citizens. (See deposition of William A. Ferguson, p. —.)

Invested with the power of selecting the entire judiciary of the State, the character of his appointments may be learned from the deposition of Judge John A. C. Watson, of Holly Springs, who at page — testifies as follows:

Question. What class of men did General Ames call around him in his administration?

Answer. He called around him, as a general thing, the very worst class of what we call "carpet-baggers." Most of them were newcomers into the State, without property, who relied upon politics as a trade and means of livelihood.

Q. Had they any knowledge of your people, of their habits and wants?

A. None whatever; they came among us as strangers at the close of the war.

Q. With whom did that class of men affiliate?

A. A great many of them affiliated mostly with the negroes.

Q. What was the feeling and course of action toward citizens of the Northern States who came here as men of fair character and as good citizens to settle in your midst?

A. Upon the part of most of the citizens, especially of the better class, there was no indisposition to receive them, and a great many desired them to come. And when they came among us, as citizens engaging in some business, I believe any such man was received kindly and treated kindly. A great many of them, however, came among us, as I remarked before, and engaged in no business, but just went among negroes, the whole aim and purpose being to gain the confidence of the negroes and alienate them from the whites and their old masters. They carried this to such an extent that some of them would visit the negroes' houses and cabins, and meet them on terms of social equality. Some would not go so far, but would mix up with them in politics And the general aim of that class was to destroy the confidence of the negroes in the whites and in their old masters. I have heard men of this class on the stump, in addressing crowds of negroes, say everything they could to exasperate the then recently emancipated negroes against their old masters. I have heard them lay down this rule, "You must never follow your masters in politics; just watch them, and when they take one direction you take the other, and you will certainly be right."

Q. Was this the current course of advice to this class of men?

A. So far as it fell under my observation, the general object was to convince them that their old masters were unalterably opposed to them, and that they must look alone to northern men for their protection

Q. Was it from this class that General Ames drew his political associates and advisers?

A. Yes, sir; he very soon threw off what he regarded as the better class of republicans.

Q. Threw them off?

A. Yes.

Q. Was it thought that that led to the split of the Alcorn wing against the Ames?

A. Yes; perhaps I might state a fact or two there Alcorn came back and ran for governor against Ames.

Q. What year?

A. In 1873. During that canvass Alcorn on the stump denounced as thieves and swindlers the main supporters of General Ames. The speeches made by Governor Alcorn in that canvass were the most denunciatory I ever heard against the leading men of the Ames party.

Q. Were there other leading members of the republican party who took the same tone as did Alcorn, in regard to the Ames administration?

A. In 1873, not a great many. Ames had the confidence of the negroes, and Alcorn was not sustained by his own party, to any great extent, in 1873.

Q. How was it later, in 1875?

A. Alcorn's strength continued to gain after that, and before 1875 the split was a very marked one. A great many had become followers of Alcorn and opposed to Ames.

Q. Was the feeling between the two wings, the Alcorn wing and the Ames wing, as great or greater than between the republicans and democrats?

A. The feeling between these two wings of the republicans was just as bitter as could have existed. In my district the opposing candidates for Congress were Wells and Howe, and when the Wells party had a meeting they denounced Howe as a thief and falsifier, and applied to him every epithet they could invent, and when the Howe party came along they would apply the same epithets to the Wells party.

Q. Who is Howe?

A. He had been a member of Congress from that district.

Q. Who was he?

A. A northern man,

Q. Was he on the Ames side or the other?

A. On the Ames side; Wells was for Alcorn. He is our present member of Congress. The collision between the two wings of the party had a great deal to do toward carrying that district against the republicans.

Q It was charged in the public papers that the character of the officers under Ames's administration was known to him, after which knowledge he continued to keep these men in office and consort with them politically.

A. Well, sir, I cannot say what was the knowledge of Ames upon that subject, but these delinquencies and this misconduct were known to the public generally, and Ames still retained them in office and in his confidence, and the more they were abused and exposed the closer he seemed to adhere to them. It seemed to be rather a recommendation to him.

Q. Many of them were placed under indictment?

A. A good many.

Q. By the grand juries of their counties?

A. Yes.

Q. The grand jury, as a rule, was under the control of the republican party?

A. Yes.

Q. After these indictments took place were the confidence and association of Governor Ames withdrawn from these people?

A. As a general rule it was not. In Northeastern Mississippi Governor Ames appointed a man as chancellor by the name of Barton, with no intelligence as a lawyer and no standing at the bar. Moreover, he was charged with a flagrant act of forgery.

Q. Had he been indicted?

A. He had not; but Governor Ames was informed by gentlemen of high respectability, among others by our present governor, who came from his vicinity, of the character of this man. Governor Ames refused to believe it, but had it been untrue and his moral character ever so good, he was not fit for the office; but Ames was blind to the truth, and did appoint Barton chancellor. When, however, his appointment was before the senate for confirmation, the judiciary committee, to which it was referred, sent out for witnesses, and the proof was conclusive. I had been knowing to it. The gentleman upon whom the forgery was committed, resided in my town and was my intimate personal friend; but Governor Ames did not withdraw his name until he was told by his friends that they could not possibly get him through the senate. That was the only thing that checked him.

Q. Did this man ever exercise the functions of chancellor?

A. O, yes, sir; he held several courts.

In all these republican strongholds in which turbulence and misgovernment are alleged to have existed, it is to be also noted that the entire local power was in republican hands. Thus the supervisors of the counties, being in fact the county legislature, assessing taxes, contracting for supplies, controlling all public improvements, the schools, public buildings, roads, and having, in short, all local control, were almost without exception composed of negroes, few of whom were able to read or write, and scarcely one of whom was able to compute an ordinary sum in arithmetic. In some cases the highest mark of erudition was the capacity of the chairman mechanically to sign his name to a record which he was unable to read. (See deposition of —— and deposition of ——.)

The justices of the peace, generally unable to write and frequently unable to read the contents of the process against person or property which they issued in the name of the law, delivered it to constables equally unfitted to understand the nature of the precept or to attest their action under it. (See deposition of ——)

Negro chancery clerks and clerks of the circuit court and courts of record were utterly unable personally to perform their duties, and intrusted everything to some white deputy. (See deposition of ——)

The consequence of this local misgovernment is an increase of taxation amounting to confiscation, and is well expressed in the language of a petition to the Legislature by the tax-payers of the State, in January, 1875, from which we make the following extract:

"But probably the most flagrant evil of which the tax-payers complain and the greatest outrages perpetrated on their rights arise from the action of the boards of supervisors.

"This court is really the most important of any in the State, and should be composed of the very best men in the several counties. As a general rule, we are sorry to say, the members of this board are wholly unfit to discharge their duties, and are without respectability or accountability. This, however, is not the fault of the Legislature of the State, except in so far as it encourages such men to seek for that position. The county levies, in a large majority of the counties, are extravagant and oppressive beyond all endurance. The contracts for public work are made without economy or care, and with a reckless indifference to the interest of the public. These boards, in some instances, employ their own members to do the work not authorized by law, merely for the purpose of making them extravagant allowances. In many instances these members are wholly ignorant, and are completely under the control of the clerks and sheriffs of these counties, to whom they make extravagant allowances. This is a great evil, and we suggest that remedy which alone seems adequate. Legislation should be immediately enacted fixing the maximum rate of taxation at 50 per cent. on the State, beyond which they shall not go in any instance.

"These boards should also be prohibited from making any contracts, or allowances, or appropriations, except when there is money in the treasury to pay them. And every such order or warrant so made and ordered, when there is not money in the treasury sufficient to pay it, should be declared utterly null and void, and all persons concurring in making or issuing them be declared guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and punishable for such, as provided by law."

To this urgent and respectful appeal no response whatever was made. (See deposition of E. Barksdale, page 453.)

The ruinous effects of such a system of misgovernment upon the real estate and property which are subject to it is to be found in the testimony of Shackleford, a republican ex-judge, at p. ——

So that not only is all immigration prevented, but the possibility of obtaining loans of money upon real estate for the purpose of improvement is destroyed.

The system of public schools seems to have been liberally maintained chiefly for the advancement of the blacks, but necessarily at the pecuniary cost of the whites, whose property mainly contributed from its burdens to sustain them. This, however, would not have been a subject of complaint if there had been anything like equality of opportunities for the establishment of white schools, which were necessarily at the cost of white people.

An instance of the gross inequality and injustice of the action of these negro boards of supervisors and the insolence and overbearing conduct of the members is to be found in the case in Issaquena County. (See deposition of William A. Farrish, at p. ——)

And the deposition of ——.

The choice of registrars and judges of election was such as made fair elections hopeless, as will be illustrated by the case of Warren County, which we shall consider hereafter in this report.

The Legislature of the State, under Governor Ames, contained a large majority of negroes, and was confessedly a venal body of men, in which the defeat of any measure of reform or the passage of any measure of iniquity could be cheaply procured by the use of money among the members. (See deposition of ——.)

As to the relation of Governor Ames to the white people of the State of Mississippi, it is best described by his own language at pages 16 and 17 of the testimony, in which he says:

Question. When did you first go to Mississippi?

Answer. I went there in 1867.

Q. In the Army, I believe?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When were you elected Senator?

A. In 1870.

Q. Had you any intention to settle in Mississippi prior to your election?

A. I will say not long previous to that; and permit me to say that I found when I was military governor there that there was a black code existing, and that the negroes had no rights whatever; that they were not permitted to exercise any of the rights of citizenship. I had given them the protection they were entitled to under the Government of the United States, and I believed that I could render them great service. I felt that I had a mission to perform in their interest, and I hesitatingly consented to represent them and unite my fortune with theirs.

It will seem, therefore, by his own voluntary statement that the white people of Mississippi were not those whom he proposed to represent or with whom he desired "to unite his fortunes."

The next question and the reply of Governor Ames may perhaps be explanatory of his supposed "mission."

Q. You speak now in reference to the colored people of the State?

A. Yes, sir; in reference to the colored people of that State; they were in the majority.

On page 19 he says:

"The question of how I can get money to live is the one question with me."

Perhaps this was always the case with Governor Ames while he remained in Mississippi.

The natural consequences of a government so organized had become apparent prior to the adjournment of the Ames legislature, which met in January, 1875, and adjourned about the end of March following. Incompetence, venality, and misrule had borne their usual fruits. A government that inspired neither affection nor respect could necessarily rely only upon coercion and intimidation as a last and vain resort. The dissatisfaction and discontent of the people was not confined to the democratic party, but extended everywhere and among men of all parties.

The dissensions within the republican ranks were even more marked than among their silent adversaries who had been totally deprived of official position and control in public affairs. Between one division of the republican party, led and represented by Governor Ames, and another, represented by Senator ALCORN, the breach became deep and widened daily. On either side individuals of that party arrayed themselves with their respective followers, and open and bitter denunciations, unsparing in their terms, were showered by each side upon the other. The split was open, positive, and would seem to have been irreconcilable. In his examination before the committee Governor Ames classes Senator ALCORN, Governor Powers, McKee, ex-member of Congress, ex-Senator Pease, Morris, the attorney-general, State Senator Musgrove, WELLS, M. C., and Chancellor Storrs, as among the opponents to him and his administration. At page 22 he accuses Morris of having used his office for corrupt purposes, Musgrove of insincerity and dishonesty, Storrs of being thoroughly corrupt; at page 25 Pease of willful falsehood and of being without ordinary intelligence. At page 26 murders are imputed to Senator ALCORN.

On the other hand, George E. Harris, the ex-attorney-general of the State, in his letter to the President of the United States, dated the 24th of November, 1875, giving the reason for the democratic success in Mississippi, declares that it was—

"Due to the imbecility and base corruption of the State administration and a few adherents."

(See letter, page —.)

He charges Ames—

"With cold indifference and of contracting his views and narrowing his circle of friends to a few confidential advisers, who were a close corporation of mercenary men who knew but little of the wants of the people of the State and cared less—men who have no identity of interest or sympathy in common with the people of the State."

He charges him—

"With the desire to control the judiciary as well as the executive department of the State; of resorting to the expediency of making appointments after vacation and then holding the appointments over them in terrorem until the next session of the Legislature, and if they did not please him in decrees, &c., he could withhold their names, (as he did in one case,) thus making the judiciary of the State subservient to the executive, in violation of the constitution; and he actually removed Chancellor Dreman, as I believe, because in a case of habeas corpus he refused bail to the governor's friend, Morgan, (sheriff of Yazoo County,) on a charge of the murder of one Hilliard."

He charged him—

"With appointing men to judicial position who had never had a case in court, and were totally ignorant of the law and practice, and who do not know a plea in bar from a demurrer."

Ex-Senator Revels, in his deposition, at page —, states:

I. H. Estell, a republican, states, at page 325:

Governor Ames's prostitution of his office and bargaining with appointees is shown by Judge Watson, at page —, as follows:

Senator ALCORN flatly contradicts Governor Ames's account of the Friar's Point riot, in which Mr. ALCORN was one of the chief parties, (see deposition at page 67,) and expresses his want of confidence in Ames's administration.

See also letter of H. C. Carter, page —, also speech of G. WILEY WELLS, (see his speech, reported by Senator Revels, at page —,) in which he quotes Ames's remarks that "the blood of twenty-five negroes would be a good thing for the republican party."

With such a division of feeling in regard to men and measures in the republican party in Mississippi, with universal discontent among all classes of the people in regard to the condition of the State and its administration, they approached the canvass of 1875. Governor Ames was charged by Harris (see same letter before quoted) with using his power as executive of the State for the purpose of securing his election to the United States Senate, and there seems to be no doubt that such was the fact. As he, himself, has stated, he had "united his fortune with the colored people of the State, whom he believed to be in a majority." He was unlearned in law or the spirit of civil rule. Military methods and rigor were his only conception of government. He seemed greedy of political power without comprehending its responsibilities. He did not lessen his deficiences by associating with men more learned in civil rule than himself, but, avoiding men of intelligence and character in the State, surrounded himself with obsequious and inferior associates. The characteristics and tastes of the people among whom he had gone as a stranger, and yet to be their ruler, he never studied nor cared to comprehend, nor to have understood the gentle wisdom of Fletcher of Saltoun: "That if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a people." He never gained their respect; but, by his self-seeking, his self-promotion to power and place and his use of public power for his personal ends, he entirely lost whatever he might have had of their respect. Thus, losing public respect, he lost public confidence, and instead of seeking by conciliaton and methods of justice to regain it, he resolved to defy those who withheld it. The end of all his methods was simply force—the bayonet; that last and most cruel test of military fidelity, when the American soldier is called upon to use his arms against the American citizen. When he found the political knot was complicated, he set aside methods of reason and used the sword to cut it, because he was devoid of the skill or patience to untie it. Violence was the necessary end of such a rule as he conceived and sought to put in practice. The just end of government is the happiness of the people to be governed, and measures to promote popular happiness and content are the first and chief duties of a ruler. It would be a farce to term such a government as he conducted in the spring of 1875 a free government, either for the white or for the black people. The colored population were as thoroughly enslaved to his will and to the handful of politicians whom he set over them as they ever could have been at the hands of their former private owners. In his testimony at page 15, citing his last message to the Legislature, he says he regards the whole affair as a race issue, in which he avowedly intended to take sides with the black race against the white, and to use all his power, personal, political, and official, in their behalf. Thus, in the first year of his administration, in the fall of 1874, in the case of a contest for the office of sheriff at Vicksburgh, in Warren County, he forced Flanagan, the white occupant, out of his seat by a company of United States troops, which he had demanded to be sent to him for that purpose from New Orleans. In 1875, when it became apparent that the democratic party was disposed to combine itself with all the elements of opposition to his administration and make a strenuous effort to gain control of the State, Governor Ames made his first preparation in the Legislature for its defeat by the passage of a law known as the "Gatling-gun bill." This is described in the testimony of E. Barksdale, page —:

Q. You spoke of the "Gatling-gun bill," what was that?

A. I have, I think, a synopsis of the bill.

"Section 3 of the bill empowered the commander-in-chief to organize, from the enrolled militia, two regiments of ten companies each, and to purchase four or more Gatling guns, and organize a corps of select officers and men from the infantry to send with the said guns."

That was passed by the Legislature which assembled on the 1st of January, 1875. The date is not given.

Q. It was passed the spring before the election?

A. Yes, sir; it was called the "Gatling-gun bill," because the purchase of four Gatling guns was authorized, and they were regarded as weapons of very terrible destructive qualities. The appropriation for carrying out the purpose of the Gatling-gun bill was $60,000. Of this, $5,000 were authorized to be expended for military supplies and munitions of war.

The next was his application to the Secretary of War at Washington for the State's quotum of arms. (See testimony, page —, and the accompanying papers and applications of A. G. Packer, adjutant-general, organizing the State militia for active duty.)

A. While matters were in a condition of profound peace here, though these causes of discontent existed to which I have referred and which are stated in the tax-payers' memorial and in the resolutions of the republican club here in the city of Jackson, Governor Ames, after the passage of the law which was known as the "Gatlin-gun bill," as if preparing for war here, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War inquiring about Mississippi's quota of arms. A copy of that letter I have here:

May 25, 1875.

SIR: By direction of his excellency A. Ames, governor of Mississippi, I have the honor to apply to you for the statement of arms and other military property issued to this State since 1860, under act of Congress April 23, 1808, and the acts amendatory thereto.

A communication from the Ordnance Office, Washington, D. C., has been received, in which the State of Mississippi is charged, under the provisions of an act approved March 3, 1875, with the sum $170,167.31, and a balance due the United States is claimed of $1,967.60.

The records of this office do not show the amounts of the apportionment for the different years, and having no data to furnish I respectfully apply to you to furnish it.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

That was a letter written on the 25th of May, 1875.

On the 2d of June, before the political canvass, Governor Ames addressed a letter to General Benét, chief of the Ordnance Department, as follows:

JUNE 2, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to respectfully apply for a price-list of ordnance and ordnance stores as issued from your Office; also a book of forms used in the Department, if any change has been made since the publication of the regulations, 1863.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

Brigadier-General S. V. BENÉT,
Chief of Ordnance, Washington, D. C.

Q. What do you know of any military preparation made by Governor Ames early in the canvass, and prior to the occurrence of any of these disturbances?

A. As I have stated, and cited the letters showing he was making military preparations. Then I have an order-book, issued from the headquarters State of Mississippi, adjutant-general's office, Jackson, May 1, 1875, announcing officers of the Mississippi State militia, during the months of February, March, and April, 1875.

"STAFF OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

"Brigadier-General Albert G. Packer, of Holmes County, adjutant-general. February 25, 1875.

"Lieutenant-Colonel Omar S. Lee, of Holmes County, aid-de-camp. February 25, 1875"—

A gentleman who has since proved a defaulter to a very large amount in the county of Holmes, and has fled the State, and his whereabouts are not known.

"Lieutenant-Colonel James J. Spellman, of Madison County, aid-de-camp. February 25, 1875.

"Fourth division.

"Brigadier-General William Gray, of Washington County. February 25, 1875.

"General Brown colonel First Regiment Infantry. February 25, 1875.

"Major-general State militia, Alexander Warner, of Madison County. February 26, 1875."

These gentlemen were all members of the republican party. That General Warner was the chairman of the republican State executive committee.

Of these, Spellman, Gray, and Brown were colored men; no democrats among them.

After the Clinton riot Governor Ames proceeded to perfect the military organization which had been ordered by law; and in the county of Hinds, under authority known as the "Gatling-gun bill," on the 23d of September, he ordered one thousand Springfield breech-loading muskets to be purchased, and directed to the adjutant-general of this post. After the receipt of those arms they were issued to companies in this county of Hinds, as follows:

On the 2d of October, eighty guns, with accouterments, were issued to Captain Charles Caldwell. (colored.)

On the 5th of October, to the same person, seventeen were issued.

On the 6th of October, forty-seven issued to Captain John W. Cleagan, (white.)

On the 7th, eighty stand of arms to Green Tapley, (colored,) with ammunition.

On the 9th of October, eighty issued to Ed. L. Gillin, (colored,) with ammunition.

On the 9th October, 1865, stand of arms issued to Geo. D. Nixon, (white,) with ammunition.

On the 10th, eighty issued to W. C Mosely, with ammunition.

On the 11th, sixty issued to Oliver Cromwell, (colored,) with ammunition.

That was in this county; issued with accouterments, ammunition, &c., to five negro companies in the county of Hinds, and two white companies.

Almost without exception the appointments were from the republican party. I do not think of an exception in the military appointments, and two-thirds of the companies, that were commissioned in the military service, were taken from that party. Probably half were commanded by colored officers.

The following is a full list of the appointments:

FIRST DIVISION.—Brigadier-General William F. Simonton, of Lee County, March 4, 1875.

SECOND DIVISION.—Brigadier-General Marion Campbell, of De Soto County, March 4, 1875.

By order of the commander-in-chief.

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

The State militia having been thus organized preparatory for the campaign, and the officials being among the most notorious and unscrupulous partisans, black and white, of the State administration, great alarm was created among the white population. The negro companies, officered by negroes, largely predominated, and threats were freely made by their orators that the slaughter of the whites would be completed from the cradle up, if necessary for their success. (Speech of Brigadier-General Gray, reported in testimony of W. A. Ferguson at page —; also testimony of Mr. Putnam, page —.)

As a consequence, rumors flew thick and fast. The preparation of the governor and his arming of the negro militia were on every tongue, and caused the deepest distress and apprehension among all classes who sought to preserve the peace in the State and friendly relations between the two races. That such rumors were exaggerated there can be no doubt, for it was the interest of the Ames party and of the negroes to make proclamation of an organization and power which they knew they did not possess. The effect was to increase the insolence and insubordination of the blacks and intensify the discontent and the apprehensions of the whites. The arms to be furnished by Governor Ames were at the expense of the State, and the whites were left to their private resources to obtain arms necessary, as they believed, for their self-defense. A feeling of excitement was engendered that grew each day in force. Intimidation was thus openly proposed, and proposed to men not likely to be intimidated and totally misunderstood in their course by the men who were assuming to rule them. Thus it seems that violence, bloodshed, and force, as the only arbiter of the election, were first suggested in a time of profound peace in the State of Mississippi, by Governor Ames and his political associates. (See page 334, deposition of Frank Johnston; page 472, deposition of E. Barksdale.) The practice of carrying arms in Mississippi among all classes is almost universal, and there were but few witnesses who appeared before the committee who were not so equipped—one, a Mr. Chisholm, a leading republican of Kemper County, promptly producing his weapon for the inspection of the committee, and the justices of the peace and constables declaring that it was a part of their official costume.

It was testified by —— ——, at page — and —— ——, at page —, that after the war the desire to obtain arms among the negroes was almost universal, and that the sales of weapons to them, especially of shot-guns, was very much in excess of what it was to the whites.

Not only were the white people of Mississippi threatened with the organization and use of the armed negro militia in the coming election, but the armed forces of the Government of the United States were held in terror over them for a like purpose. Mr. Warner, chairman of the republican State executive committee, at page —, states that, immediately upon the holding of the republican State convention at Jackson, in ——, 1875, a resolution was adopted vesting him with an authority to appoint a committee, with himself as chairman, to visit Washington and call upon the President for armed aid to the republican party in the ensuing canvass, which resolution, and the action of the committee under it, shows the character of the campaign which they intended should be waged in that State. It may be here mentioned that the prevalent idea among the negroes and the handful of whites who led them in Mississippi seems to be that the Federal Administration will at all times exert its armed authority for the purpose of retaining them in office; and it was in the hopes of such intervention that the application referred to was made, and which, as we believe, has largely promoted and induced the complaints which led to the constitution of this committee. The experience of prior elections had been favorable to this belief. (See page — of testimony.)

Question. Was it a fact, then, that the military arm of the Government was used in his election in favor of one party?

Answer. Yes, sir; the troops were sent to various parts of the State at that time, and persons were arrested and thrown into prison; and the effect of the use of troops against men who were opposed to that party had very great influence in controlling and determining the election.

Q. I would like to ask that fact, whether the Army of the United States has been used as a party agent in the affairs of Mississippi, and if it has been so felt by the party to which you belong?

A. Yes, sir; it has been so felt, for it was felt in that election, and the military commander was seen to go into a political organization and pledge his support to its candidates; and the troops were placed in various portions of the State without any ostensible cause other than their presence would have that effect.

The democratic conservative party of Mississippi, in the platform adopted at their State convention on the 3d of August, 1875, contained the following propositions:

"First. The recognition of civil and political equality of all men as established by the Constitution of the United States and the amendments thereto.

"Second. Favoring the education of all the children of the State in public school, sustained by adequate taxation; but opposition to extravagance or partisan administration of said schools."

The thirteenth cordially invites the voters of all the people of both races to unite vigorously with them in the approaching canvass. (See page — of testimony.) It was by this convention that the democratic executive committee was organized, and J. Z. George appointed as chairman.

Thus opened the campaign of 1875. It is in proof, by almost every witness who was examined on the subject, that the negroes were organized in clubs, having a quasi military organization in every county in the State. Clubs, also, of white people were formed, and the parading and marching, with the use of flags, drums, music, cannon for salutes or the explosion of anvils—a rude substitute for cannon—became general throughout the State.

Much of the alleged intimidation of the colored people by the white population was claimed to be from causes like these, which could only have operated upon minds of the most childish character, and would be ridiculed if proposed with the same intent in any part of the Northern States. This constitutional timidity of the colored population was frequently and gravely urged as entering into alleged violations of the fifteenth amendment by white men, who fired off pistols in the air and exploded anvils at night on their return from meetings through the country. At page 112, A. Parker, republican sheriff in Amite County, testifies as follows:

Question. You may state whether or not these outrages had the effect of intimidating the colored voters.

Answer. They certainly did, sir. I am satisfied that for a month before the election there was not a week-day or a Sunday that colored people did not come to my residence or to the court-house, and tell me of these visits to their houses, and ask my advice as to what they should do, and did I think they would be killed, and all such inquiries as that. Of course I encouraged them all I could. I will state as my candid opinion that there were no less than five hundred men who lay in the woods the greater part of the night before the election. They would stand in line at the polls, and drop asleep standing up, on account of not having had sleep the previous night. These democratic clubs were organized into squads, and each of these squads had two anvils. They would go to a little rising place in the road, and put these anvils down, and shoot them off ten or twelve times, and shoot their shot-guns, yell, and go on, and stop a mile perhaps farther on, and repeat the same thing again. We could hear it in every direction from town, and it sounded just like war times. The colored people, when these squads would be approaching them, shooting and yelling, would of course imagine that they were going to kill them, and they would slip out and get into the woods, and lay hid until morning. In the morning they came in one at a time, and found out no one had been killed. This was done on the night before the election, and finding out that nothing serious had been done, and that this was only a trick to frighten them, they came up to the polls and voted, and we polled a larger vote than we had polled before since the war; both democratic and republican.

Perhaps the best proof that can be offered of the real intent and spirit with which the democratic and conservative canvass was organized and conducted will be found in the telegraphic correspondence between Mr. George, the chairman of the executive committee, and his party associates throughout the State, who communicated with him during the canvass. This correspondence, although not referred to by any witness nor in any way supposed to be connected with the subjects to be inquired of by the committee, was, by the order of the committee and against the formal and recorded protest of the undersigned, made public for the purpose of sustaining the charges of lawlessness and outrage against the democratic party of Mississippi. Mr. George had not been made a witness; none of the parties who were his correspondents had been made witnesses; but the whole correspondence was seized and produced in bulk before the committee, and is to be found on pages 380 to 420 of the testimony.

Let it be borne in mind that these communications were all supposed by the writers to be confidential, and that their contents would never be made public.

It will be difficult for any mind, however prejudiced, to construe any portion of this telegraphic correspondence so as to favor the suspicion that lawlessness of any kind was looked to as an element for the success of the democratic party in that canvass. From first to last there is nothing but what is creditable to Mr. George and his democratic correspondents as honorable, peaceful, and law-abiding citizens. We do not believe it will be possible to torture any of these dispatches into any other meaning. The demonstration of General Ames in organizing the negro militia, the openly expressed intention and threat of bringing Federal troops into the State to control the election, no doubt operated to create a corresponding antagonism and bitterness, and suggested that it should be met by force. The "race issues," which Governor Ames has recognized, and upon one side of which he so promptly and vigorously ranged himself with all his official powers, were undoubtedly aggravated and intensified. Collisions were constantly threatened, and yet few, remarkably few, under all the circumstances, occurred.

In endeavoring now to give a reliable account of the acts of violence and bloodshed which were proven before the committee as having occurred in Mississippi during the summer and autumn of 1875, we deem it hardly necessary to make expression of the intense and hearty reprobation which we, in common with all men who respect and value law and order and humanity, necessarily felt, and now feel, upon every occasion where violence and crime were committed. Stern repression and prompt punishment are the just measures to be dealt out to all such offenders, without respect to race or color or station in life, and for all such criminals and transgressors we invoke due punishment at the hands of those who are the representatives of the Government whose laws need vindication. But while we propose in every proven case to condemn the guilty, we do not propose to allow reasonable proof to be replaced by reckless and malicious assertion or rumor; nor do we propose to condemn a whole community upon the testimony of men, confessedly without character, who live upon slanders and trade upon abuse instigated, as many of such characters were who appeared before the committee, by a miserable faction, whose hope of prolonged plunder and self-enrichment lies in keeping up a condition of public excitement and fanning the prejudices and hatreds of ill-informed citizens of the North against the white people of the South. We confidently believe that when knowledge of the truth as it is, and sad though it may be in many respects, of the state of affairs in Mississippi, shall possess the minds of the people of the Northern States, the occupation of the miserable class of slanderers to whom we have referred will be gone forever.

It is for this reason that we sincerely deprecate such utterances as are contained in the speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and delivered in the Senate by him, when urging the adoption of the resolution by which this committee was authorized. No fact stated by that honorable Senator was upon his personal knowledge, and the source from which he obtained his assumed facts was disclosed by the deposition of Captain Fisher, to be found at page 533.

By Mr. BAYARD:

Question. Is not that a copy of Mr. MORTON's speech that you have there?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Didn't you furnish these extracts to him?

A. I furnished some of them.

SENATOR MORTON'S SPEECH, AND WHO HELPED TO COMPILE THE EXTRACTS IN IT.

Q. I observe, in reply to a question put to you, first in respect to the Clinton riot, and next in regard to certain questions in reference to the taxation of the State, that you consulted a pamphlet; have you it?

A. Yes, sir. [Witness hands pamphlet to Senator BAYARD.]

Q. This purports to be a speech delivered by Mr. MORTON in the United States Senate in January, 1876.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I suppose when you read the extract from the Raymond Gazette you obtained it from that speech?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you looked for information in regard to the taxation of the State to the statements in that speech?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You read your testimony from what you found there?

A. I refreshed my recollection on a few points from what I found there.

Q. Did you or did you not read from that speech when you gave your answer?

A. I did, sir.

Q. Did you or did you not read from that speech when you were questioned in regard to the proceedings of the Clinton riot, and the number of persons killed at that time?

A. No, sir; I did not. I endeavored to find a paragraph taken from the Forest Register, in which it stated the number killed at Clinton—the Forest Register is a democratic paper—but I do not find the paragraph.

Q. Did you, as a matter of fact, make that political compilation in there from the democratic press of Mississippi?

A. I assisted in that compilation.

Q. Who assisted you?

A. Well, sir, there were extracts furnished by different gentlemen.

Q. Name those parties.

A. Judge Alcorn assisted in a portion of the compilation.

Q. That is Mr. Robert J. Alcorn?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did you prepare them? Where were you at that time?

A. I was in this city.
Q. Were they prepared in this city?
A. O, yes, sir.
Q. To whom did you furnish them?
A. Well, sir, they were furnished to Senator MORTON.
Q. At his request?
A. I was requested to furnish to Senator MORTON all the evidence that I could obtain showing the character of the election and of the canvass in Mississippi last fall. I told him that I should be very glad to do that, and that I might be able to furnish some extracts showing the temper of the press, which he said he would be very glad to receive. And I proceeded to do so; and a portion of what you see here is the result of that labor.
Q. Did you see him personally and furnish these to him at his request?
A. Yes, sir; I did.

Thus it will be seen that, while being examined as a witness, Captain Fisher based his replies upon the speech made by the honorable Senator; and yet he admits that he himself had furnished to the honorable Senator the statements contained in that speech; that he had not personal knowledge himself, but that the speech was prepared in the city of Washington from the newspaper-clippings which he, Fisher, as the editor of a partisan paper, had made from time to time in the State of Mississippi. Thus, if Mr. MORTON quotes Fisher and Fisher quotes MORTON, the combined authority of the two can be no greater than that of either, and either and both rest entirely upon mere hearsay and information for the assertions which are dignified by the utterance of a Senator in Congress.

During the canvass that preceded the election of November 2, 1875, there were four political disturbances ending in the loss of human life and bloodshed, in regard to which much testimony has been taken by the committee, and which have mainly served as the basis for the wholesale accusations against the white people of Mississippi with which the public press and the ears of the northern people have been industriously filled.

I. A riot at Vicksburgh on the occasion of the celebration of the 5th of July, (the 4th of July happening on Sunday)
II. The riot of Yazoo City on the 1st of September.
III. The riot at Clinton on the 4th of September; and
IV. Friar's Point on the 9th of October.

In regard to the Friar's Point riot, there is no testimony whatever except what is contained in the statement of Governor Ames, at page 26, and of Senator Alcorn, at page 67. Governor Ames charges Senator ALCORN with being personally responsible for those occurrences. This he does upon the information of others, not having been personally present; but Mr. Alcorn, who was personally present, gives in full the history of his participation as a leader in that whole affair, and divests it entirely of such political significance as is referred to in the resolution appointing this committee.

He testifies that the difficulty originated in the party schism between his adherents and those of Governor Ames, in which the democratic party, or, what is the same thing, the white people of Mississippi, had no share. He states, at page 69, the cause of the riot, which was, his personal difference with John Brown, the negro sheriff, and the organization by Brown of a large body of armed negroes, several hundred in number, well armed and approaching the town of Friar's Point, threatening to sack and burn it.

Mr. Alcorn organized a force, and with his "double-barreled shot-gun" headed the defense. The negroes were dispersed at first by the forces of Alcorn without loss of life or wounds on either side; but the murder by the negroes of a respectable young white man, by the name of Scott, who was innocently attending to his business and taking no part in the trouble, led to a retaliation by the Alcorn party, and he sums up, at page 71, the result of the conflict:

Two white men assassinated by the negroes, one other shot himself accidentally, and nine colored men killed by the Alcorn party.

Deplorable and dreadful as the occurrence seems to have been, and public as it was, and well known to Governor Ames, who has furnished the committee with Brown's communications to him on the subject, (and which are to be found at page 20 of the documentary evidence attached to the testimony,) yet no action seems ever to have been taken by any of the civil authorities of Mississippi to vindicate the law, and, so far as the testimony of Senator ALCORN discloses, no member of the democratic party was concerned in the transaction. Whatever may be the lawless and dreadful character of this collision, it is proved beyond doubt to have been disconnected with any trouble growing out of the democratic-conservative organization of Mississippi. It should not be forgotten that Senator ALCORN is a strenuous republican and ally of General Grant's administration, and that the democratic party of Mississippi have no more determined opponent.

The riot at Vicksburgh on the 5th of July is stated by every witness who has been examined to have been entirely unpremeditated. The colored people met at the court-house on the morning of that day for the performance of patriotic exercises. Among the audience was Cardozo, the negro superintendent of education, and who was also to have been one of the speakers on that occasion. He was the editor and proprietor of a newspaper published in Jackson, in which, it seems, he had assailed Judge Cowan, a citizen of the county. Judge Cowan and Cardozo met at the railway station at Vicksburgh on the morning of the 5th. An altercation took place between them by reason of the scurrilous article by Cardozo and a collision ensued. Cardozo was assisted by a white man named ——, and with his aid, the attack of Cowan was foiled and Cardozo got off in safety and reached the court-house and took his place in the meeting. A few young men, supposed to have been friends of Cowan, followed him to renew the conflict, and finding there ——, who had interfered between them at the depot, an encounter took place in which —— was shot by some one unknown to any witness who testified.

The testimony discloses (see deposition of ——, page —, and the deposition of ——, at page —) that but a single shot was fired in the building, which resulted in the wounding of ——, who has since absconded from the State. After the shooting of —— the meeting, composed chiefly of colored people, scattered in great confusion. Shots were fired over their heads, one of which struck an old colored man who was on the sidewalk, not concerned in the meeting, and caused his death. The indignation of the men who had sought Cardozo continued; search was made for him, but he was secreted in an upper portion of the building and finally managed to escape unhurt. The mayor of the town, Dr. Leary, appeared promptly on the scene and soon brought everything to order. The riot had its origin in the personal encounter between Judge Cowan and Cardozo, had no feature of political intent, and the loss of life was confined to the old colored man, who was shot accidentally by some unknown person. The person who was wounded in the court-house was proven to be a very disreputable man, and was either a bar-keeper or the partner of a negro who kept a low drinking-house. He having absconded, no proceedings have been taken against the person who shot him, nor is it known whether his wound is dangerous or not. The disturbance of this innocent and peaceable assembly was undoubtedly outrageous, and deserves the greatest reprobation; but it is impossible to believe that it was in any way or degree connected with party politics. It was a gross breach of the peace, which should have been promptly arrested, as it was, and severely punished by the civil authorities, as it was not.

The affray at Yazoo City took place at a club meeting of the republican party held at Bedwell's hall on the 1st of September, 1875, to which members of all parties were invited. The speaker was A. T. Morgan, the sheriff, and a candidate for re-election, who says:

"There were present, perhaps, half a dozen white republicans and fifty colored, and perhaps half a dozen or more democrats."

An altercation took place, growing out of some remark of the speaker which was rudely contradicted by some one in the audience; pistols were drawn and fired, and the hall was soon emptied; the result of the melee being the killing of Mr. B. R. Mitchell, a white man, and the wounding of Foote, a colored man. (See testimony of Foote, at page —; also of A. T. Morgon, at page —.)

This was the beginning and the end of the riot in the hall; but the condition of feeling which probably gave rise to the riot did not end with that affray. Yazoo County contained an overwhelming majority of colored people. Its government, judges, clerks, sheriff, supervisors, justices of the peace, constables, juries—grand and petit—prosecuting officers—all were in the hands of the republican party. Mr. Morgan, who was one of the chief actors on this occasion, was the autocrat of his party in that county. He held the office of sheriff at one time, and was a candidate for re-election. He appeared in Washington before the committee to assail his political opponents in Mississippi. Mr. Morgan has been in Washington employed, as he says, as a claim agent for several months. He was in communication with the majority of the committee for weeks prior to their departure for Mississippi. His testimony could readily have been then taken, and some opportunity thus afforded for calling witnesses in reply, but he was withheld until the return of the committee to Washington, and examined at the very close of their sessions. He stated, at page —, that he went to Mississippi at the close of the war, rented lands, and commenced planting, but from various causes failed and was sold out, and became insolvent; that he was received with the greatest possible kindness on every hand upon his first coming, but soon lost his popularity with the white people, to whom he became exceedingly obnoxious. He omitted to inform the committee that he had married a colored woman, which fact was stated by Dixon and Foote, colored witnesses, and his political associates, at page —. Upon his failure in business he immediately embarked in politics, and has thoroughly controlled the county ever since. Attorney-General Harris, in the letter hereinbefore cited, classes him among the disreputable associates of Governor Ames, and says that, when a State senator, he offered to sell his vote for $2,000; that Raymond, the State printer, refused to pay it, saying that he had already paid him $900, and that was enough for that vote. Morgan was also chairman of the late republican State convention.

The marriage, to which we have alluded, and his evil repute encouraged a political associate named Hilliard, and a former sheriff, to run against him for the nomination of sheriff. The convention nominated Morgan; but Hilliard bolted and ran for the office, calling to his aid whatever opposition he could muster. At the end of the election in 1874, Hilliard, being in office, refused to give it up to Morgan, except upon terms to which Morgan refused to accede, and claimed that Morgan had not qualified according to law. Morgan proposed to take possession of the office by force of arms, and did so, and killed Hilliard, who resisted him, and with his party friends shot other adherents of Hilliard. This riot, occurring at the court-house, involved none but members of the republican party. (See deposition of Foote, page —.) Those who were killed and those who killed them were alike republicans. No democrat was concerned in it; but the friends of the murdered man caused the arrest of Morgan, who was committed without bail, waiving any hearing before the committing magistrate. He immediately, however, sued out a writ of habeas corpus before Chancellor Dreman, who, after a hearing of five days, refused to discharge him on bail, and recommitted him to prison. Morgan was then, at his own request, removed to the penitentiary at Jackson. He was, as his correspondence with Governor Ames shows, (see pages 102 and 103 of the documentary evidence,) on terms of close personal and political intimacy with Ames, and, according to the letter of Harris, the attorney-general, Ames removed Dreman because he refused to bail his friend Morgan, and appointed Walton chancellor in place of Dreman, who thereupon proceeded to hear the application of Morgan for a discharge, and discharged him on a recognizance of $5,000. Morgan re-appeared in Yazoo City, obtained possession of his office, and having political control of the county no indictment was found against him or any of his friends for the murder of Hilliard or the shooting of Hilliard's friends until the county passed into the democratic hands by the result of the election of 1875, when an indictment for murder was found against him by a grand jury, from which indictment he is to-day a fugitive in the city of Washington, and appears as a witness before the committee of the Senate to assail the community whose laws he has outraged. That Morgan killed Hilliard must have been found by Chancellor Dreman when he refused, after a hearing of five days, to discharge him on bail, and the testimony of Foote (see page —) testifies to the same fact. How far the condition of feeling which led to the riot in Yazoo City on the 1st of September, 1875, had been brought about by the lawless action and defiance of all order by Morgan himself and his political associates is not easy to determine; but that he was himself a gross transgressor there can be no manner of doubt, and that such a man would never be permitted to obtain or retain office in the Northern States, we believe to be equally true. The weight of the testimony of such a witness we submit to just public consideration.

The Clinton riot was productive of more public excitement than the three other riots which we have described. It has been the subject of more exaggerated statement than all the other three combined, and the facts attending it can now be stated with a reasonable degree of certainty. A political meeting at which a barbecue was to be had was called at Clinton, a village on the Vicksburgh Railroad about twelve miles west of Jackson, the capital of the State. To give celebrity to the occasion, Governor Ames and other leading members of his party were announced to be speakers, and by an arrangement democratic speakers were also invited and a portion of the time for discussion allotted to each. It was intended to be a grand demonstration on the part of the republicans, who attended in large numbers, estimated at from eighteen hundred to twenty-five hundred, of whom upward of twelve hundred were men. The whites were a mere handful, by the best informed witnesses supposed to be from sixty to seventy-five, republicans and democrats.

The number of white men who participated in the fight that ensued was probably from ten to fifteen. The parade of the republicans, composed wholly of colored men, was unusually large and carefully arranged. Eight hundred and ninety mounted colored men were counted by Captain Montgomery in the procession. (See his testimony, page 543.)

NUMBER OF WHITES AT CLINTON MEETING.

Q. How many white people do you suppose were present at the Clinton meeting, at the original meeting?
A. At the barbecue?
Q. At the barbecue.
A. I think not over twenty-five or thirty; thirty at the outside.

NUMBER OF COLORED PEOPLE AT CLINTON MEETING.

Q. How many colored people?
A. I counted eight hundred men in line, cavalry.
Q. Besides that, how many?
A. Besides that there were, I reckon, four hundred or five hundred on foot, besides women and children. I don't know, but I reckon there was a crowd of two or three thousand altogether.
Q. You went up to be one of the speakers, but did not speak?
A. Yes, sir; I did not speak.
Q. You were entirely unarmed?
A. Entirely so—

while companies on foot to the number of many hundred were counted by the same witness. Many, perhaps the majority, of these men on foot and horseback were armed, and this procession so formed moved out of its necessary line of march, to the place of barbecue, and paraded through the town of Clinton. The place of speaking was on a hill just outside of the town and near the railway station. The speaking was commenced by Judge Johnston, a democrat, in a very temperate and conciliatory speech, as described by every witness who was examined. He was followed by Captain Fisher, a republican; and during the remarks of Fisher a collision took place between a young white man and a colored man, about one hundred yards from the speaker's stand.

Comments had been made upon Fisher's remarks, and rude contradictions of their truth by one young white man named Neal, from the town of Raymond, standing in a group of two or three of his companions not many feet from the speaker's stand; but Captain Fisher in his testimony, (see page 536)—

Q. Was your speech interrupted by the shooting or disturbance that occurred or were you interrupted by remarks made?

A. I do not know that any remarks were made to me; if there were I did not hear them.

Q. We have had a great deal of testimony about the Clinton affair, and the witnesses were not certain, when you were speaking, whether you heard these interruptions noticed by men standing by, and I thought I would ask you whether you heard them or not.

A. I heard, subsequently to the riot, when I got home, that such expressions had been made in regard to portions of my speech, or as having reference to myself; but I did not hear them, and if I had heard them I should not likely have paid any attention to them—distinctly says that he did not hear these remarks, nor was his speech interrupted by anything that was said in the crowd, but that the interruption to his speech arose from the affray between the white and the colored men to which we have referred; that the white man in question had a bottle of whisky from which he had been drinking, and which no doubt was the proximate cause of the affray that then took place. Immediately upon the collision between these two a pistol-shot was heard, and there is conflict of testimony as to the person who fired it. It was immediately followed by a general discharge of fire-arms, and in the mêlée, which caused intense confusion, two colored men were killed on the spot and four or five were wounded. The negroes were rallied and commenced pursuit of the whites, who, in a group numbering about eleven men, retreated from the field.

Martin Sivley and Thompson, white men, were overtaken, killed, and their bodies mutilated. Thompson was found in the public road, nearly a mile from the scene of action, shot through the head. Charles Chilton was killed in his own yard, and, as it appears by the testimony of Captain Montgomery, (page 543)—

ABOUT THE WHITE MEN KILLED.

Q. Did you know any of them?

A. No, sir; I did not know any of them.

Q. Black men or white men?

A. They were black men that I saw there, just lying there, and we afterward found the body of Mr. Sivley and Mr. Thompson and Mr. Chilton. Mr. Chilton was shot right near his house—the very man I had taken dinner with, and there was not a more quiet, inoffensive man in our county. It was Charles Chilton, the brother of John Chilton, who had before that been an active republican, and a leading republican of the native Mississippians of our county; and at that riot he threw up the sponge; he said he had given $100 in money and in beef, and the heart's best blood of his brother that day, and he was done.

Q. By whom was his brother killed?

A. By the negroes.

Q. How far from the original scene of the riot?

A. Right at his own gate he was shot; that was one hundred yards, I suppose.

Q. Was he in the affray?

A. No, sir. There was such a stampede and rush that the negro men were riding and running over their women and children; and there was such confusion and hallooing that he ran out to his gate. He carried his gun with him, though, which was very natural; and he handed his gun to a negro boy standing by him, and said, "Take this." Now, that is the way the thing was told me. He was standing there helping the women and the children into his yard to get them out of the way of the stampede and of the horses, and as he turned his back some of the men in the road fired and shot him. After finding that there was no armed body on the top of the hill and several men from the town began to assemble—but before that time the negroes had gone off in companies, and they seemed to be assembling, and I thought we had better make for the depot, and get possession of that, and send for assistance to some other point to help us—for I thought it was very likely that there were not white men enough there to hold the town against the negroes, should they be disposed to attack it—which we did—was endeavoring to let the black women and children into his yard to escape the press of the crowd behind them when he was shot. Captain White was shot, stabbed, and left for dead. Rice, Wells, Wharton, and Robinson, white men, were all wounded, with others whose names are not obtainable.

The excitement of the scene and consequent confusion created the wildest and most variant rumors. The negroes were reported as massing at a short distance from the town, proposing to attack and destroy it. Their declarations and cries during the conflict had been of an alarming character, and spread great dismay among the citizens. Instantly the telegraph was put in requisition, and bodies of men at Vicksburgh, Jackson, and Edwards's Station hastily met together, armed with every variety of weapon, and taking the train reached Clinton on the evening of Saturday after the riot had occurred and the negroes had left the town.

A hasty attempt at organization was made by the election of Captain William A. Montgomery to the command of this unorganized and hastily collected force to the number of several hundred. Captain Montgomery testifies (see page —) that he immediately caused a mounted patrol, led by him in person, to make a circuit of the town and ascertain whether any immediate attack from the negroes was to be apprehended. He discovered no one, and no shot was given or returned between his party and the colored men, nor was there any collision or disturbance whatever. He returned to Clinton where the white men had collected under arms, and finding a want of subordination among them he resigned his position as commander, because he would not take the responsibility of preserving the peace without having the power to do so. This is much to be regretted, for by the testimony of all witnesses who have made any reference to Captain Montgomery, as well as by his own testimony before the committee, he is evidently a man of high and cool courage, of generosity and integrity of character.

Thus left without a leader and deeply excited by the events of the day, infuriated by the murder and mutilation of their white friends, mob-law soon became triumphant among the whites collected at Clinton. The white men killed are shown to have been estimable and popular citizens. Chilton met his death while endeavoring to protect the colored women and children, and had handed his gun to a colored man in his employ at the time he received his death-wound. At page 543, Chilton is proven to have sent provisions down to aid the colored people in their barbecue. Martin Sively had no connection with the commencement of the affray. The number of wounded whites was unknown, and was doubtless enormously exaggerated. As a consequence, the more violent and lawless of the men who had collected under arms obtained the ascendency. They visited the homes of the negroes in the vicinity of Clinton who, they had been informed, had been connected with the affray and the killing of their friends, and outrageously took the lives of seven or eight of these men. It was the reign of terror and lynch law in that neighborhood from late on Saturday night until Sunday morning. After that time no distinctly authenticated case of murder growing out of the Clinton riot was established before the committee.

The circumstances of the riot were carefully and diligently examined by Mr. Frank Johnston, of the town of Jackson, together with Mr. Chilton and Judge Cabinis, within a few days after the occurrence. Diligent inquiry was instituted by these gentlemen, and a number of affidavits from white and colored men, democrats and republicans, were taken at the time and at the town of Clinton. Mr. Johnston was examined before the committee at great length, and appended these affidavits to his testimony. His cross-examination developed nothing in contravention of the conclusions at which he had arrived in September, 1875. His deposition will be found at pages 329–378 of the testimony, and the reliability of his statements is attested in the strongest terms by all the republicans who have been examined in relation to this affair. Judge Alderson says of Mr. Johnston, at page 301:

By Mr. CAMERON:

Q. If Mr. Frank Johnston made a statement that he had made a thorough examination, would you conclude that that was absolutely true or merely that he really believed that he had made a thorough examination?

A. I would not conclude anything; but whatever Mr. Johnston would investigate and state upon his word of honor, that I would give credit to. I do not know a man for whose moral worth I have a higher respect than I do for Frank Johnston's.

And his high character is equally attested by Judge Swann, Mr. Estelle, and every republican witness who was examined in regard to the Clinton transaction. His profession is that of a lawyer, and his residence within twelve miles of the scene of disaster. So that we feel justified in accepting the statement of facts and the conclusions of Mr. Johnston as perfectly true and reliable. He is sustained in substance by nearly every witness who was examined.

Captain H. G. Fisher, who was the compiler of Mr. MORTON's speech, and was one of the speakers at the barbecue, stated his difficulty, even after the most careful investigation, in ascertaining reliably the names of more than four or five colored men who lost their lives on the occasion. There seems to be no just reason to doubt that the collision was entirely unpremeditated, certainly so on the part of the whites who were present, as it would have been little less than madness for twenty-five or thirty white men, not more than half of whom were armed, to have precipitated a conflict against such overwhelming odds. (See Fisher's testimony, pages 521 to 523.)

As an illustration of the absence of any anticipation of difficulty on the part of the whites, we refer to the testimony of Captain Montgomery, (page 541,) by which it appears that, having been asked to fill the appointment of another democrat who had intended to speak at Clinton, he attended the meeting without even a pocket-knife upon his person, and that, taking the train from Edwards's Station to Clinton in company with Harney, the colored sheriff of the county, he remarked in reply to an observation of Harney that he was totally unarmed, but that he believed that of the posse of twenty-five colored men whom Harney had on board, twenty-four would be found to have weapons upon their persons, and upon an examination by Harney it was found to be true in the case of more than two-thirds. (See page —.)

It will be borne in mind that this affray occurring between a mere handful of whites and a large and organized body of colored men who were to meet in the presence of the governor of the State, their peculiar and especial champion, who had to use his own words, "united his fortune with theirs;" who held the entire executive power of the State; was also in a political stronghold of the republican party which controlled every peace officer; that every means of repressing or punishing disorder was in the hands of officials of that party; that within twelve miles was a force of United States troops encamped for the alleged purpose of suppressing riot. It seems impossible to believe that such a collision could be brought on by the minority under such circumstances with a view to produce political effect. Such a view is irreconcilable with any suggestion of human motives of which the undersigned have any knowledge.

It may here be noted that Major Allyn, in command of the United States troops stationed at Jackson, was at Clinton on the night of the riot, (see page 331,) and was in Jackson during the sessions of the committee, in intercourse with the majority of the committee, but not examined as a witness.

This, we believe, comprises a list of the public disorders prior to the election in relation to which testimony has been taken by the committee. There are other cases of homicide and violence, to which we shall hereafter refer. The murder of William P. Haffa, a white man, as detailed by his wife at page 483, and by the testimony of Captain Montgomery at page 547, occurred on the 6th of September.

This murder of Haffa seems to have been an atrocious crime, and two important facts appear in the testimony of his widow and daughter, (see pages 483–490,) one of which is the failure in public duty, which cost Haffa his damages in a civil suit against two parties named Bush, who had assaulted him—was that of Lake, a republican United States official at Jackson, (see page 487;) and, secondly, that the names of the persons who murdered her husband are well known and given, and that she went to Governor Ames with her sad story.

Why, may it be asked, did not Governor Ames order the arrest and trial of one or all of these murderers? The only notice he seems to have taken of Mrs. Haffa was a very moderate subscription, to the more liberal one already made by Captain Montgomery, a democrat.

Mr. Haffa would not appear to have been altogether the blameless citizen described (naturally) by his widow.

Captain W. N. Montgomery testifies, at pages 547, 548, as follows:

ABOUT MR. HAFFA.

It was about that time that Haffa's death was reported.

Q. State what you know about that.

A. I don't know anything about it of my own knowledge. I knew Mr. Haffa.

Q. Who was he?

A. He was a man that was from Chicago, brought there by Dr. Robinnett, for the purpose of working on his farm, some seven or eight years ago. I got twenty at the same time myself.

Q. Twenty what?

A. Twenty laborers from Chicago at the same time, white men; and, by the way, the last one of them ran off and stole all my mules, and I lost every cent that I made. This man Haffa was one of them that Dr Robinnett got. He worked about three days with Dr Robinnett, and then went to William Bush's and hired himself to a negro man who was renting from William Bush. After living there two or three weeks and doing a good deal of mischief, Mr. Bush and some others went over there and took him out and gave him a flogging, and Bush was up before the United States court, but the suit was dismissed. This flogging placed Haffa in a position to get office from the negroes, and at the next election he was elected to the Legislature. He was then a magistrate, and had been for several years teaching school there. I know nothing about him except what the neighbors there said. He was a very bad man, I judge, from everything that was said about him.

Q. Do you know what his reputation among the blacks was?

A. I received a dispatch inquiring for some one who could testify in regard to the Haffa case from here, and the first man that I inquired about was a negro man living on my place, who brought the dispatch from the telegraph office to me—I live five or six miles out in the country. I asked him if he knew anything about the killing of Mr. Haffa; and he says, "No, sir, I don't; but he ought to have been killed long before he was." I said, "Why, I thought he was a good friend of yours?" He says, "No, sir; he done too much stealing in this country, and he ought to have been killed long ago." If this will be allowed as testimony, I will say what this negro told me about Haffa. He says, "Well, sir, when he was elected magistrate he sent for all of us to come up and get our mules that the Government was going to give to us, and he said that it took $5 apiece to get the mules and pay the freight on the mules." And he said that they gave him $5, about two hundred of them, but that he did not give $5, as he did not have it; and at the time appointed to get the mules they came there, and Mr. Haffa said that they had so many mules for the blacks down there, and they had such a great long train of them, that in passing underneath a tunnel the whole thing caved in and killed every mule, and they lost their $5.

I said, "You are surely mistaken; you are joking about that." He says, "Joking! I am not joking; I can get you a dozen men in five minutes that gave him $5." Well, on inquiry I found that his reputation was very bad among the negroes, although he had been elected to office by them.

Q. Do you know anything of the circumstances of his death?

A. Nothing in the world.

Q. Did you hear of it at the time?

A. Yes, sir; I heard of it; and why it should be done for political purposes—I have no idea that there were any political purposes or object in the killing of Mr. Haffa, because he had many fallings-out with his neighbors; he was a terrible man to fall out with his neighbors, and they had all sorts of difficulties with him.

I have no idea that there was any politics in the killing of Haffa in the world. It was not on account of any political differences of opinion that Haffa was killed.

Q. Had you any application from Mrs. Haffa for assistance?

A. I had; and paid her $50 at Edwards's Depot. She came there and applied to me for assistance.

NEGROES ORGANIZED AND MADE MANY DEMONSTRATIONS AND THREATS AFTER CLINTON.

After this difficulty was over in Clinton the negroes organized in companies throughout Hinds County, and made many demonstrations and threats to make an attack upon the town and kill all the people; sent in word that they were going to commence from the cradle and go up. Well, sir, living in such a country as I do, it is well calculated to arouse a man's fears, if he has got any. I live on a public road, myself and one other white man, and there are seventy-six negro men on the road and only us two white men; and it is very reasonable that if they wanted to hurt us they could do so.

THE WHITES ORGANIZE TO PROTECT THEMSELVES AGAINST THE ENCROACHMENTS OF THE BLACKS.

We organized ourselves into companies for protection then against these negroes, into military companies. I was captain; was elected to take command of five or six of them, in different parts of the county. It was simply and purely for protection; not for any political purpose in the world, but to protect ourselves against the encroachments of the blacks.

HELP TO MRS. HAFFA.

Q. Why was this application made to you by Mrs. Haffa?

A. As being in command of this military company. I suppose she was sent to me by some one. She was inquiring about where she could get assistance, and she was sent to me. She told me that Haffa's father was a man of considerable wealth and influence, and that when she could get home she would be cared for, and she wanted to get her family out of the country; and I handed her $50. Where she went I don't know, and I have never seen her from that time to this, and I never saw her before.

Q. Was that a gratuity of your own to her, or did you owe that money to her husband?

A. No, sir; I never owed the money to anybody. After I handed her the money some of the men there in the neighborhood went around and got up a subscription.

This does not in the least lessen the crime, but may have weight in assigning some other cause than political prejudice as the origin of his murder.

The result of the Clinton riot and the affray at Yazoo City had the effect of aggravating the excitement and feeling between the two races. Instead of causing the law to be respected by a prompt and vigorous use of its powers, it would not appear that Governor Ames and his State administration took any of those steps which under a government of laws a ruler should have taken to punish the offenders and prevent the recurrence of wrong. We have not been able to ascertain that a prosecution was ever set on foot against any one connected with these riots, or any attempt whatever made to apprehend and punish any of the wrong-doers. On the contrary, it would appear from the order-book of Governor Ames, which was produced before the committee, (see testimony of E. Barksdale, p. 468,) that his favorite and only remedy—the bayonet—was looked to by Governor Ames. On the 24th of September a circular letter was addressed by Ames to the republican sheriffs of certain counties in the following words:

"SEPTEMBER 24.

"SIR: I am directed by his excellency the governor to inquire if any militia organizations are needed in your county to assist the civil officers?

"Are there any threats from the opposition, that, in your judgment, will be carried into effect; and if so, will it be possible to hold a quiet and peaceable election?"

It will be observed that this letter was not in response to any application for aid, and had evidently not been preceded by reports from any quarters of violence, either actual or apprehended. Governor Ames was plainly seeking for information that would justify, or rather give him the pretext for the use of armed militia. He inquires "if" there were threats from the opposition, and whether, in the opinion of his agents, such threats would be carried into effect; and "if so," whether a peaceable election would be held. Nothing could more strongly show the temper and intent of Governor Ames than this spontaneous, unsuggested solicitation of opinion from his partisan sheriffs, for no such inquiry was directed to any but his political confidants.

The answers to these circulars do not appear, but the suggestion no doubt was accepted and produced the desired results. The negroes were thus informed that they were to receive armed protection, and that they were to be armed themselves for political purposes.

In a speech made by the colored brigadier-general, Gray, when he returned to Washington County after an interview with Governor Ames, to which allusion has been made, the announcement was publicly made by him that Governor Ames was to give the colored militia arms to secure the election; and such no doubt was the information given in other parts of the State.

In pursuance of this policy of intimidation and violence we find on the 6th and 7th of October special orders published by the adjutant-general, which clearly explain themselves:

[Special Orders No. 10.]

OCTOBER 6, 5.

Brigadier-General William F. Fitzgerald, fifth division Mississippi State militia, will order Captain W. C. Mosely's Company D, Second Regiment Infantry, Hinds County State militia, stationed at Edwards's Depot, as soon as arms and ammunition are distributed to them, to report at Jackson, Mississippi.

By order of the commander-in-chief.

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

[Special Orders No. 7.]

OCTOBER 7, 5.

Lieutenant-Colonel O. L. Lee, aid-de-camp on the staff of the commander-in-chief, is hereby ordered to proceed to New Orleans, Louisiana, to make any and all arrangements with the N. O. Lt. L. & C. R. R. Co. for transportation of troops and supplies of the Mississippi State militia.

By order of the commander-in-chief.

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

And also the following correspondence:

OCTOBER 4.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by his excellency the governor to inquire if it is possible for us to obtain cars for transportation of (300) three hundred men and equipage for two hundred more. The equipage will require a box-car. The time for using the train to be fixed at a day within the next two weeks. Train to run from Jackson, Mississippi, to Vaughn's Station, and to remain under orders until the men are returned to Jackson.

Very respectfully,

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

E. D. FROST,
General Manager N. O. A. L. & C. R. R., New Orleans, Louisiana.

OCTOBER 4.

SIR: Yours of the 3d ultimo received. General orders are issued for the militia of the State to enter active service; your offer will receive due consideration.

Very respectfully,

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

W. R. STEWART, Esq.,
Kirkwood, Mississippi.

OCTOBER 1.

SIR: Can you furnish five thousand (5,000) rations of pork or bacon and bread under the authority granted by the Secretary of War for the militia of this State? If possible, ship immediately to William Noonan, superintendent State penitentiary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

The COMMISSARY OF SUBSISTENCE,
Department of the Gulf, New Orleans, Louisina.

SEPTEMBER 2.

SIR: I am directed by his excellency the governor to transmit the inclosed duplicate requisitions for ordnance and ordnance stores on the quota of the State of Mississippi.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. PACKER, Adjutant-General.

Brigadier-General S. V. BENÉT,
Chief of Ordnance, Washington, D. C.

SEPTEMBER 27, '5.

D. APPLETON & CO.,
Broadway, New York, N. Y.:

At what price will you furnish one hundred copies Upton's Infantry Tactics and ten sets of copies of the three different arms? Answer.

A. G. PACKER,
Adjutant-General Mississippi.

SEPTEMBER 27, '5.

Brigadier-General S. V. BENÉT,
Chief of Ordnance, Washington, D. C.:

Can you furnish fifteen hundred haversacks on our quota? At what price? Please answer.

A. G. PACKER,
Adjutant-General Mississippi.

Can there be any doubt of the object and intent of this correspondence?

These warlike preparations so made by the governor of the State were not only known to the citizens, but created in the minds of the colored population the belief that all the powers of the State were to be arrayed in behalf of their political party, and brought upon the whites the conviction that they were to be placed not only in great danger of losing their political liberties, but also their lives and those of their families. The condition of feeling created by such a belief cannot be justly estimated and considered in the calm security of a committee-room as in the seclusion of a country home where a planter resides, far distant from any white neighbor, too far for the cry for help to reach any friendly ear, and knows that he is surrounded and fearfully outnumbered by men of a different and antagonized race, a race which, while possessing many amiable and placid virtues, is yet highly animal in its organization, and, once becoming infuriated, will, as history has shown, be capable of brutal excesses which their reasoning powers are entirely unequal to control.

As a result of Ames's threatened organization and arming of the black militia, the threats of the blacks multiplied. Their habit of meeting was always at night, surrounded by the mystery of darkness and the refusal to allow white people to take part in their assemblies, page 547:

THE STATE MILITIA.

Question. Was there apprehension in the minds of the white people in Mississippi, growing out of the organization of the negro militia by Governor Ames?

Answer. Yes, sir; a very grave apprehension. This militia was organized some time after the Clinton riot. These companies that were at Clinton that ran off from the scene of action, the most conspicuous members of the Clinton riot, were taken to Jackson and were organized into military companies by Governor Ames, and guns placed in their hands and sent back to their homes. They said they were afraid to go back; but those who were afraid to go back had taken a very active part in the riot, and in staying away they induced others to stay, because they knew that if they should go in that capacity the governor would be pretty apt to put them in military companies, and they would go back home with their guns, draw the pay of $16 a month, which was just as good as they could do at work at home; and of course quite a number of the most ruffianly fellows were organized into this militia, and they came down to our place.

Q. Now, as a fact, in your county were the white companies that you speak of, such as you commanded, organized subsequent to the negro organizations you have spoken of?

A. Yes, sir; we never thought of organizing until we found the negroes organized and drilling at night for some purpose which we could not tell, as no white men could get in among them. They were drilling and were organized all over the county before any movement took place on the part of the whites.

Their political consolidation is shown by every witness to have been complete and that so organized they were wholly and helplessly in the hands of the few white adventurers who were their absolute political owners. On this point see the testimony of Mr. Walton, the present United States attorney in Mississippi, at pages 49-50:

ORGANIZATION OF THE BLACKS.

Question. What is the nature of the organization, so far as you know, among the colored people?

Answer. Well, sir, it is one of those cases which, in my judgment, arises always out of the existence of a class of people who are ignorant and who are comparatively helpless in the presence of a much more powerful body of people who, although they may not be stronger in point of numbers, are stronger in point of force and intelligence. The negroes consequently herd together. They do so publicly, and they do so more especially in secret. That is to say, there is a silent organization, existing not professedly as an organization, but existing still, in point of fact, everywhere that I have ever been, which prevents the intercourse between the two races from being candid and free.

NO MUTUAL CONFIDENCE BETWEEN THE RACES POSSIBLE.

I am, myself, very well acquainted with negroes; I have always been in the habit of dealing with them a great deal; I have always worked a good many of them; and I must say that my intercourse with them has been of a character to make me believe it impossible for anything like mutual confidence on political questions to arise between the white people and the negroes. I don't see how it ever can arise, and I do not believe, myself, that it ever will I think this is due to the enormous gulf between the races in all social relations—that confidence which springs from personal friendships and an unrestrained social intercourse being, in my judgment, an essential cement to a political party, and being absolutely out of the question, between the white and black races.

Q. You speak of an organization among the negroes; what do you mean by that; that they are organized in bands, under the command of any particular persons, or that they are associated together from the fact that they are of the same race and community of interests, or both?

A. They are not organized in bands.

Q. Or in companies, under officers, and having a general head?

A. Well, in the first place, they have their clubs, just as any other political organization has its clubs. I have never been inside of one of their clubs, but then they never have asked me, though the clubs were republican in their name, and republican, I suppose, in their character. They have generally acted in such a way as to leave me to believe that they did not want my presence there. Although they are quite near my house, I have entirely abstained from going there. And when the county conventions would meet, I have observed that the negroes in these conventions very strongly resisted white influence, and consequently it became disagreeble, inasmuch as there was such disposition, to the white people to have anything to do with these conventions. It became unpleasant personally, and it produced an impression which it was hard to avoid. I have always found it practically impossible for me to avoid it: the impression that these meetings meant nothing but the organization of one race against another. The truth is that a white man, especially a southern white man, belonging to the republican party, does not seem to be any more acceptable as one of their counselors or advisers than one who belongs to the opposition. Although my connection with the republican party has been undeviating, and I believe I have escaped from any personal reproach in that connection, I am quite certain that my personal influence with the negroes is not a bit greater than that of any democrat in my county; not a particle. I am quite certain that I was never able to influence a vote or influence a colored man on any single question of politics; which I confess with some mortification.

Governor Ames seemed disposed to fan the flames of excitement and antagonism to their utmost height. As an illustration of this it was desired to transport some arms and munitions of war from Jackson to Edwards's Station, between which points a railroad was in operation; but Governor Ames sent these arms, convoyed by a negro militia company, fully armed, in command of Caldwell, a colored State senator, to march through the country with drums and flags and all the pomp of war, having no other result than to intensify the alarm already existing. (See Barksdale's testimony, page 472.)

Mr. Johnston, in his testimony at page 334, says, in regard to this and other acts of Governor Ames:

"On all hands and from all classes of white citizens I heard but one expression in reference to this militia, which was that it was intended by Governor Ames to use that militia to bring about a collision of the races, and the expression was used that it was his ultimate purpose to afford a good pretext for getting United States troops here to carry the election."

The result of such a course of action was made manifest all over the State wherever the negroes existed in superior or approximate numbers to the whites. The citizens of Canton, in Madison County, turned out and picketed their town for weeks at night before the election. (See testimony of ——, mayor of the city, page —.)

White men were afraid to let their families remain in their houses in the country, (see testimony of Captain William A. Montgomery, page 553:)

Question. You do not live under any apprehension of their injuring you, do you?

Answer. Well, for myself I will tell you; when I have seen my neighbors running off, and have sent my family away, I have staid right in my own house on my place; but I must say that I had apprehensions. If left alone I would never have been afraid of them; but I knew that there was something brought to bear upon them from the outside, and they might not be able to resist the temptation.

Q. How many years have you been living at your present place?

A. Always—since I was nine years old.

Q. Some of those negroes were on the place before the war and remain there now?

A. Nearly all.

WITNESS AND OTHER WHITES LIVED IN FEAR OF ASSASSINATION.

Q. You mentioned that you had lived in fear of assassination from the negroes?

A. Yes, sir. I never stated that exactly—that I lived in fear of assassination; I said my fears were aroused sometimes. Senator BAYARD asked me if I was afraid, and I said that sometimes my fears were so strongly aroused that I sent my family off, but I staid there myself.

Q. You may have stated that the people were living in fear of assassination—your neighbors perhaps; was that what you meant?

A. Yes, sir.

and evidence of this state of feeling will be found multiplied throughout the testimony.

The apprehensions of both races thus excited grew to fever heat, and a condition of affairs absolutely alarming to the stoutest hearts prevailed all over the State of Mississippi, and at last penetrated the mind of Governor Ames himself. His plans had worked but too well. He had conjured up a spirit of despair and anxiety upon the part of the unhappy people over whom he had been placed in rule which threatened to wrap that State in flame and blood. It was no thanks to him or his advisers that this result was not reached at the time or preceding the election in November, 1875. From every quarter evidences reached him of this state of affairs. He had never conciliated the people. He had never sought to learn how far concession, and justice, and kindness, and sympathy, and a recognition of their tastes, prejudices, and habits would go toward procuring good government among a people. He threatened to restore Morgan, the sheriff of Yazoo County to his place by force of armed militia; and the troubles in that county, which led to the killing of several colored republican leaders, the demoralization of the republican forces, and their practical abandonment of the canvass, are directly traceable to the threat of an armed military expedition organized by Ames to replace Morgan by force in the sheriff's office, then held by another white republican.

The arming of the citizens of Yazoo County, their organization into companies, under the lead of their most conservative and respected citizens, in some of which white republicans were enrolled, was for the avowed purpose of resisting the approach of the colored militia of Ames, intending by force to replace Morgan, the slayer of Hilliard, in the office of sheriff. When once a condition of desperation and excitement has been created in any community, it is in vain to look for the rule of peace and law. The perturbing force that breaks down one law or the law destined for the protection of one man or one class of men in a community necessarily levels all law. It is like a fire which consumes all in its path. When, therefore, responsibility is to be affixed, shall we seek the cause or content ourselves with describing consequences only? Governor Ames had, either ignorantly or willfully, built up a condition of animosity and antagonism between the white and colored people of the State of Mississippi dangerous to the safety and peace of both, until excitement had usurped the place of reason, and force, with its remedies, had in some few localities taken the place of law.

There is no evidence that Governor Ames sought to exercise any of the civil powers intrusted to him for the pacification of these disordered localities. As usual, his recourse was had to the armed power of the Federal Government, and his correspondence with the Attorney-General and Secretary of War are well known to the Senate and the country. Failing in establishing, and being unwilling to allege, that condition of affairs within the State of Mississippi which alone under the Constitution of the United States authorizes the armed intervention of the Federal Government, the scruples of the President and his legal adviser, Mr. Pierrepont, withheld troops from the aid of the republican party in Mississippi. At page 2 of Governor Ames's testimony he testifies as follows:

"In view of that state of affairs I applied to the President of the United States for the protection of the United States, which was not granted. Subsequently, the Attorney-General, I presume at the suggestion of the President, sent an agent and two detectives at my request."

We may pause here to consider this new feature in American government. There is no such power known to the Constitution or laws of the United States as the employment by the Attorney General of the United States of detectives to inquire into and report the police condition of an entire State. The governor of the State confessed by his application that there was no one capable and sufficiently reliable to judge of and report upon the true condition of affairs in his own State; and three men, entire strangers to the people of Mississippi, were sent among them to examine and report whether a state of affairs existed which would authorize the interposition of the Federal Government by force of arms in the local disorders of that State. What possible authority can be urged for this attempted delegation of the highest discretionary power vested in the executive of a State?

About the 9th or 10th of October, Mr. Chase arrived in Mississippi, and took up his abode in the gubernatorial mansion with Mr. Ames. He has been examined as a witness before the committee, and his testimony will be found at page —. Whatever may be the opinions of the irregularity of his mission and its want of constitutional or legal warrant, all well-meaning men will concur in a sentiment of satisfaction that he was sent. He states that he found the State of Mississippi in a state of profound and dangerous excitement, the two races armed, ready and liable to collision at any moment, the State administration totally without influence or power to restrain the passions of either side. He discovered that the governor of the State had not even a personal acquaintance with the leading and most influential white citizens who were leaders of the democratic and conservative organization, and his first effort was to bring them into amicable council and personal acquaintance with each other. (See page —.)

The result of his offices was to produce an agreement anomalous in American history and highly suggestive of the state of affairs into which Governor Ames's maladministration had brought the State of Mississippi. There was a committee of the leading white citizens of Hinds and some of the adjoining counties held on the 16th of October, 1875, to whom Mr. J. Z. George and others, who had just had an interview on the subject of political affairs with Governor Ames, stated the result of such interview, that he had received information that it would be agreeable to his excellency Governor Ames to have a conference with some of the citizens of the State in relation to the present condition of affairs, and in accordance therewith he had arranged for an interview, which had just taken place. The citizens attending were Joshua Green, D. Shelton, E. Richardson, J. W. Robinson, H. Hilzheim, T. J. Wharton, Frank Johnston, J. C. Rietti, Robert L. Saunders, General Robert Lowry, W. L. Nugent, and J. Z. George.

The interview had been full and frank on the part of the citizens and the governor, and the governor announced to the committee that in consequence of Colonel A. T. Morgan's refusal to go back to Yazoo County, he had abandoned the purpose of sending him there with two companies of militia, one white and one colored, which had been his original purpose, and that he had also countermanded an order for guns to be shipped to De Soto County.

After this a conference ensued between the citizens and the governor in relation to the disbanding of the militia. The citizens, in response to fears expressed by the governor that peace and good order would not be preserved, and that colored men would not be permitted to vote as they pleased, assured the governor that there was no other desire among the whites than that peace should be preserved, the laws enforced, and a fair election had; that the leading whites had all along inculcated this; and they also assured the governor that they would pursue this course until the election, and would, both by precept and example, do all in their power to preserve peace and good order and secure a fair election.

The governor said his whole object in calling out the militia was to preserve order and suppress disturbances; that he was originally opposed to arming the militia, and under all the circumstances as he deemed it was forced to do so; that in view of the statement of citizens he was willing to meet their views as far as he could, and to this end he promised that he would order all the militia companies which had been organized to disperse and go to their homes with their arms. But on further consultation it was agreed that the arms of the several companies organized should be deposited in depots in the neighborhood in which the companies were raised, and should there be guarded by United States troops to be detailed for that purpose, and to be under the control of the governor, and to be removed only by his orders; or, if United States troops could not be gotten, then the arms were to be guarded by men selected and agreed on by the governor and Mr. George; that the arms should not again be delivered to the militia except in case of riot or insurrection which could not be suppressed by the civil authorities. The citizens above named expressed themselves satisfied with the arrangement. After this report and some discussion, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the foregoing citizens and also the following additional gentlemen, to wit, Messrs. William A. Montgomery, E. W. Cabinis, T. C. Catchings, George G. Manlove, A. M. Harlow, Colonel Gilbrath, Dr. Moore, and Judge Chester, be requested to go to Governor Ames and tender the thanks of the meeting for what he has done, and represent to him that it would be better and more satisfactory if he would agree that all the arms should be guarded in Jackson."

The committee waited on Governor Ames, and he declined making any change of the arrangement which had been agreed upon between him and the citizens. He was asked if arrangements with the citizens included the idea that no more militia would be organized. He answered, "that nothing was said on that subject expressly, but it was his purpose and intention to organize no more."

The committee returned to the meeting and made report of the second interview, and what was done was deemed satisfactory, and the meeting then adjourned after requesting the report of the interviewers with the governor to be reduced to writing and made public.

The effect of this agreement or, as it has been constantly termed by the witnesses, "treaty of peace," was highly favorable to a better condition of things, and did much to allay the excitement and political antagonisms which were so rife at that period. Some of the results of this conciliatory course were shown by the nomination of joint committees by the two parties in several of the counties upon the fair basis of compromise and good government. Men of character, republicans and democrats, were thus placed upon the same ticket in Madison County and in other counties, and, as a consequence, no further collisions of a serious nature took place during the remainder of the campaign and including the day of election. The election day itself was marked by an absence of even the usual personal collisions which take place in almost every community in the United States when party excitement runs high.

An answer to the general allegation that voters were intimidated from casting their votes is to be found in the pregnant fact that the republican vote in the State of Mississippi in 1875 was within 3,291 of the vote polled at the last preceding general election in 1873. (See election tables in the testimony of Governor Ames at pages 37 and 38, and documentary evidence of the committee, page 144.) The combined vote of Ames and ALCORN for governor, in 1873 (see page 138 of documentary evidence) was 126,378, and the total vote of both parties in 1875 was 155,886, showing an increased total vote throughout the State of 29,508.

It is abundantly established that for the first time since 1868 the democratic-conservative party was perfectly united and thoroughly and well organized, and conducted their campaign with an unprecedented interest and vigor. The republicans, on the other hand, were, as we have shown, disorganized and discouraged by schisms in their party, many of them, black and white, thoroughly disgusted with the conduct of their rulers, and, to use the language of Judge Harris, heretofore cited, were convinced of the "imbecility and base corruption of the State administration and a few adherents."

There can be no doubt also that a considerable and encouraging inroad was made in the heretofore impenetrable phalanx of the colored vote, a considerable portion of which was cast for the democratic ticket in Hinds County, the official residence of Governor Ames himself, as well as in many other counties, which reasonably and fully accounts for the increase in the democratic vote and the changes. Increase and changes in vote even more remarkable can be found in the election returns of the States of Massachusetts, New York, and Indiana, not to mention other States, in the election of 1874.

The whole number of witnesses examined by the committee was ————. Their testimony relates to twenty-two counties, leaving fifty-one counties in the State in regard to whose affairs no fact of any character was alleged before the committee. Of these twenty-two counties the chief portion of the testimony related to Warren, Hinds, Monroe, Chickasaw, Madison, Lowndes, Claiborne, Amite, Yazoo, and Washington.

Warren County.—Warren County, which contains the city of Vicksburgh, is one of the most populous and wealthy in the State, having a white population of —— and a negro population of ——. There were —— witnesses examined in relation to the affairs of this county, which may be summarized as follows:

That which gave rise to most turbulence and disorder in the spring of 1875 in the county was the contest between Bedford, the white deputy of Crosby, the negro sheriff and Flanagan, a democrat, both seeking to obtain the nomination of the republicans and the indorsement of the republican convention. (It will be remembered that Flanagan was the person whom Ames displaced by force of arms from the office of sheriff in 1874, and by the same process re-established Crosby, whom the citizens had rejected. This gave rise to the "Vicksburgh riots," which were fully investigated and reported upon by a committee of the House of Representatives.) In the course of the contest to obtain this nomination there were several homicides committed by the respective partisans of Flanagan and Bedford, and there would seem little doubt that Flanagan's nomination by the republican convention was in a large degree influenced by terrorism.

The cases of homicide were —— and one of wounding.

In all of these cases indictments have been found and prosecutions commenced. The perpetrators of these crimes were known and have been arrested and held to bail to be tried in due course of law, and it is to be hoped will be duly punished. These crimes did not differ in their nature or their facts from such as are incident to any illy governed community, and their parallel can be found too frequently in the lower strata of politics in many of the northern cities. There is, however, no trace of testimony which can be justly relied upon to connect the commission of these crimes with the democratic organization or its objects The respectable men viewed these crimes in Mississippi with the same abhorrence they are viewed elsewhere.

The election in Warren County in November, 1875, was characterized by the grossest frauds, and it seems impossible that such should not have been the case, when the character of the men deliberately selected to control the entire machinery of election is made known. The three registrars of election into whose hands the absolute control of the entire election was committed were appointed by the circuit judge, the chancellor, (both republicans,) and sheriff of the county, respectively. The chief registrar was a man named Knaedler, republican. He was selected by Circuit Judge Brown Barber, republican, the second registrar, was selected by Chancellor ——. Pegram, democrat, the third registrar, was selected by Bedford, Crosby's deputy sheriff. The characters of these three men were simply infamous, and notoriously so

The judge who selected Knaedler had presided at his trial and sentenced him to imprisonment for life for willful murder in the spring of 1875. A writ of error had been allowed by the supreme court, pending which Knaedler was admitted to bail, was appointed chief registrar of the county of Warren, and received a free pardon for his services at the election at the hands of Lieutenant-Governor Davis (colored) a few days after the election. (See page — of testimony.) He admits that a thousand dollars was promised, of which $500 was paid, to compensate him for the loss of his "business" in performing the duties of registrar, the pay of $3 per day being insufficient. Barber was under indictment at the time of his appointment by Chancellor ——— for highway robbery; and Pegram was a notorious professional gambler of a very low grade, against whom indictments were also pending.

The testimony of a dozen witnesses discloses the strong probability, if not the absolute fact, that these custodians of popular rights, by their manipulation of the tally-lists and returns and stuffing of the ballot-boxes of the entire county, procured a return as if elected of a pre-arranged ticket, composed partly of republicans and partly of democrats. (See page — of testimony, deposition of ——,) This ticket contains some names on the regularly nominated tickets of the democratic and republican parties, but other names which were not in nomination by either party, among whom is H. C. Carter, a colored man, who is now a republican member of the Legislature. The ticket so returned as elected was styled by the witness the "bogus ticket," and was proven to have been printed on paper of a peculiar hue, but precisely the same as the paper of the regular republican ticket, the typography and ink of both tickets being also precisely similar. It was proven (see deposition of —— Richardson, page —, a republican,) that the committee to procure tickets consisted of W. W. Edwards, colored, and ——, colored, who went to New Orleans to have the tickets printed, and brought them back.

The identity in outward apppearance between the "bogus ticket" and the regular republican ticket leaves little room to doubt that they were printed at the same time, on the same press, on the same paper, under order of this republican committee. Of the time and place of stuffing the ballot-boxes and altering the tally-lists by the election officers there is no conclusive proof; but there can be no doubt that a wholesale fraud was committed, and that a ticket not voted for in the county was returned as if elected. There was testimony by Barber that some money was found in the ballot-boxes when opened, which Pegram put in his pocket.

It may be mentioned that the circuit judge, Brown, was a candidate for nomination by the republican convention for Congress at the time he appointed Knaedler chief registrar. He and the chancellor were both appointees of Governor Ames, who held in his hand power to remove either of them. He could have done so, and could have canceled the appointments of these three infamous registrars; but the political rights of the people of Warren county were thus put up for sale through the agency of the republican State administration, and being for sale, we presume, they fell, as usual, to the lot of the highest bidder. The laws of that State establish penalties for such offenses, and the execution of the law rests wholly in the hands of the State administration. Shall the community who are the sufferers of such misgovernment be made the victims of congressional assault because of a misfortune against which they have vainly protested and for which they have no just responsibility? It will perhaps be considered a curious spectacle and a strange method of ascertaining the true state of facts in a community, when such confessed scoundrels as Knaedler and Barber are brought as witnesses to impeach the community which has the misfortune to contain them, and in which they had been placed in power by the very party who now seeks to denounce those who are the victims of their crimes.

A large number of colored men were brought to show personal intimidation, as practiced toward them in the county of Warren, but the establishment of the fact that fraud was successfully used would render intimidation useless and absurd.

Madison County.—Madison County has been the subject of extended investigation, and an examination of the testimony of Captain Ross, (page —,) the republican sheriff; Judge Cunningham, republican circuit judge, (page —;) Judge Campbell, of the supreme court, (page —,) —— chancellor, and numerous other witnesses of the highest personal and official character, must establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the election of the ticket formed by amicable compromise and agreement between the executive committees of the respective parties was perfectly fair, lawful, and peaceable. The address of the republican county committee, after the formation of the compromise ticket, which is appended to the testimony of Mr. Warren, republican, (page —,) will show the practical nature of the compromise, and of the eleccion that was held under it. The ticket so elected by an overwhelming majority was composed of men entirely worthy and capable in the offices for which they were chosen.

Question. Was there any intimidation resorted to to compel the creation of the fusion ticket?

Answer. Not the slightest that I ever knew or heard of.

Q. Was it, to your knowledge, a voluntary action of the leaders of the two parties for the purpose of procuring good men in the county?

A. That was certainly my understanding; there was a further object, I doubt not. I know I urged that. There was a very feverish state of the public mind. The Clinton affair had occurred, and the Warren County matter, and some disturbances in Yazoo, and every sensible man of both parties thought there was a possibility, in the feverish state of the public mind, of a disturbance being precipitated by imprudence or accident. I suppose every one of us was desirous to preclude the possibility of any disturbance on election-day. I think I was, and I suppose every one was.

Q. Without its being precisely alleged—I cannot, not having the notes before me, say—but without its being precisely alleged, there has been before this committee, from the witnesses, intimation that there was intimidation practiced to induce the formation of the fusion ticket, and I ask you, as a party to the compromise, whether that was true or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The statements, to my mind, have a different construction; not that intimidation was for that purpose, but that there had been intimidation and outrages in the district, which made the republicans prefer a compromise rather than take the risk.

Mr. BAYARD. Just consider that interrogatory with the correction of the chairman. I would like the chairman, or members of the committee, to make any correction when I fail to state the testimony accurately.

A. I certainly never had an idea that there could be a pretense that there was even a semblance of intimidation in Madison County. I remember when I saw an account of the appointment of this committee, or the proposition of Senator MORTON to appoint it, I felt, and I remarked at the time, that there certainly would not be anything to investigate in Madison County, for if there was any semblance of intimidation prior to that time I was ignorant of it; I never heard of it.

Q. Did or did not the leading republicans of the county oppose the Warner ticket?

A. I am not able to say about that.

Q. After the compromise I speak of?

A. I think the compromise, or fusion ticket, was almost unanimously supported.

Q. Were you present on the day of the election?

A. I was at Canton.

Q. Was there, to your knowledge, any interference with the right of voting, by anybody, at any time?

A. There was not. There were more democrats opposed to the fusion than republicans. As well as I could ascertain, there was a minority of the democratic party opposed to the fusion, that warred against it, and condemned it bitterly; extreme men and violent men, who didn't want to have any treaty with the republican party at all; yet, at the same time, the compromise had an overwhelming majority of democrats; five-sixths, I should think, cordially approved it, and a greater proportion of the republicans. I never heard of any dissatisfaction on the part of the republicans, except at Jackson.

Q. That is not in the county?

A. No; but Warner, from Jackson, it is understood, tried to distribute straight-out republican tickets, or the old tickets, and thus defeat the fusion.

There is a large amount of absurd testimony by negroes in relation to the affairs of this county; but the testimony of gentlemen of both the political parties to which we have referred, and which is to be found on pages ——, will set at rest any question as to the legality and propriety of the election in that county.

Hinds County.—Hinds County contains the capital of the State. The only alleged disturbance of any moment in Hinds County was the Clinton riot, of which we have heretofore given a full statement. With this exception no one has ventured to attest a single act of intimidation or violence. It was the official residence of Governor Ames, who himself stated, on page 29, that he was not a witness of any act of violence or intimidation; and a dozen witnesses have affirmed without the slightest contradiction that the election was entirely peaceable and lawful, with the free right of every one to vote as they saw fit.

ASSAULT UPON THE GOVERNOR'S MANSION.

At pages —— will be found the depositions of several colored men who were employed as watchmen around the governor's mansion for weeks before the election. Their statements as to the firing upon the mansion is not only disproved by Ames himself, (see page —,) but is incredible from the fact that no pane of glass was broken by the alleged bullets, nor does any mark appear upon the exterior of the mansion, nor was any one hurt at any time.

Mr. Barksdale, at page 475, disposes of this ridiculous charge

ABOUT THE GOVERNOR'S MANSION BEING FIRED INTO.

Q. Some witnesses have been before this committee—colored men—who have stated that the governor's mansion has been an object of attack, and I would like to state to you here what Governor Ames said on the subject:

"Q. (By the CHAIRMAN.) Did you, at any time, receive threats or intimations of bodily harm to yourself?

"A. As I stated yesterday, no attempt has ever been made to intimidate me personally. Of course no person ever came to me and said that if I did thus and so, certain consequences would follow; but the mansion where I live was fired into.

"Q. (By Mr. BAYARD.) At what time?

"A. Just previous to the election.

"Q. (By the CHAIRMAN.) During the day or at night?

"A. This was at night. I may say, however, that I did not, at that time, consider myself in any personal danger; I did not think that they could well afford to assassinate me. I thought it would be too great a political blunder, so I really had no feeling of that kind; but since then I have been informed that the thing was seriously considered. People were seen firing into my mansion, and the trees were cut. There is a bullet-hole or two in various parts of the mansion."

Q. This testimony, some of it at least, referred to the democratic conservative meeting which was held here, in the city of Jackson, on the 27th of October, just before the election.

A. Well, I will state that previous to that meeting, when it was known there would be a great crowd of persons, inspired by the enthusiasm of the canvass, when there would be banners, music, and all that sort of paraphernalia which gives interest to a political canvass, and it was determined by the democratic authorities that no device, no flag, no banner, and no thing should appear in that procession, or in the proceedings, in any way to cast ridicule or wound the sensibilities of Governor Ames.

A treaty of peace had been established, as it was called, between him and the democratic authorities, and it was felt that it was due to him that there should be no exhibition of that sort.

DEMOCRATS WATCHFUL THAT NO INDIGNITY SHOULD BE OFFERED TO THE GOVERNOR.

The consequence was, that we were especially watchful that no indignity should be offered to Governor Ames during that meeting or by the procession on the march.

Upon that principle, on the occasion to which reference is made I myself was anxious to see to it that no indignity should be offered to the governor, no hostile demonstrations of any kind, whether firing of guns or pistols, or making even jesting remarks, and I took a position, before the head of the column reached the mansion, directly in front of the office, that I might see what might occur. I remained there until the procession had passed.

I do solemnly aver that if any pistol was fired, or remark made reflecting upon the governor, or offering indignity to him, I did not see it, and I was in a position to hear and see whatever occurred, certainly.

As to the perforation of trees there by bullets, I suppose it could be verified by an examination, but I certainly heard no pistols. I took that position directly opposite the governor's mansion in order to see that the pledge of peace which had been made should be fulfilled and that no indignity should be offered to the governor, because we desired the agreement should be carried out.

Q. How far is the office where you were to the gubernatorial mansion?

A. About two hundred and fifty yards.

Q. You were near enough to hear any firing or any disturbance?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you constantly at your office during the next night and for a couple of weeks preceding the election?

A. I was occasionally, not constantly—frequently. Of course it is not my habit to remain, except on such occasions.

Q. Were you aware that for twenty days prior to the election, and two days afterward—I believe it embraced that—that Governor Ames had colored men stationed around his house as guards, inside of his fence?

A. I will say, personally I was not aware of it, but I heard it so stated.

NEVER HEARD ANY FIRING.

Q. Did you ever hear evidence, or have any knowledge or information, that there was constant firing at night toward the mansion during those twenty days?

A. No, sir; I never did. I am quite sure I should have heard it. I will remark that there is a police constantly on duty at all hours of the night on the streets to arrest any disturbance of that sort or anything of that kind.

Claiborne County.—Claiborne County was impeached by the testimony of one witness, E. H. Stiles, (page —,) which was controverted by the testimony of J. D. Vertner, at page 191. From special and moral causes there had been a great degree of excitement in this county preceding and entirely disconnected with the question of the election. The most conspicuous cause of excitement and feeling was the marriage of Haskins Smith, a colored man, with the daughter of his employer, Mr. William Smith, a hotel keeper in the town of Port Gibson. This colored man and white girl eloped. (See testimony of Mr. J. D. Vertner, page 191.)

Our campaign opened, I think, in the month of September, about two months before the election. Just prior to the opening of the campaign, however, an incident in no way connected with politics occurred, which produced a very bad state of feeling between the whites and blacks. It was not the marriage of a negro with a white woman so much as the incidents connected with it. There was such a marriage in the county, and while the white people took no part in it whatever, the parties being of humble origin and not in the society of the place, yet the father of the girl felt himself very much aggrieved, the boy having been reared in his family and brought up with the girl. The father was a desperate man, and he threatened to kill him. I myself overheard no such remarks on the part of the negroes, but a gentleman of respectability informed me that they had threatened to burn the town and wreak vengeance on the people if a hair of that negro's head was harmed by Mr. Smith.

Q. Smith was the father?

A. Smith was the father.

Q. State the names of the persons married.

A. The boy was a negro by the name of Haskins Smith. The girl was the daughter of William Smith, who kept the public hotel of the place. The boy, while a member of the Legislature, was a boot-black in the hotel and a waiter, and continued there during the time that he was in the Legislature, waiting on the table during the recess; and finally he ran off with this girl. It created some impression upon us, but of course was beneath our notice; but these remarks, which were said to have been made very publicly——

Q. You say the father of the girl was very much excited?

A. The father of the girl was very much excited and the mother has never recovered from the shock that she received at the time. The father in that exasperated state of feeling proposed to kill the negro whenever he returned. He was a very good negro and held in very good esteem by the white people. The negroes here, Haskins's friends, seeing him with a shot-gun, gathered around his hotel en masse. I saw myself the excited crowds that gathered there from day to day. They were absent during all this time—the man and woman who were married. The negroes made a great many threats, according to hearsay, but we paid no attention to them. One Sunday, about one week after the occurrence, the negro was brought back to the place by prominent negro leaders, among them the black coroner of our town, who is now in this jail, the leader of a band which has been sent to the penitentiary for burglary. They went down with carriages to bring the negro back. The negro protested against it, saying he had outraged the feelings of the family and preferred to remain where he was; but they took him by force and brought him into the village on a quiet Sunday, with four or five young men armed, and they paraded our streets up and down with this negro who had offended the feelings of this family in their midst; and then, not content with this, they followed our young ladies and went to our grave-yard where our parents are buried, and trod all around there and marched back.

THE WITNESS THREATENS THE COLORED PEOPLE.

I told the sheriff—a colored man—by the eternal gods, if ever again such a thing were repeated, blood was thicker than water, and we would kill the last son of a bitch; that if ever such insults were heaped upon us again we would not stand it. He told me that they started from the jail with side weapons, and that he expostulated with them to go back, and said that he had lost control of his people.

THE WHITES ARM.

We, seeing that aggressive spirit, and being insulted on the streets frequently, instantly called a meeting; it was totally disconnected with politics; and we armed ourselves thoroughly and completely; that is, the citizens generally. There were eighty of us with, perhaps, eighty guns.

PROPORTION OF THE RACES.

Q. State the proportion of the black population compared to the white in your county.

A. Our population is 20,000, I think, by the recent census. There are fully 3 to 1, if not a little more. I think there are about one thousand white voters—eight or nine hundred white voters—and about four hundred who have not been in the habit of voting until the last election.

That was the first event, disconnected with politics, but which brought about a very excited state of feelings in our midst. That was the occasion of our arming and nothing else; it was totally disconnected with any politics. There are two radicals who have always affiliated with that party in the town, who joined with us in this organization of men armed.

The excitement and disgust in the county became very intense, and the sympathy for the father of the girl was strongly manifested, all of which was greatly increased by the triumphal entry of this ill-matched couple into the town, and the procession by them and their colored associates throughout the streets of the place, including a visit to the cemetery, all of which seems to have aroused the indignation of the white people to the highest pitch. It being understood that the father of this girl had armed himself and intended to kill his daughter's husband on sight, plans for his destruction were arranged by the negroes, which plans becoming known to the whites, they armed themselves in opposition and for the protection of this injured parent. This event created an intense excitement, which continued up to the time of the political canvass.

There were but two witnesses, Stiles and Vertner, examined before the committee, and their statements are utterly variant.

There was upon the day of the election a race collision, in which an old colored man, disconnected with the quarrel, standing on the outside of the crowd, was shot and killed by parties unknown, and, as is testified, greatly to the sorrow of the white people, who buried him with every mark of respect and regret.

This unfortunate death, and the wounding—not seriously—of a few others, were the only acts of violence which marked the election, and the excitement consequent upon it having quieted down, the election went on regularly and without further disturbance. It was alleged by the witness, Mr. Stiles, (see p. —,) that in consequence of the disturbance in which this old man was killed, many colored men were intimidated, left the ground, and refused to vote; and although this is denied by Mr. Vertner at pages 201-203, and 204, yet the fact remains that the aggregate vote of the county as compared with the former elections was but slightly reduced.

Amite County.—Amite County was the scene of a great deal of disorder and alleged intimidation of voters. The colored population in 1870 was 6,777 and the white 4,196. According to the testimony of Mr. A. S. Parker, the defeated candidate for sheriff, there was a republican majority of about 300 votes. The disorders in this county were attested by W. B. Redmond, whose deposition is on page 73; H. P. Hurst, at page 86; A. S. Parker, at page 107.

Parker's testimony, at page 113, and Hurst's at page 99, concur in attributing the chief disorders in the county and breaches of the peace to the influence of one Colonel Frank Powers, whose residence is in the State of Louisiana, over the line.

Hurst says: "If Powers had staid away from Mississippi, I don't think there would have been as much trouble as there has been," and proceeds to describe the reckless and dangerous character of Powers, whom he also considers "the worst man and the chief cause of the troubles in Amite County." At page 101 he says:

(By Mr. BAYARD.) How many men in the State of Mississippi are the chiefs and ruling spirits of this condition of affairs down in the lower end of Amite County?

A. Well, it is not easy to say. I could not possibly tell you how many. I suppose if you picked out ten or fifteen of those desperate characters, the whole thing would stop. Yes, and I would go further than that, and say that, if Jackson and Powers were arrested, this whole thing would stop.

And in the next reply he classes Powers as the worst man and Moses Jackson as the next.

At page 113 Parker, in reply to a question by Mr. BAYARD "who this man Powers is, and what effect he has had in producing this condition of things in the county of Amite," describes him as follows:

"Colonel Powers during the war had commanded a regiment of cavalry that was called 'Buttermilk Cavalry' in our neighborhood. They were scouting and raiding around the country, and he had always a bad reputation for running cotton through the confederate lines. His reputation was, I think, very bad. He is a leader of what is called The Regulators, in the parishes of East Feliciana and Saint Helena. There have been a great many negroes killed through these counties; and they have killed some of the county officers at Clinton, in the parish of East Feliciana, and have run the rest away. Included in his organization were some men from Amite County, and they were in sympathy with him in getting rid of republican officers.

"The understanding was that, should they want Powers on our side of the line, they would call on him, and he would come prepared to assist them in doing anything they might require to be done. On this election day they sent for him. General Hurst asked Powers why he had come there, and he said that they had sent for him."

Further on he speaks of Powers as "the chief over the line in Mississippi," and in reply to the question whether he believed "that if Jackson and Powers were arrested and punished these things would cease," he says, "Yes, sir; I have no doubt of it."

These two and a colored man named Strother were the only witnesses examined in regard to the affairs of Amite County, and the only disturbance testified to on the day of election was at this precinct where Powers came; but the fact was established subsequently by two witnesses by the name of Weber, who were summoned from the parish of East Feliciana, whose depositions will be found at pages —— of the testimony, one a State senator and the other a tax-collector of the State of Louisiana, both republicans, and from them we have the information that Colonel Frank Powers is a republican office-holder by the appointment of Governor Kellogg, and has been acting with the republican party in Louisiana since 1870. It would seem difficult, therefore, to hold the white people and democrats of Amite County, in Mississippi, answerable for a disturbed and disordered condition of affairs which is proven by every witness examined in relation to Amite County to have been chiefly caused by a non-resident republican office-holder in Louisiana, under the administration of Governor Kellogg.

Despite the operations of Colonel Powers and his friends it would appear by the testimony of A. S. Parker, to be found on page 112, that a larger vote, both democratic and republican, was polled in Amite County at the election of 1875 than had been polled since the war. These disturbances were alleged at but a single precinct, and is the one visited by Colonel Frank Powers from Louisiana. The violence threatened to Raymond and Parker occurred since the election, but was instigated by the same condition of feeling which Powers represented, and which a moderately vigorous exercise of imprisonment and fine would speedily stop.

Washington County.—To impeach the character of the election in Washington County a witness by the name of Putnam was called. His testimony is to be found at page —. He does not allege any case of intimidation or violence of his own knowledge, but that the election was unfairly conducted by the inspectors at one of the precincts by unnecessarily delaying the reception of the votes. His allegations are specifically met and flatly contradicted by General William A. Furguson, one of the judges of election, whose conduct had been impeached by Putnam.

The deposition of General Furguson will be found at page —, in which the character of the election is fully and, as we believe, truly stated. The examination of Putnam will disclose him to be a thoroughly discreditable person. His confessions of a fraudulent and immoral life are alone sufficient to deprive him of credit; but the testimony of General Furguson, who is a gentleman of high character, supplements the statements of Putnam in regard to his own career. (See deposition of Putnam, page —, and deposition of General Furguson, page —.)

Washington County, by the deposition of —— and —— and ——, appears to have been the scene of more than unusual misgovernment. The relative population of the blacks to the whites was —— to ——, and as a result nearly every official was a negro. The present sheriff of the county, Scott, a colored man, who was called before the committee, did not in any degree impeach the peace and good order of the election. Greenville, in Washington County, was the home of Gray, the infamous negro who was appointed by Ames brigadier-general of militia. At page —, by the deposition of ——, the conduct of Gray and his immunity from all restraint of law is set forth as follows:

His character is likewise spoken of by Putnam. In short, we may here say that the picture of affairs presented by the negro rule in the county of Washington, as well as the adjoining county of Issaquena, fairly beggars description. Ninety-five per cent. of the property is owned by the whites, who constitute but a small portion of the entire population. All powers of local government are in the hands of the negroes, who select the people of their own race almost wholly to fill every office; boards of supervisors, utterly ignorant, incapable of reading or writing, unable to add or subtract or perform the simplest arithmetical problem, have entire sway over the taxes and property of the county. Their rule is arbitrary, and oftentimes insolent to an intolerable degree. At page —, deposition of Mr. Miller, will be found an account of the refusal of a board of negro supervisors to entertain or receive the humble petition of the white citizens of the county presented by a venerable and respectable white citizen for the privilege of having a white school established in the county where sixteen colored schools were already established, the expense, of course, to be borne by the property of the county, and even the poor privilege of having a portion of the taxes taken from their own lands applied to the benefit of their own children was insolently denied.

By Mr. BAYARD:

Question. Do you remember the occasion of this refusal of the board of supervisors to permit a petition for a white school to be presented to the board?

Answer. Yes, sir; I had been attorney for the board for quite a length of time. They had appointed me unanimously, these negroes had, and I remained in that position for some time, when I resigned my position something like over a year ago, on account of their reckless management and on account of the refusal to hear the whites in regard to schools, and so on. Right there at Mayerville there was a strong demand for a white school. There were some, I suppose, thirty or forty pupils, and they had no school-house. They had to employ a teacher, and they got a room wherever they could to teach in; and the people brought it to the attention of the board several times, and earnestly requested them to build a school-house there. The board went through the pretense of posting a notice for bidders. The law provides that the contract shall be let out to the lowest bidder. They posted two or three notices, and the bids were offered there by good mechanics to build a school-house at a good deal less than they had been paying for negro schools in various parts of the county. And they rejected the bids on the ground of extravagance, and old Major Smith came up there about two or three weeks before the meeting in which Gross was to be requested to resign, and made a request, politely requesting them to have the notice renewed. He was very anxious about this school-house, and that was the wish of the whole community. It was opposed by this man Gross. One or two members were anxious to build it. This man Gross was very offensive to Mr. Smith, and told him to sit down, he didn't want to hear him, and finally drove him away in his disgust and despair. That was one of the main causes which induced the people to request Gross to resign, in order to get a board, if possible, who would do justice. I suggested that the resolution should read this way: that since we had decided to ask him to resign, to request him to resign in favor of Robert Murkinson or Green Collins, or any other of several good negroes in the neighborhood who were also republicans. I will say that the suggestion met with a degree of favor, but we thought we would have no success. But I thought that if Gross could be got out and we could get a good republican upon the board it would be very well.

Q. You did not propose to replace him by a white man or a democrat, but to put some respectable colored man in his place?

A. That was the purpose of a good many, and that resolution met with favor, but it was not carried in that way. Some persons favored it, and if it had been insisted upon it would have been carried through that way. There was no race feeling.

Q. Were you present at the time when Gross insulted Major Smith?

A. I was, and left the board in disgust.

Q. What was Major Smith's demeanor in coming to him?

A. Exceedingly polite.

Q. He assumed nothing more than to urge the action of the board?

A. He asked that in a very earnest manner, but not at all offensive. Finally, when told to shut up and sit down, he said, "By God, I am a citizen and tax-payer, and have a right to be heard here," and went away disgusted, and I left also in utter disgust. I had business to attend to there, but I would not stay on account of it.

Q. By whom was the bulk of the school-tax paid?

A. By the land-owners; white people. The negroes do not pay over one-tenth.

Q. How many colored schools are there in the county?

A. A great many. They never refused any petition to build a colored school-house anywhere. They built them all over the county, and they had standing notices to build them.

Q. How many white schools were in the county at that time?

A. Only one that I know of, on Rolling Fork. In fact, that was not a school-house, either. They used the basement of the church. They rented it. It suited very well for that purpose; no objection to it on that account.

Q. How far was it from that school-house to the other school-house that they proposed to build?

A. About ten or twelve miles. That was the main cause of the request to Gross to resign.

A condition of affairs which would be incredible and utterly intolerable in any of the Northern States exists in many of the black counties of Mississippi, where the property, intelligence, and character of the community is trodden to the earth, insulted, and ignored by the most ignorant and sometimes vicious members of the community. Things are of daily occurrence, and were proven almost daily before the committee, which, if attempted in the State of Massachusetts, Wisconsin, or Iowa, or indeed any of the Northern States, would be met by a popular uprising and speedy overthrow. In such a condition of affairs, the forbearance and self-subordination exhibited by the white population demands and should receive the strong sympathy and high respect of every just and well-regulated mind. Page —, testimony of S. H. Gross, colored:

By Mr. BAYARD:

Question. How many members compose the board of supervisors?

Answer. Five members, sir.

Q. How many of them were colored people?

A. During my time of being in office it was all colored members until 1876.

Q. You mean up until the present year?

A. Yes, sir; they were all colored members from the time I have been a member up until the present year.

Q. All members of the republican party?

A. Well, I could not say they all were.

Q. You have been one of the board of supervisors of Issaquena County for the last three years—1874, 1875, and the present year?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Until when were these five men composed entirely of colored men; until what time?

A. Until 1876.

Q. The 1st of January?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Before that time they had nothing but colored men on the board?

A. They were all colored, right from the time of my being installed.

Q. How far from Mayerville do you live?

A. The nearest route is about five miles.

Q. That is the county seat?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did you first meet General Hampton?

A. In the town of Mayerville.

Q. Had you known him before?

A. O, yes, sir.

Q. Does he own property there?

A. He owns one plantation in that county.

Q. How far from Mayerville?

A. I could not give you the exact distance, but somewhere between four and five miles from Mayerville.

Q. On the river?

A. Yes, sir; on the river.

Q. When he met you did he speak to you?

A. Yes, sir: he spoke to me; that is, he sent for me.

Q. Sent a man for you?

A. Yes, sir; down the road for me.

Q. Be kind enough to state just what he said to you.

A. He said to me like this: says he, "Gross, I have heard a good deal of talk of you, and I have heard that you was a perfect gentleman, and was prompt to attend to your own business, and I heard of this trouble that has taken place, and I have come down here to-day on that occasion; and I want you now to call your board together and proceed to business. The river is rising"—this I didn't give in my former statement, but I omit that then—"the river is rising now very swift, and we want men on that levee board to go to work on the levee; therefore, we are very anxious for you to proceed to-day at once and make the appointments; and," he says, "I hope you will appoint good men." I think he said, "I have heard that they have asked you to resign; and" he said, "the good citizens of the county don't know anything about that, and we ain't in favor of any such doings as that."

Q. He said that the good citizens of the county were not in favor of interfering with you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And were not in favor of your resigning?

A. Yes, sir; he said if there was anything wrong about that he proposed for the law to justify that.

Q. Did he say anything in regard to protecting you in case of anything of the kind being attempted?

A. He said that he had been a general in the confederate army, and that he was not afraid to fight if he was called upon to do it. He did not say he would protect us, but the impression was that he meant to protect us that day.

Q. To protect you in your rights and in your office?

A. Yes, sir; that is the way I took the meaning of his words.

Q. He spoke to you kindly, civilly, and told you just what you have said to us?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you say anything to him after that?

A. No, sir; he did not appear after that.

Q. You had no molestation at all after that time?

A. No, sir.

Q. He told you that if there was anything wrong they would look to the law to remedy it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That he disapproved of this attempt to remove you from the board?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that the good people were opposed to that?

A. Yes, sir; that they were opposed to any such doings as that.

Q. Is not the maintenance of the levee along the banks of the river essential to the safety of the property of that county?

A. It is, sir.

Q. Is it a difficult and expensive thing to keep that levee in good and safe condition?

A. Of course, sir, it is.

Monroe County.—Monroe County lies upon the border of Alabama, toward the northeast corner of the State. The population consists of —— black and —— white. It is not alleged that any loss of life took place in this county in the canvass or election of 1875; but the defeated candidate for sheriff, J. W Lee, appeared before the committee and charged (see his testimony, p. ——) that the canvass had been marked with attempts at intimidation on the part of democrats, and that on the day of the election the colored voters, who had massed to the number of fifteen hundred in the town of Aberdeen under his orders, were, by a show of violence on the part of the democrats, intimidated and prevented from voting, and in that way the election was controlled against the republican party. Captain Lee's testimony was given circumstantially and at great length. (See p. ——.) In reply to him the committee examined Mr. T. B. Sykes, (see p. ——,) the mayor of the town of Aberdeen, and Mr. E. O. Sykes, (see p. ——,) who, by the testimony of Captain Lee, was principally implicated in the alleged disorder; also General Reuben Davis (see p. ——) and others. The weight of the whole of this testimony is entirely against the truth of Captain Lee's statement. It was proven that many of the occurrences which he alleged that he saw could not have been witnessed from the residence of the jailor, in which he had taken up his quarters. He is directly met and flatly contradicted by the most unimpeachable witnesses, and it is impossible, after reading his testimony and that of the gentlemen who were called to answer it, to doubt that the bitterness of Captain Lee's feelings toward his former political associates (for he had been a rabid secessionist and a violent democrat until the time of his commercial failure and his immediate acceptance of office in the republican ranks in 1870) must have perverted his judgment and blinded his understanding. It is impossible to escape the conclusion that Captain Lee anticipated defeat at the polls, and, as a last resort, to escape the results of the election, endeavored to throw discredit upon it by advising the negroes not to vote.

The testimony of several negroes who were examined at Aberdeen, among them ——, has been already referred to as proofs of the recklessness with which charges are made by that class of persons. The alleged gross profanity of the two Messrs. Sykes and the statements of General Reuben Davis, was not only emphatically denied by those gentlemen, but was so grossly inconsistent with their characters as pious and upright men as to be entirely unworthy of belief by any unprejudiced man. The citizens of the town of Aberdeen, in common with many others in Mississippi, had been kept in a state of constant alarm by the rumored arming and banding of the negroes of the county. The county of Monroe is intersected north and south by the Tombigbee River, the richer lands lying on the east side of the river and the poorer lands on the west side of the river, the eastern side being chiefly occupied by negroes, with a small relative white population. The testimony of Captain Sykes discloses the fact that great apprehensions were felt from time to time preceding the election of a rising of the blacks for the purpose of marching on the town of Aberdeen and destroying it; that incendiarism had been frequent and sufficient, in the excited condition of public feeling, to alarm them to an intense degree; that under these circumstances, to which must be added the organization and arming of the militia company in the community by order of Governor Ames, and the possession of those arms by Lee, the republican sheriff, the uneasiness and discomfort of the community had reached an extreme point.

The white citizens had on more than one occasion turned out and picketed the roads leading to their town, night after night, fearing the approach of a body of negroes armed for the destruction of the place. On the morning of the election, at break of day, these fears were confirmed by the presence in the town, at the court-house, of a large body of negroes from the eastern side of the county, all armed with heavy bludgeons and many of them with pistols. This was a violation of the election laws, which required voters to cast their ballots in the precincts where they resided, and only permitted a voter who was constrained to be absent from his home to cast his vote in another precinct by attaching to his ballot an affidavit stating the fact. But the presence of this large body of blacks, with sullen faces and armed with clubs, at a voting-precinct which was not a proper one for them to attend naturally alarmed the citizens of the town, who took the best steps they could for self-protection. A point much dwelt upon by Captain Lee was the presence of what he termed "a body of cavalry" from Alabama in the town. This body of cavalry was proven to consist of from eight to twelve men on horseback, who, if armed at all, were armed with pistols, which were not exhibited, and who were stationed between the county jail, wherein Captain Lee had a number of State arms and fixed ammunition, and which the white citizens feared he was about to place in the hands of the negroes whom he had brought from the east side of the county to take possession of the polls and prevent the whites from voting in the town of Aberdeen.

The whole action of these ten or dozen men on horseback was confined to remaining quietly, disturbing no man, at such a point as would prevent Lee from getting the arms out of the jail and delivering them to the negro mob at the court-house. The testimony will disclose the fact that not a blow was struck on that day, and that no man was injured and no one prevented in his lawful right to vote. No case was brought before us of any one who did not vote or could not vote if he had desired to do so. Under Lee's advice, many of the negroes who had unlawfully assembled at the court-house went back to their own precincts, and it is presumed that they there voted undisturbed. These facts, we believe, are fully established by the weight of testimony taken in regard to this election. That no material number of the vote was prevented from being cast by intimidation would appear from the fact that the aggregate vote polled in 1875 was two hundred and fifteen greater in the county than in the general election of 1873.

Lowndes County.—The only point in Lowndes County in relation to which testimony was taken was in the city of Columbus. The witnesses examined were the mayor of the city, Mr. ——, and Robert Gleed, a negro, ex-sheriff of the county, and a defeated candidate for re-election. The testimony of the mayor, which will be found at page —, is to the effect that there had been no evidence of intimidation or disturbance; that the republican party had been split, and that two republican tickets were in the field, therefore lessening the necessity for the resorting to intimidation, even if it had been sought.

A few nights before the election, just after nightfall, a fire was discovered in a remote portion of the town, and the fire apparatus gotten ready to extinguish it; but while the engines were proceeding to this fire, another fire was discovered in an opposite quarter of the town; and according to the testimony of Mr. —— and Mr. ——, the town appeared to be fired in seven or eight different places at once. The excitement instantly became intense. The rumors and apprehensions of incendiarisms of the negroes, founded upon remarks made by several of them of a threatening character, induced the belief that the community was on the verge of a great disaster, and a successful conspiracy to destroy the town by fire was about to be carried out. To protect the city and keep the peace the mayor appointed Mr. —— a special marshal for the occasion with authority to summon peace officers to his aid. The report of the marshal, as made to the mayor on the following day in writing, was presented to the committee, and is to be found on page —.

The substance of that report is that the marshal took semi-military possession of the town and prevented the free circulation of the people; that his orders were to halt any man who was not known, and if he did not obey, to shoot him. Witnesses testified that in this way they were halted, although well known in the community, and obeyed the summons. There was, however, excitement and feeling which was directed against the race which the believed had been the authors of this intended conflagration, which resulted in the shooting and killing of four colored men by the patrols established by the marshal. This was the case alleged by the mayor and the white citizens of the place, but, to some extent, denied by Robert Gleed, who alleged, or, rather, we infer from his testimony, that the object of the fires was to create a disturbance in which colored men could be intimidated or slain. It is certain that Gleed's family were kindly and hospitably entertained by the mayor himself on the night of the disturbance, and that Gleed was believed by many of the white citizens to have been the chief instigator of these incendiarisms and attempted destruction of the town.

The action of the city authorities cannot be considered unnatural or improper, under the circumstances. They immediately sought to increase the police force and prevent any lawlessness on the part of the white people, growing out of their excitement and apprehended destruction of their homes and lives.

It would seem impossible from so cursory and incomplete an examination as was hurriedly made by this committee to come at a perfectly clear and satisfactory judgment of the events on the night in question, in the town of Columbus, and the causes which led to them. On the one hand there is the terror of incendiarism which appeals to every householder, and which strikes fear into the boldest heart. Most of the dwellings of Columbus and other southern towns are composed of wood, and their water facilities and apparatus for extinguishing fires are generally of an inferior description. They knew that the negroes had been banded together in political hostility to the whites, and they had heard threats of incendiarism that placed them in great anxiety and distress. At 567, see statement of the lieutenant of Owen, the commander of the negro company captured at Vicksburgh:

"We got orders we should not go there; if we had not received these orders before night, I would have been there with my gun in one hand, a coal-oil can in the other, and a box of matches in my pocket."

How far these fears honestly actuated the mass of the people in the unusual steps taken for self-protection, there is not sufficient testimony before the committee thoroughly to determine, or how far such alleged fears were made by wicked and cruel men the pretext for an assault upon obnoxious colored individuals, or upon the colored people as a class, there is not enough testimony before the committee satisfactorily to determine. That the result of that night's proceedings ought to have been made, or ought still to be made, the subject of thorough and rigid examination no one can doubt; nor is it yet known what steps were taken to discover the true condition of facts and the causes of these fires which, from their number and scattered location, would seem clearly to evince a settled plan of incendiarism for some purpose, either to destroy the town or to give a pretext for a criminal assault. One thing may here be said, that if the atrocious design did exist of making that incendiarism the pretext for an onslaught upon the colored people at night, and where they were in large numbers, it would seem strange that the victims were limited to four in number, when their slaughter could have been so easily multiplied.

We have not classed this occurrence at Columbus with the four principal collisions between the races, because no political significance seemed to have been given to it, and the matter was mentioned late in the course of the investigation, only by three or four witnesses, and even they gave totally different theories for the occurrences of the night, and for the reason also that it did not partake of the nature of a riot growing out of any immediate quarrel or controversy between the two races. In the opinion of the undersigned, it was the result of sudden fury and excitement caused by terror of incendiarism, which, for the time being, deprived men of their self-control. Although no proof of the immediate facts attending the killing of any one of these four men was brought before the committee, the report of the marshal is more circumstantial than anything brought to our knowledge. No consequent intimidation is to be inferred from the condition of the vote; for the aggregate vote of 1875 is a very large increase over the vote of the election preceding.

ROLLING FORK COLLISION.

In December, 1875, in what is now Sharkey County—then a part of Issaquena—occurred a most deplorable and shocking tragedy. The affair was first brought to the attention of the committee by the testimony of Derry Brown and Bowie Foreman, (negroes,) whose turbulent conduct had caused them to be expelled from the neighborhood, and whose testimony was shown to be unreliable. (See testimony of Judge Shackleford as to the character of Foreman and of —— Miller, page ——, impeaching Brown.)

It seemed difficult to obtained a clear and connected narrative of the transaction, but the testimony of E. B. Ball, a republican, who emigrated to the State of Mississippi from the State of Illinois at the close of the war, and who resides in the neighborhood where the tragedy occurred, will fairly represent the state of affairs and feeling at the time, and the circumstances which led to it. (See pages from —— to ——, Ball's testimony; also the deposition of W. W. Moore at page ——, and of —— ——, page ——, corroborative of testimony of said Ball.)

It appears that on Saturday, the last of November, 1875, a number of negroes, not belonging to that part of the country, but who had been picking cotton, were paid off, and were engaged in a drunken frolic at Rolling Fork, a small town in what was then Issaquena County, now seat of Sharkey County.

A young white man, or boy, for he was not yet of age, who was drinking with them, got into a quarrel with one of the negroes, which ended by the white man striking the negro with a knife, and inflicting a wound of no dangerous character.

The boy fled and was pursued by the whole band of negroes, who finally discovered him in the back room of a store where he had secreted himself, and after stabbing and otherwise wounding him, left him for dead.

On Sunday morning warrants were issued by a colored justice of the peace, residing at Rolling Fork, for the offending parties, and in the course of the day five or six were arrested and placed under guard in a building then vacant, which had been occupied as a drug store. During the night the gun of one of the guards was discharged by accident, and the prisoners became alarmed and attempted to make their escape by breaking through the windows. They were fired upon by the guards, and one of them was killed and two or three were wounded. The wounded parties with one or two others were captured.

The next day all of the parties implicated in the assault on the young white man were recognized and gave bonds for their appearance at court and the difficulty seemed to be ended, but the news of the affair extended down into the neighborhood where Mr. Ball resided, and spread through the country with many exaggerations. The white people at Rolling Fork and vicinity were greatly outnumbered by the negroes in that locality, and the disproportion in the neighborhood of Mr. Ball and below there, on what was known as the Deer Creek settlement, was at least 10 to 1 of the colored people to the whites.

Bands of colored men were at once organized, and armed with such weapons as they could procure, threatening to attack and destroy the town of Rolling Fork, and to kill the white people, and, to use the language of some of their most excited leaders, "from the cradle up," and to burn cotton-gins, and to destroy property generally. Two of these bands—one under the leadership of a negro preacher by the name of Moses Johnson—started in the direction of Rolling Fork, but were turned back at Elgin's store by the firmness of Elgin and one or two white men who were there at the time. They returned from the neighborhood where they had started some few miles below Elgin's store, somewhat excited by liquor, and, as will be seen by the testimony of the said Ball, by no means inclined to give up their purposed destruction of the whites and their property.

The terror which their conduct inspired in that county among the few white settlers and their families is very graphically depicted by the witness Ball, as well as his own apprehensions because of his being a white man, notwithstanding the fact that he was a republican, and in political accord, and on terms of personal friendship with the negroes. (Insert Ball's testimony, p. —.)

News of this uprising and demonstration was carried back to Rolling Fork. Application was made by the white people there to their friends in Washington County and above for aid. A band of armed white men, from the upper counties, under the leadership of Rev. —— Ball, a Baptist minister, collected together and marched down to Rolling Fork, where, learning such facts as they could in reference to the disturbances below and the parties most deeply implicated, mounted an armed force of some fifty or seventy-five men on Sunday, and went down in the neighborhood where these turbulent negroes were assembled under arms, and captured and killed six of the most dangerous and violent of those concerned in the armed organization for the destruction of the property and lives of the white inhabitants.

This violent remedy promptly ended the conspiracy of the negro population against the whites and caused them to abandon any further prosecution of their hostile purposes.

A few days after the killing of these negroes a meeting took place between the leading white people at Rolling Fork and the leading and peaceably inclined negroes of the neighborhood, and a treaty of peace was signed by the parties, which has been incorporated into the testimony taken by the committee, and will be found on page — of ——.

Derry Brown, who before the tragedy occurred had been inclined to peace and quiet, became furious, and was unwilling to be reconciled except by the killing of six white men in retaliation for the six negroes, and was excluded from the terms of the amnesty provided in this treaty.

This ended the affair, and however reprehensible the entire transaction is, the undersigned could discover in it no trace of any political character. On the contrary, it was a war of races, having its origin in a drunken brawl between one white person and a number of dissolute and drunken negroes. The region in which it occurred lies remote from railway or other public modes of communication. The civil authorities of the neighborhood were wholly inadequate to cope with the emergency, and it was too sudden for the authorities of the State to be called into action.

INTERFERENCE WITH VOTERS.

Some of the testimony tended to prove that in some cases colored men were deceived or cajoled into voting the democratic ticket.

There is nothing in any part of the testimony to prove any obstruction to the voter "on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude," but in every case the objection was to the party ticket he proposed to vote; to the color of his political prejudices, and not to the "color" of his skin referred to in the fifteenth amendment.

The white people earnestly sought to induce the colored people to vote, and to vote the same way they did. To this end they held public meetings, made numberless speeches, appealed to their colored fellow-citizens in every conceivable manner that they should vote, and vote with them for the common interest of all.

To justify any legislation by Congress to enforce the fifteenth amendment, the obstruction of the "right to vote" must be for the sole reason of race, or color, or previous condition, &c., and there is no power in Congress to interfere for any other cause whatever. There is not from the beginning to the end of this testimony a single case of the obstruction of a voter because he was a colored man.

In every case of alleged unlawful interference with the right of suffrage, it was because the voter was in opposition to the political sympathies and wishes of the person interfering.

Intimidation and violence are almost as frequently alleged toward white men as colored men, and perhaps the bitterest opposition was proven toward the former class.

Yet it cannot be said that the race or color of these whites induced other whites to "deny and abridge" their right of suffrage.

The testimony of many witnesses, white and black, proved the gross intimidation of colored people by other colored people. Now, this was not on account of race or color, but for the same reason which caused all other intimidation and interference in the State—i. e., opposition to the voter's political views and actions—not because he was a colored man, but because he was voting in opposition.

The Supreme Court of the United States distinctly say, in the opinion, we have already cited:

"The fifteenth amendment did not confer the right of suffrage upon any one;"

It gave to the Congress the power to guarantee its exercise in case it should be denied or abridged on account of race or color or previous condition.

If the right to vote be denied or abridged for some other cause, the State, and not the United States, must exercise its protecting power over the citizen and remedy his wrong.

If a colored man be driven from the polls because he comes up with a republican ticket, and when he returns with a democratic ticket is welcomed and assisted to vote, there can be no doubt but his "right to vote" (which means, of course, to vote according to his free will) has been abridged; but not having been abridged because of his race or color, but because of his political views, the power and duty to remedy the wrong he has sustained are, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, in the laws of the State where he resides, and not in the United States.

Holding this proposition to be true, then the testimony overwhelmingly establishes the fact that negro voters were welcomed into the democratic ranks and every effort made to procure them.

If negroes were intimidated, it was not because they were negroes, but because of their obnoxious political views.

As a necessary consequence, it follows that Congress has no power under the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution to punish any invasion, however gross and reprehensible, of personal rights of suffrage which is not based upon the particular cause of the race, or color, or previous condition, &c., of the party injured.

Having thus stated the limitations upon the power of Congress, which a respect for the Constitution of our Government and to the decisions of its highest judicial tribunal has dictated, we cannot refrain from an expression of our abhorrence and hearty reprobation of every act of lawless and so often brutal interference with the rights of citizenship, which were related by witnesses in our presence.

Prosperity and happiness can never thrive in a community where such scenes of violence can be enacted without condign punishment. By a law higher than man's the "wages of sin is death," and it will be vain for the people of Mississippi to look for the advancement of their State to that position in the ranks of wealth, influence, and reputation which those who love her would desire to see her occupy, until the spirit of law shall be strengthened and assert itself over the "dangerous classes," who have brought disrepute upon her good name.

We are glad, in this connection, to express our sincere and profound conviction that under the present State administration and government of Mississippi all the elements for the needed reforms exist and will be developed, so that a remedy for every wrong will be surely found in laws ordained in a spirit of benevolence and justice to all classes within the borders of the State.

A vast majority of the people of Mississippi have every element that constitutes a good American citizen. They are law-abiding, peaceful, and industrious, and they have every impulse in favor of justice, peace, and order, and all they now need is the kindly sympathy of their fellow-citizens in other States in the great distress which war and a totally revolutionized condition of their social and labor systems, coupled with gross maladministration of their State affairs, have brought upon them.

They have been the victims of a misrule which they sought in vain to avoid or remedy.

In simple justice we ask, should the white masses of Mississippi be held responsible for the results of bad government, against which they have petitioned and protested in vain for years? Is it just to hold those responsible from whom all power has been withheld? The requisite means are always necessary for the desired end. In all the centuries the demand that the children of Israel should make bricks without straw has been cited as an illustration of tyrannical injustice; but is it not equally and even more unjust to demand of the white people of Mississippi the results of good government, when bad government has been fastened on them against their best efforts to prevent it, their entreaties, and their prayers?

Let them fully and fairly test their present opportunity to produce peace and order and prosperity by exercising their faculties for self-government.

The evils that have been enacted they were not justly responsible for, and their sufferings should call for sympathy, and not denunciation. Why should not this portion of our fellow-countrymen be made to feel that they have the rights as well as the responsibilities of that local self-government which is so freely enjoyed and jealously guarded by their fellow-citizens of the Northern States?

Is it consistent with justice, wisdom, or expediency to put the stigma of inferiority upon any State of the Union, by asserting a power and right to make inquisition in her management of those domestic and internal affairs which, by the express terms of the Constitution and by common consent and practice, are reserved to other States, which are never questioned in their control over them?

No attempt seems to have been omitted to bring the white people of Mississippi into ill-repute with their fellow-citizens of the North.

What, it may be asked, have the flags used at a political celebration to do with infractions of the fifteenth amendment? Yet the following testimony will exhibit the intent to create sectional prejudice against them, (see testimony of John T. Harrington, at page 233:)

NO AMERICAN FLAG, BUT TWO HUNDRED OTHERS.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Question. Were you at the West Point meeting of the democrats two or three days before the election?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see the flags exhibited there?

A. I think I saw two hundred flags, but no United States flag.

Q. What were they?

A. There were some very nearly—I cannot say if just exactly—like the confederate flag, and all sorts, shaking and waving. But I saw no United States flag. At the West Point meeting, up and down the streets on both sides for nearly a quarter of a mile, over both sides of the street, thirty or forty feet high, on the tops of the buildings.

By Mr. BAYARD:

Q. Did you walk along the whole of that street?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where were you?

A. I was at my office, and went from my office to the hotel where the district attorney was.

Q. Did you pass by and along this row of flags?

A. Well, I could see up the street.

Q. How far could you see? I think you said you had ophthalmia, or something, which prevented you seeing very far?

A. O, I could see. I cannot discriminate features half across the street. I could see these bars and colors.

Q. Did you see confederate flags at that meeting?

A. No, sir; I said flags resembling. They might have been like them. I do not know how many of these stripes they had on them. I do not know that they were full confederate flags. I know about the various colors and from the appearance of confederate flags which I have seen.

Q. Was there no United States flag, then?

A. I did not see any. I seen the particular ones. I think those on the courthouse, if any, United States flags.

Q. Did you walk along the entire line of the street where those flags were?

A. I did not walk along the entire line; I think near the lower corner, and looked up.

Q. That was the meeting at West Point?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When?

A. The Thursday before the election, I think. The election was the Tuesday following.

The answer to this miserable slander is to be found on page 253, in the testimony of Mr. R. H. Shotwell:

Question. Harrington stated here that there were no United States flags exhibited on the day of the celebration. What have you to say about that?

The CHAIRMAN. He did not state that.

Q. In order that we may know the facts, you may state what you discovered there. I thought that he stated that there was no United States flag, and he did say that there were flags that were very like confederate flags; and he left the impression, as I understand, and meant to leave the impression, that there were no United States flags.

A. The flags he supposed to be confederate flags were just flags of red calico and white bleached domestic, which were hung by a Frenchman in our town after the style, as he said, of ornamenting the streets in Paris on public days; and he made a beautiful display of white calico and red calico, but the stores and all the public buildings were ornamented with United States flags—five hundred of them, I reckon—and a long procession of horsemen, and very many of them had United States flags attached to their horses' heads, and the children all over town had little flags and were at the windows and doors saluting the procession as it passed by. It would look rather bad to let that go without a refutation. Mr. Harrington also stated something in regard to a speech by Mr. Barry. I heard that speech, and no such language was used by him as was attributed. All the addresses made to the negroes were of the most conciliatory character. The negroes were treated with the greatest degree of kindness by every man, so far as my knowledge goes. I believe hundreds of these men who came here would testify that they were not intimidated.

The character of the witness Harrington is thus given by Mr. Shotwell at page 249:

"He is now under bond. This brother of his (J. T. Harrington) who testified here, I can show by any quantity of witnesses that he is a man of notoriously bad character; that he has been indicted for horse-stealing and for kidnaping negroes—not indicted for kidnaping negroes, but he has been charged with it, and a white man and a negro caught him at it. That was during the war. After the war he brought a suit for damages against one Anderson Beam for $20,000 damages, for making those charges against him, and the suit was finally dismissed by J. T. Harrington at his own expense. As to that Harrington, I can bring fifty or a hundred men, if necessary, here."

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State what you know of your own knowledge.

A. I am stating as to his character of my own knowledge. I am just speaking of the character of the man.

By Mr. BAYARD:

Q. Of his reputation in the community?

A. Yes, sir; the general bad character of the man: that he is regarded as a horse-thief. I have no doubt I can produce witnesses who would testify, any number of them, that they would not believe him on oath—eighty or a hundred men. I can name the party that caught him trying to kidnap a negro—William Nixon.

The report of the United States grand jury is also appended to the evidence, (part 6.)

In criticising this highly sensational document, it would seem reasonable to ask if such a denunciation of the State could be made by the nineteen republicans and one democrat who composed the grand jury. Why did they not find indictments for the punishment of some of the alleged crimes?

If they had a majority to denounce, why not to bring to justice?

Its publication would seem to reflect upon the district attorney, whom it affects to praise; for if he had done his duty, the guilty would have been presented for indictment.

It seems plain that this report was a partisan assault, a mere blast of defamation against their political opponents, for no one can doubt the indictments would have been found had the evidence warranted it. The President of the United States has caused to be annexed to his message on South Carolina troubles the following letter of District-Attorney Walton, which shows how little responsibility the "shameful failure of justice" belongs to the white people of Mississippi:

OXFORD, MISSISSIPPI, July 15, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith the report of the grand jury lately in session here, together with the evidence on which it is based. This evidence, you will see, plainly required the jury to indict a great many persons for violations of the election laws; but, out of eighteen jurors, seven were found who refused to concur in any such indictment. I learn, however, that all but one of the jurors voted for this report. All but this one professed to belong to the republican party; and some of those who finally voted against the eleven who were for the indictments were throughout the whole session apparently the most reliable men we had to sustain the indictments and the most zealous in investigating the cases. This was particularly true of the man who wrote this report, yet he finally went against all prosecutions, though we had conceived him to be the most earnest, as he had certainly been the most active, man among us in bringing to justice, or at least in investigating the election cases.

I can only lament the shameful failure of justice which has taken place, and I have little doubt that it must and will give a most unbridled license to lawlessness at the next State, if not at the next Federal, election.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS WALTON,
United States District Attorney.

Hon. ALPHONSO TAFT, Attorney-General.

In this connection it is proper to note that section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides as cause of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit juries in the courts of the United States, "having served in the rebellion, or given it aid or comfort, or to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, &c., anything whatever, for the use or benefit of any one whom the giver knew to have been engaged in arms against the United States," &c.

This law was enacted in 1862 and, although provisions for its repeal have more than once passed the House of Representatives, yet by the refusal of the Senate to concur still remains upon the statute, most unfortunately, as we believe.

It works an absolute exclusion of nearly every white citizen in the Southern States from the United States juries.

In the selection by the United States marshal in Mississippi the juries were almost exclusively composed of republicans, colored and white, (20 to 1, see Walton's letter.)

Attention is drawn to this, because the better classes of the white citizens have been bitterly assailed and condemned because they have not actively assisted in convicting offenders; at the same time they have not only been excluded from office, but not even allowed to sit upon the juries.

We submit these facts to the consciences of our countrymen.

A letter from W. F. Tucker is also published, at the request of the chairman, directed to Mr. Frazee, the foreman of this grand jury, to be found at page 151 of the documentary evidence.

If Mr. Frazee believed this letter was intended to deter him from doing his duty his course and duty were plain. The letter should have been handed to Judge Hill, who, by a bench-warrant, could have brought Mr. Tucker to answer.

But the publication of the letter by Mr. Frazee proves that he did not so construe it, and certainly that he derided it.

Whatever impropriety may be adjudged Mr. Tucker, it is his individual sin, and should not be visited upon his innocent fellow-citizens.

Throughout the testimony much of the alleged intimidation was by violent language, profanity, and vague and mysterious threats, which, however improper and reprehensible, are, we regret to say, much too common in every heated political canvass in almost every county in the United States, and are not peculiar to the State of Mississippi. The object of such testimony could only be to create prejudice, as it certainly could not have been intended as a basis for legislation. There is scarcely a State in the Union which is not assailable on similar grounds.

During the canvass, and in the midst of this growing feeling between the races, Davenport, the colored county clerk at Vicksburgh, who has been indicted for forgery of warrants, made a public speech, saying "He would have a white wife from among the best families," which W. F. Fitzgerald, republican, one of Ames's brigadiers, testified, at page —, "had more to do with creating excitement than anything else." In a community where the white people are largely outnumbered by the blacks it is not surprising that deep resentment and excitement should follow such declarations.

Wilkinson County.—This county was carried overwhelmingly for the republican ticket in 1875, and therefore no evidence impeaching the election was taken; but as it is situated in the southwest corner of the State, on the Louisiana State-line, —— on ——, the honorable Senator from Indiana introduced the following resolution, which was adopted:

The witnesses summoned were from the parish of East Feliciana, in Louisiana, and from Wilkinson County, Mississippi. The region embraced by this county and parish is remote from routes of travel, and in Louisiana the presence of Governor Kellogg's tax-collector, Colonel Frank Powers, heretofore mentioned in connection with Amite County, has caused law and order to be little regarded.

W. H. Noble, the republican sheriff of Wilkinson, testified (see p. —) that negroes there in his custody admitted to him that Aaronson, a white store-keeper over the Louisiana line, who had just moved into the neighborhood, was murdered by a body of negroes who were passing his store in search of one——, another white man, who had brutally assaulted a negro man the day before.

When Aaronson's murder by the negroes become known, the white people, to the number of one hundred or more, visited the locality and arrested and hung —— negroes who confessed their murder of Aaronson.

The affair created great excitement, and the two races commenced organizing and arming themselves.

Reports of the armed organization of the negroes were rife and their intended destruction of the white people.

Sheriff Noble summoned an armed posse, at the head of which he placed himself, and his command in three columns moved toward the western side of the county, where the negroes were reported to be massed and armed.

One of these companies, at the plantation of ——, came in conflict with some armed blacks, in which encounter —— negroes were shot and —— whites.

At page — Sheriff Noble says:

At page — is the deposition of ——.

These occurrences took place in the month of May last, when there was no election at hand, and no occasion whatever for political excitement. The county of Wilkinson had, as we have stated, entirely a negro government, and the republican party held all the offices.

The character of such government is but a repetition of the same sad story as we have related of other counties similarly governed. (See page—, deposition of ——.)

What these disorders, tragical and shameful as they are, have to do with the fifteenth amendment and the "right to vote" does not appear to the minds of the undersigned. That they exhibit a condition of things impossible under a decent government of laws, no one will deny; and upon territory under the control of William P. Kellogg, governor (so called) of Louisiana, they were certainly committed.

The majority of the citizens of Louisiana, in 1872, voted to elect John McEnery their governor, and the ballots still in existence, as well known to the Senate, exhibit a majority of over nine thousand votes in his favor. But the President of the United States, by the armed interposition of the Federal power, overthrew the will of the people of Louisiana, and installed Kellogg and a kindred legislature in office and power.

His government never had, nor deserved to receive, the respect of the people, whose will, if allowed to be exerted, would have driven Kellogg and his adherents like chaff out of their places.

That discontent and disorder should prevail is not at all surprising, and that Kellogg should appoint Colonel Frank Powers, a ruffian and a brigand, to office will astonish no one.

But we doubt whether any mind will be so utterly unjust as to hold the white people of Louisiana or Mississippi responsible for the outrages caused or encouraged by Kellogg's appointees, or the disregard of law, decency, and order, in all of which Kellogg himself is pre-eminent.

Throughout the investigation the inquiry was frequently made by the majority whether there had not been intimidation practiced by threatening to discharge men from employment if they did not vote in compliance with their employer's wishes, and in many cases such facts were proven.

However important it may appear to the undersigned that the moral and intellectual independence of the individual voter should be respected, and that no methods of coercion should be used to influence the free exercise of suffrage, yet in the face of the admitted and almost general violation of these sound and just propositions by public and private employers in all sections of the Union, it would seem scarcely credible that it should be proposed to select Mississippi as the one State for the application and enforcement of a rule which is disregarded everywhere else.

Thus lately the republicans in the State of New Hampshire, by a formal address of the Legislature, approved by the governor, made a clean sweep of their democratic opponents, on the sole account of political opinion.

In House Miscellaneous Document No. 65, present session, the testimony taken in the contested election of Platt vs. Goode, at page 254, will be found the deposition of Jesse Mahoney, a ship-carpenter in the Government employ in the Portsmouth (Virginia) navy-yard:

Deposition of Jesse Mahoney.

JESSE MAHONEY, a witness of lawful age, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By Mr. JOHN GOODE, Jr.:

Question 1. State age, residence, and occupation.

Answer. Age, forty-four years; residence, second ward, Portsmouth, at present; occupation, ship-carpenter, first class.

Q. 2. Are you employed in the navy-yard?

A. I am not, at present.

Q. 3. When were you last employed there, and when were you discharged?

A. On the 4th of August, 1874, and discharged on the 11th of November, 1874.

Q. 4. State how you procured your employment on the 4th day of August, 1874; what steps were taken by you to procure it; whether you had any conversation with Hon. James H Platt, jr., on the subject; and if so, all that was said.

A. In May last, 1874, I went to see Mr. William Smith, foreman of shipwrights in the navy-yard, to give me work. He told me he would do what he could, and then I went over to Norfolk about the middle of May, 1874, and seen Mr. James Platt, and asked him would he give me employment in the yard. He then told me to get a letter from the executive committee, and indorsed by the chairman, send it to him to Washington, and he would put me to work.

Q. 5. Did you get the letter from the republican executive committee or any member thereof?

A. I did not.

Q. 6. Did you make application for it?

A. I did; to the chairman of the committee, James H. Clements.

Q. 7. When did you make application to Mr. Clements?

A. On several occasions.

Q. 8. What did he say?

A. He told me he would do all he could to get me in.

Q. 9. Has anything else occurred, besides what you have stated, to make the impression upon you that in order to procure employment in the navy-yard, it would be necessary to get the indorsement of leading men or officials belonging to the republican party?

A. It was, in March, 1873. I was at work in Norfolk; knowing that I could not work in the yard without affiliating with the republican party, I came over here. I see Mr. James H. Clements to give me work in the yard, that I would support their party, which I did up to November election, 1874; then I supported Mr. GOODE.

Q. 10. State whether or not you voted with the republican party in the spring election of 1873, and if so, what induced you to do it.

A. I did vote with them—for my bread and meat, and not from principle.

Q. 11. Could you have procured employment in the navy-yard in 1873 or 1874 without a promise, either expressed or implied, that you would support the candidates of the republican party?

A. I could not.

Q. 12. How were the men generally employed in the navy-yard—upon whose recommendation?

A. By the republican committee, so far as I know.

Q. 13. Did the officials in the navy-yard, as a general thing, employ any workmen without the indorsement of the republican executive committee?

A. They had to be indorsed by the republican executive committee.

Q. 14. You have stated that you voted for me in the November election; state, according to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief, whether that vote had anything to do with your discharge from the navy-yard on the 11th of November, 1874?

A. I believe it did.

Q. 15. Have you heard anything on that subject from any official in the navy-yard? If so, state it.

A. Not officially. I was challenged by one of the bosses by the name of Patrick McDonough; he came under the ship's bottom where I was at work; says to me, "Jess, I am told you voted the conservative ticket." "Pat, I did vote the conservative ticket, for the Hon. Mr. JOHN GOODE." He says, "I understand that you got whipped by the conservatives." I told him no, that I did not. It was some prejudice that existed a long time that got me hit.

Q. 16. Was any pecuniary assessment made upon you as an employé in the navy-yard, or did you pay any money without assessment for Mr. Platt's election purposes during the last congressional campaign? If so, state fully all you know about it.

A. I had a written circular passed to me with the request for a day's pay. In that circular I saw where the bosses had to pay $20, the quartermen $10, the eighthmen $5, first-class mechanics $3.20, second-class $3; and about the 19th of October, 1874, I went to Mr. Smith about this pay. I told him that I was in here only a short time; that I was only able to pay $2. He told me that would not do; he wanted the whole; that he was tired of it.

Q. 17. How much money did you pay?

A. I give him $2.

Q. 18. Who is the Mr. Smith to whom you have referred?

A. William F. Smith, foreman, or the boss of the shipwrights, under whom I worked.

Q. 19. Did you pay that money willingly or not?

A. I did not pay it willingly.

Q. 20. What, then, induced you to pay it?

A. Thinking it would give me a longer job.

Q. 21. Was it or not generally understood, so far as you know, among the men employed in the navy-yard, that if they failed to meet the assessment made upon them it would result in their discharge or deprive them of a job?

A. As a general thing they thought it best to pay it, in my opinion.

Q. 22. Was it, or not, generally understood, among the men employed in the navy-yard during the late congressional campaign, that they would be expected to vote for Mr. Platt, and that if they failed to do so they would incur the hostility of those who controlled the patronage in the navy-yard?

A. It was, in my opinion.

Q. 23. How many men were employed in the navy-yard during the time you were there, from the 4th of August to the 11th November, 1874, according to your knowledge, information, and belief?

A. To my belief, in the construction department there was two hundred men on the ship-carpenter's roll. Some were put there as mechanics who were not. There was about four hundred laborers during the month of October in that department, two hundred more than was needed, to the best of my judgment. There was some imported from Isle of Wight and worked on the ship-carpenter's roll who were no ship-carpenters—one from Isle of Wight and one from Williamsburgh; one from Isle of Wight named Juba Gordon, (colored.) There must have been in the whole yard in the neighborhood of seventeen hundred men, in my opinion; to the best of my judgment.

Q. 24. You have stated that men were brought there and put on the ship-carpenter's roll who were not carpenters. What did those men do; in what kind of work were they engaged, and how did they spend their time?

A. They spent their time "down east"—down in the privy. Down east, we call it.

Q. 25. Did you ever see those men carrying old lumber or iron about the yard as if to keep up a show of employment?

A. I have seen a gang of men taking deck-plank and pile it from one place to another to keep themselves employed.

Q. 26. Was that large number of men employed there during those months necessary or not, for the legitimate purposes of the Government, in the navy-yard?

A. I think not.

Q. 27. Did you attend a republican meeting held at Temperance Hall, in Portsmouth, a night or two previous to the election?

A. I did; the night before the election.

Q. 28. Who presided over that meeting?

A. James H. Clements.

Q. 29. Does Mr. James H. Clements hold any Federal appointment in Portsmouth?

A. He does. He is postmaster, and has been for some years past.

Q. 30. Did you hear any instructions given at that meeting by Mr. Clements, the chairman, or by any one else, as to how the voters should receive their tickets on election day; how they should hold them, and how they should deposit them in the ballot-box? If so, state what they were fully.

A. Mr. Clements told them he did not want "no backing out," and "no lagging" the vigilance committee. One must hold the tickets, and only give the ticket to the man that was going to vote. The voter must hold it in his hand so it can be seen when he deposited it, so the vigilance committee-man can see him deposit it; when he deposited it right, he was to be tallied.

Q. 31. Was any proclamation made or notice given of the names of the committee-men from whom the voters should receive their tickets?

A. Not that I know of. It was late when I got in, and the voting was all through with.

Q. 32. Where did you vote on the day of election?

A. I voted in the second ward.

To the same effect are the depositions of William W. Bain, page 234; of George W. Glover, page 266; of Joseph Broughton, page 283; of Francis Russ, page 309; but it is unnecessary to multiply illustrations of what every man in the country knows is the invariable practice in all the Executive Departments of the Government—never to such an extent as under the present Administration.

In the investigation of the New York custom-house in 1872, it was proved that official positions were frequently the price of partisan services. (Volume 3, page 608.)

By Mr. HOWE:

Question. Now, what efforts have General Arthur, or Mr. Cornell, or Mr. Laflin, or Mr. Darling made to control the political action of their subordinates?

Answer. The only special knowledge I have on that subject is that every single one of their subordinates has to act in a certain political way. There are a few men there who I know are forced, in order to keep their places, to do just exactly contrary to what they believe to be right.

Q. Now, who are those?

A. I do not propose to tell them if I can help it, because every one of them would be turned out of office. (Examination of General George W. Palmer.)

At page 702, same volume, deposition of James L. Hastie:

Q. What was the offer made by Mr. Murphy's agent to you? Just repeat the offer made by him in case you would leave your place upon the ticket and allow Mr. E. D. Morgan to go to the convention in your stead.

A. That I could take a sheet of white paper and write my own terms for myself and friends in the district. Any positions that I would choose to select would be given.

Q. Positions in the United States service in the custom-house?

A. In the United States service, for myself and my friends. Take a sheet of paper, and write out my own selections.

The individuals who were thus interrogated were, however, only Mississippians, into whose private and personal dealings with their employés an inquisition was made, which we do not believe would have been attempted or tolerated in the State of Massachusetts or any other State, where the right of local self-government is acknowledged and is suffered to exist.

However open to reprobation such attempts at coercion of opinion may be, no one can suppose it is within the power of Congress to interfere.

SOCIAL OSTRACISM.

Testimony was taken to prove the unwillingness of the southern white people to associate intimately with many of the witnesses. Judging from the account given of themselves by those who made this complaint, the undersigned are disposed to coincide with the parties complained of, and do not believe that in the Northern States the social standing of these witnesses could be very high, or intimacy with them generally desired. But it does seem to us absurd to suggest the regulation of private intimacies and associations by act of Congress. History has been read in vain if the folly and futility of all such attempts be not admitted. Time, the great healer of grief, may steep in oblivion the memory of the great losses with which the people of the South have in the providence of God been visited. But the wounds are too recent not to be touched gently. The members of many a household in Mississippi are clad in the garb of woe, and mothers, sisters, and wives are pale with sorrows that will not cease until the union with their loved and lost shall come with the end of their earthly troubles.

Into these associations a stranger may not intrude; a man of feeling would not if he could and an unfeeling man should be repelled.

The fireside of a citizen, however humble, is a domain which neither congressional committees nor any one else has a right to enter unbidden by its owner. Nothing in the letter or spirit, the theory or practice of American government even suggests such a jurisdiction, and we thus dismiss the subject.

INTERFERENCE BY FEDERAL AUTHORITY

in the State elections and internal affairs of the State has, since the close of the war, frequently taken place, and never without deplorable and disastrous results; and, on the other hand, the applications of minorities, defeated by the popular vote, to be nevertheless installed in office, has never been denied by the Federal authorities without such denial being followed by beneficent results.

Such interference has always been followed (and very naturally) by local discontent and disorder, as in the case of Louisiana and Alabama, while Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, and Arkansas are living proofs in their increased prosperity and tranquillity of the wisdom of non-interference.

THE PROBLEM OF RACE

will continue to be of the deepest interest to the people of this nation; and it is not the duty or purpose of the undersigned to do more at present than recognize its existence and refer to its solution as a matter of great difficulty. Suffice it to say that the relations of the African to the white races in the United States do not stand alone for consideration; but on our Pacific coast the dark shadow of an Asiatic horde hangs lowering over the white population, and has aroused their gravest apprehensions.

The African race is now admitted fully to the rights of American citizenship. Under the fifteenth amendment all power to discriminate as to the right to vote "on account of race" is inhibited to the States and to the United States.

Thus, between the admission of the Mongolians to the privilege of suffrage, there now stands but the frail barrier of a single word of the naturalization laws to be added or subtracted at the will of a bare majority in Congress, which can close or open to the teeming oriental populations unobstructed opportunity, by their mere numbers, to control our elections and our governments, State and Federal.

The vastness and gravity of the subject will not admit of further discussion in this report.

A few remarks upon the condition of Mississippi in June, 1876, will conclude this report.

A rapid journey by railway brought the committee to the town of Jackson, the capital of the State. The examination of witnesses, who were all ready and in attendance, having been summoned in advance by telegraph from Washington, commenced on the day of our arrival and continued all day and every day from June 9 to June 27, when, by traveling all night, we reached the little village of Aberdeen, in Monroe County, and, after three days of close labor there, returned to Washington. No act of a turbulent or disorderly nature was witnessed by the committee, and no signs of enmity or incivility were exhibited; but, on the contrary, courtesy and respect were on all hands extended to the committee.

The poverty of the people was apparent in their garb, the appearance of their houses, and the marked absence of good and comfortable vehicles.

The want of horses or equipages for ordinary pleasure was frankly stated to the undersigned by sundry gentlemen who regretted their inability to allow us to see the surrounding country, simply because they and their families were too poor to indulge in the pleasure of a drive.

Large numbers of ladies in Mississippi delicately nurtured and carefully educated are compelled to perform the drudgery of their households unaided by domestic servants.

This great change in their mode of life and fortunes induces them to conceal their wants from a stranger's eye and frequently forbids that open-handed hospitality once so characteristic of southern households.

The only exhibition of pleasure-seeking witnessed was by the colored people, whose processions passed the committee-room and whose holiday excursions by railway started from the depot opposite.

The only cannon sound was from their republican ratification meeting, and theirs was the only music heard by us in Mississippi.

The poverty of the colored people also was often painfully apparent in the groups of witnesses who clustered upon the long galleries, wretched in appearance and miserably clad, giving to the hotel the appearance of a county alms-house.

The reformation in the legislation and administration of Mississippi by the party in control since January, 1876, has thus been important and marked with great benefits to the entire community.

The judiciary has been purified and elevated by the appointment of men learned in the law and irreproachable in character to the bench. The far-reaching and beneficent influences of this single reform can scarcely be overstated, and the blessing to flow to all classes of society and all races of men in the pure and equal administration of public justice may be now hopefully looked for.

The Hon. John A. C. Watson, a citizen of the highest reputation, both as a lawyer and a man, testified on this subject as follows, at page —:

Question. Speaking irrespective of party in the State, what was the effect upon public opinion of the course of administration which you have here detailed as to the growth of confidence or dissatisfaction therein?

Answer. It created great discontent and dissatisfaction. Many of the republican party became as violent opponents of Governor Ames as the democrats were or ever had been.

Q. I would ask you what, in your judgment as a citizen of the State and a close observer of the affairs of the State, was the effect of the discord in the dominant party in the election of 1875?

A. I think the split in the party contributed more to the overthrow of Ames than any other single cause. And in this way: The negroes, hearing their own men abusing each other, seemed to be bewildered. I traveled over the State a good deal during the last canvass. I addressed the people at this place, (Jackson,) and I addressed them at Canton, at Winona, at Oxford, Taylor's Depot, Hernando, Senatobia, and some other places, besides in Marshall County, and had a good deal of intercourse with the people.

Q. With both parties?

A. Yes, and I noticed a very great change in the negroes. Before, they had been unwilling to hear any but their own speakers, and seemed to have no confidence in anybody else. Last fall, long before the election, they were coming out to hear the democratic speakers. They were conversing with democrats, and before the day of election a good many had openly avowed themselves democrats. In my county and in others, of which I heard, a great many had joined clubs, and I noticed, frequently, one or two who would first go and hear; then they would converse with me, and their change was as gradual and slow as it well could have been. Finally they would avow themselves democrats and become more enthusiastic than anybody else. Such changes were usual throughout the State before the day of the election, and I heard many of them say, "Well, we have made nothing yet by the republican party; they have done us no good, and I reckon it is possibly best to have a change. We will try it." I don't pretend to give their exact language, but the substance of what many said.

Q. Since the election have you observed the sentiments and feelings of the colored population in regard to this change of administration?

A. I think there has been more of contentment and quiet and satisfaction among the negroes since the last election than has before existed in the State since reconstruction.

Q. Excluding yourself, of course, what is your estimate of the present state of judiciary, both as to the chancery, circuit court, and the supreme court?

A. I regard the improvement as very great—very great.

Q. Have the offices of chancellor been refilled?

A. Yes.

Q. And the circuit judges also refilled?

A. Yes.

Q. From what class of men, as to legal attainment and character, have these appointments been drawn?

A. They have been made from a class of lawyers who had the confidence of the people and who were competent to fill the places. The supreme-court bench, with Simrall, appointed by ALCORN, and Campbell and Chalmers, appointed by our present governor, Governor Stone, in point of capacity, integrity, and character, is equal to any court in the Union, and there are not more than one or two chancellors or circuit judges that I, myself, as governor, would not have appointed.

Q. Are you aware that the charge had been made that the late election in 1875 was carried by a general system of intimidation and violence on the part of the democratic party toward their political opponents in this State? I will ask you now what is your knowledge and your judgment as to the truth or falsity of that statement?

A. Well, so far as my personal knowledge goes, I never witnessed anything approaching intimidation by the whites Cases of intimidation of colored voters by colored voters did come under my observation. There has always been something of that, but much less of it in the last election than previously. A better class of men, as a general thing, were anti-radical candidates last fall, and a more orderly or fairer election was never held, so far as it came under my observation.

Judge Campbell, of the supreme court, at page —, says:

Question. Has there been, as far as you know, since the election an acquiescence in the change of affairs in the State?

Answer. Entirely so; the most perfect quiet has reigned throughout Mississippi.

Q. Any collision between the races since that, that you are aware of, in your own section of the country?

A. I have heard none anywhere I remember, except on the borders of Mississippi, in Louisiana, this matter down here, that is known through the instrumentality of papers; I have heard of no disturbance; perfect quiet has reigned throughout the State except that.

Q. State what has been since 1875 the effect of this change of administration; if there has been any effect upon the happiness and prosperity of the people.

A. It has been most inspiring, decidedly inspiring, to the people.

Q. Is that feeling confined to one race exclusively?

A. I am not able to speak about the colored people. My associations with them are so very limited that I cannot say, sir. My professional duties before my appointment to the bench, and my judicial duties since, have so engrossed my time that really I cannot express an opinion, even about the sentiments of colored men in the State.

Q. Has there been, to your knowledge, a visible improvement in the prosperity and condition in the State since the change of administration?

A. There is no question about that, I think, sir. The prospect for industrial success is decidedly better than it has been. There are much higher hopes in the bosoms of the white people, and, so far as I can ascertain or judge from every appearance, perfect contentment, quietude, and satisfaction among the colored people.

The truth is that the colored people were being incited by pestiferous vagabonds who wanted to stir them up for purposes of their own against the whites. And they would have moved along in their sphere contentedly and quietly, depending on the white people, trusting in them, and treated with kindness by them, but they were stirred up and hopes were created in their bosoms which could not be realized. And there are ambitious men among them, who, catching their inspiration from their leaders, undertook to permeate the whole race with it, and spreading it abroad inciting them and inducing a feeling, when there would have been no such feeling; all would have been satisfactory between the whites and blacks had it not been for the interference of these persons who undertook to use the negroes for their own purposes.

And I will state further that the negroes would have fared just as well and better without any interference at the hands of the mass of the white people, who have far more consideration and kindness for them than these men who make loud pretense of their devotion to them for mere political purposes.

I know the negro race well; I was born and reared among them, and have nothing in the world but the kindest feelings for them, and in my private life and in public life, as they will all testify who have been brought within my influence, I have treated them with great consideration. When on the bench, where they had against them the natural prejudice unhappily existing to a great extent in the minds of their late masters against the newly enfranchised race, I was anxious to secure them from injustice from white jurors, even more so than if they had been white people. I have always had only feelings of the utmost kindness toward them, and have now.

I am prepared to assert that they have done wonderfully well under the circumstances, and would have done far better but for the interference of politicians, who stir them up and use them for their own benefit. They have been badly taught and misled and been used as mere puppets to a large extent.

The reduction of expenses by the last Legislature was positive and highly satisfactory to all tax-payers. (See page —, deposition of ——.)

The condition of public schools is in the main satisfactory, and the provision for their maintenance has been increased by the appropriation of certain license fees and fines to their support. (See page —, deposition of E. Barksdale.)

On this subject the following extract is pertinent and interesting:

"THE PEABODY SCHOOL FUND.

"On Friday last the trustees of the Peabody fund for aiding the public schools at the South held a meeting at the Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs, at which the report made by Dr. Sears of his last year's work was discussed. From this report we learn that Dr. Sears disbursed from the fund under his charge but a small amount to South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, because those States do not foster public education. In South Carolina and Louisiana the republicans have had possession of the government for years past. In Florida the democrats have only recently had any chance of carrying the State. Yet in these three States, where the white friends of the colored people have everything their own way, the school funds have been squandered and dissipated and the school-houses closed. What wonder, then, is it that Mr. George Peabody Russel, who joined in the discussion of the Sears report, gave it as his opinion, from personal and recent observation, 'that nothing could be expected from those States in the way of advancing their educational interests until there was a change in their State governments.'"

By amendatory criminal legislation the live stock of the farmers has been protected and the lawless and indiscriminate slaughter of breeding-animals has been made highly penal, so that this year much of the pork and beef heretofore purchased abroad will be raised within the State.

With the increased acreage of corn and the fine crops of their great staple of cotton, the prospects for the material prosperity of Mississippi in the present year are favorable.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF CONGRESS.

If it be designed that our form of government should be continued, we hold it to be the sworn duty of every Senator and Member of Congress, as well as every officer of the Government, to respect and obey the limitations upon power imposed by our written charter.

Whatever may be our individual opinions as to the right or the wrong of a given condition of affairs, the power, and with it the duty to interfere must be found expressly or by necessary implication in the Federal Constitution, otherwise such interference is law-breaking and not law-making.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The Collector vs. Day, 11 Wallace, Rep., p. —, through the lips of that venerable and lamented jurist, Mr. Justice Nelson, described the relative powers of the Federal and State governments in the following words, which we commend to the respect and for the instruction of the Senate:

"It is a familiar rule of construction of the Constitution of the Union that the sovereign powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the Government of the United States. That the intention of the framers of the Constitution in this respect might not be misunderstood, this rule of interpretation is expressly declared in the tenth article of the amendments, namely: 'The powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.' The Government of the United States, therefore, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.

"The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the States within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the tenth amendment, 'reserved,' are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States. * * *

"Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable that without them the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations."

The House of Representatives of the United States is by the Constitution the sole judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members. Contests for membership and admission to that body must be settled by that body alone. This Senate has no power.

The constitution of the State of Mississippi secures to the respective houses of its Legislature the same exclusive power in the same frame of words, and it cannot be lawfully overthrown by the United States.

The deposition of Mr. Walton, the present United States district attorney of Mississippi, at page 63, exhibits his and Governor Ames's views of the late election:

Question. Has any department of the government in Mississippi, or any authority, State or Federal, questioned the legality of the present Legislature?

Answer. I believe not, sir. That is to say, no authority, State or Federal, nor department of the government in Mississippi has questioned the legality of the present Legislature. There has been a popular charge that it was a legislature elected by intimidation; but then, while they have questioned it unofficially, they have recognized the legality of the Legislature by their official intercourse with it.

Q. Have not both the judicial and executive authority of the State repeatedly recognized the legality of the Legislature elected in 1875?

A. The judicial authority, the supreme court, may be considered as having recognized the legality of the Legislature in this way: two of the judges of the supreme court by turns—the court consists of three judges—presided over the impeachment of Governor Ames. The chief justice of the State first presided, and then in consequence of ill-health he resigned his position, and became only an associate justice, and the person who was elected chief justice in his place took his position as president of the court of impeachment. The officers of the State generally reported to the Legislature, and the governor of the State sent his message to the Legislature and approved or vetoed its bills. I remember that I had a conversation with Governor Ames on that subject, in which something was said about the legality of the Legislature. I recollect he made the remark, which impressed me as authorizing his action in the matter, that the Legislature was a legal body, because the number of republicans in the Legislature and the number of democrats in the Legislature, who were peacefully elected, constitute a majority of each house, and thereby were entitled to decide the question of the right of the other members to their seats. He contended, however, that a good many of the members had been illegally elected.

Q. But that that was a question which there was a legal body there to determine?

A. That there was a legal body there composed of republicans who had been elected without any improper influence, and democrats who were elected peacefully in sufficient numbers to constitute a majority of each house. I remember his making that remark to me in January, shortly after the Legislature met. He did not give that as his reason for recognizing the Legislature in his official capacity; but the two things coupled themselves together in my mind.

The statement of the result of the election by Governor Ames, and that the late Legislature was a legal body, is more than sustained by the testimony.

Striking out the counties where fraud or violence my be supposed to have nullified the elections in those special and few localities, still enough lawfully and peaceably elected members of both houses remain unimpeached, in any quarter and by any witness, to form more than a quorum duly qualified to organize the two bodies according to the constitution of the State of Mississippi.

T. F. BAYARD.
J. E. McDONALD.

NORMAN H. RYAN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 840.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 840) for the relief of Norman H. Ryan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Norman H. Ryan of $736, in full for services as storekeeper of the bonded warehouse of E. W. Dutcher, at Amboy, Illinois, from the 18th of April, 1868, to the 15th of October, 1868.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a report from the Committee on Claims in connection with this bill. It has been examined by the Committee on Claims and reported favorably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think I can state to the Senator from Vermont the facts of this case. This man was watchman of this bonded warehouse. The party failed. The officer in charge, the collector, instructed this person to continue to watch the property that was there in which the Government had an interest. It was the duty of course of the person owning the property to pay this expense, but he having failed and this collector instructing the man to continue on watch he did it for the number of days he is paid for as watchman.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there not a lien on the property for fees of that kind?

Mr. LOGAN. The Government got the property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Government got the property, of course we ought to pay the man.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT N. EDDY.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to call up the conference report on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the Senator to yield to allow me to call up a bill. I think there will be no objection as the man is suffering. It is Senate bill No. 788, which contains but eleven lines and the report is still shorter.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to that.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 788) for the relief of Robert N. Eddy was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Paymaster-General of the United States Army to pay to Robert N. Eddy, late second lieutenant Company K, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment New York State Volunteer Infantry, the full pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant, from the 31st of December, 1862, to the 28th of August, 1863, deducting therefrom all pay he may have received from the Government as first sergeant for that period.

Mr. KERNAN. Let the report of the Committee on Military Affairs be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. RANDOLPH from the Committee on Military Affairs on the 1st of May, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of R. N. Eddy, late second lieutenant Company K, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, submit the following report:

The applicant desires difference in pay from the 31st December, 1862, to the 28th August, 1863, between the pay of a sergeant and that of a second lieutenant.

Prior to the first date, Eddy was a sergeant in the regiment and company named; was appointed a second lieutenant at that time; a second lieutenant's vacancy then existed in the company. Eddy performed the duty assigned him; failed to get his commission because of the loss of the vessel on which it was, and was prevented from being sworn in as second lieutenant until the last day named, i. e., August 28, 1863.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF A STEAMBOAT'S NAME.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

Mr. CONKLING. That will lead to long debate.

Mr. McMILLAN. If that be so, I ask the Senator to yield to me for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2252) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us pass one bill that is not a money bill.

By unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 2252) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, on this bill I wish to make a remark, and I would be glad to believe that it would reach the ears and the regards of Senators. There are a great many bills on the Calendar to which nobody would object and which are of deep concern to those who are interested in them. If we could in place of taking up bills in this way—I do not mean to object to this bill at all—have consent to go through the Calendar in the morning hour for a day or two under the Anthony rule and let the Calendar be called for unobjected bills, it would be a great relief to many people, some of whom are sitting in the galleries now and some of whom are in much distress about matters which would not occupy the Senate one moment each. As I say, I do not interpose against this bill; but to-morrow morning and on subsequent mornings I will see whether I cannot get the approbation of the Senate to take up the Calendar under the Anthony rule, and as a friend very properly observes, it is more important in the case of House bills because our action on those concludes legislation. Let us take up unobjected cases and run on and dispose of a great many of these questions which are so distressing to the people concerned in them.

Mr. THURMAN. A day or two ago a bill in regard to counting the votes for President and Vice-President was taken up on my motion and then was laid aside informally subject to be called up at any time; but since that I suppose it has been supplanted by business that was pending at the close of the day. I want to give notice now that as soon as the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New Jersey shall be in their seats I shall ask that that matter shall be disposed of. I have no speech to make on it; I only want it voted on and disposed of. If the Senator from Indiana were in his seat I should move to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a bill before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill (S. No. 133) to sell certain public lands to the Beatrice and Denver City Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was indefinitely postponed. I do this by instruction of the Committee on Public Lands, for the purpose of moving its recommitment to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the indefinite postponement of the bill? The Chair hears none. It is moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. GORDON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 951.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not object to the bill which was last moved, and I dislike to object to any bill in which the Senator from Georgia is interested; but I must insist that if we are going on, the morning hour having expired, to displace the regular order, it ought to be with a fair opportunity to all these people alike. I have no doubt the Senator's bill is right, but we shall reach it in a moment, nobody will object to it, and it will be passed.

Mr. GORDON. I am perfectly willing to accede to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose the Senator makes the motion, and let us try. We shall run down to his bill in a moment.

Mr. GORDON. I move, then, that we take up the Calendar, and only bring before the Senate bills that are not objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under what is known as the Anthony rule. Is there objection to that proposition? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask what is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] for printing extra copies of the President's message relative to the massacre at Hamburgh.

Mr. CONKLING. And this is subject to a call for the regular order at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be resumed where its consideration was last left off.

STEAMBOAT ROBERT ROSS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1915) to change the name of the steamboat Robert Ross was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with an amendment, which was in line 5, after the word "Mollie," to strike out "Kretor" and insert "Keator;" so as to make "Mollie Keator" the name of the vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PLEASURE-YACHT ELLA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

The next business on the Calendar was the concurrent resolution to print 25,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1875, to be distributed by the Commissioner.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. If that resolution is not legible, I think I shall object.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is very necessary that it should pass.

Mr. CONKLING. It cannot be passed unless it can be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed and bound 25,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1875 for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask whether it is contemplated that any number of copies shall be printed for distribution by members of Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are two resolutions which have passed the House. One provides for the printing of 100,000 copies, I think, for the House and the Senate of the report for 1874, and then there is another resolution which has passed the House for 1875. The books are stereotyped for 1874, and it is very little expense, comparatively, to have that year's report printed. This resolution is for the benefit of the Commissioner himself, and I think the three resolutions ought to pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that I believe the number of 25,000 has been heretofore printed for the Commissioner, but I want to inquire of him if that is not too large an amount for the Commissioner? I understand he is unable to distribute them and sends them here, and they are put in the folding-room to the credit of members of Congress. I think I found the other day thirty copies that were assigned to me out of the surplus remnant in the hands of the Commissioner.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand from the Commissioner that he cannot spare any of these.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That was my information. I may be incorrect. I found them to my credit after I thought I had exhausted all my own.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The reason of that probably is that last year the Senate printed some number, I forget how many, but a thousand or two thousand for its own use while none were printed by the House, and I suppose the Senator from Delaware received his quota of that ten or twelve hundred copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment is to insert at the end of the resolution:

And 250,000 copies of the same for general distribution by Senators and members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SARGENT. Is an objection still good to this resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it is before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This had better be passed without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I object, provided this amendment is tacked on.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not see why we may not dispose of the whole question now as well as delay part of it to another time.

Mr. SARGENT. It is sought to pile up the committee-rooms and folding-room with documents when there is no method of distributing them. I do not know how other Senators may feel, but I say for myself that I cannot afford (out of the little pay I receive and such resources as I can command) to pay the postage on thousands and thousands of public documents.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is very true for everything except this report. This report and the RECORD do go free.

Mr. SARGENT. I have another objection. That objection is that we have made very stingy appropriations for the Government Printing Office for the ensuing year, and it is doubtful if they can get through with the ordinary necessary work. I am informed by those who are cognizant with the matter that it is impossible to do it. We have very stringent laws against exceeding appropriations. I would not like to find that the blanks of the Post-Office Department or those of the Treasury are suspended in the vacation for want of funds to do necessary work. I would not like to see the man who is Public Printer in the State prison or hauled over by a committee of Congress for violating the law by expending money not appropriated by Congress. I am opposed to piling up these orders for printing for that reason. With reference to the original proposition for 25,000 copies, it might perhaps be squeezed through; but when you come to add 250,000 more I do not think we ought to do it unless ample appropriation is made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think we had better pass this resolution without the amendment, inasmuch as there are two other resolutions which have passed the House making provision for copies for the use of members of Congress; and as to the deficiency in the appropriation, while what the Senator from California says is very true, still I rather guess the appropriation is enough to run the establishment until December, and that is about all that is contemplated, I presume, by these appropriations.

Mr. WRIGHT. The resolution is now before the Senate. I understand the amendment is to print 200,000 copies additional for the use of the Senate and House. I shall vote for the amendment, and I think it a very appropriate and proper place to put it on now. These other two resolutions may have passed the House, but it is a matter of very great doubt whether we shall pass them at this session. I do not know any report published by Congress that, so far as the people of my country are concerned, they take so much interest in as in this very report. There is no one report that is called for one-tenth or one-hundredth part of the time that this is called for, so far as I am concerned, and I think there is no one thing to which we can devote the money that would be more acceptable and that would be more approved generally by the people than this. This is only the number, as I understand, that has been published heretofore in prior years, and I see no reason why we cannot do it now. I think if the resolution as originally reported is to pass for printing 25,000 copies, then the additional 200,000 ought to be added. I shall vote for the amendment, and I shall vote for the resolution when it is thus amended.

Mr. SARGENT. I have objected.

Mr. PADDOCK. At the time this matter was considered before I offered the amendment which has been read without thinking of the necessity of making provision for the distribution of the report of 1874. I think the propositions sent over from the House more nearly cover the necessities of the case than my amendment. Therefore, I propose that they be added as an amendment to this resolution. I offer them as a substitute for the amendment, or rather I withdraw the other amendment and substitute this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be read as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all of the resolution after "Resolved," and insert:

That there be printed 100,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, 20,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 80,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and that there be printed 200,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875, 43,750 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 131,250 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey where the House resolutions are on the Calendar that he spoke of?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the resolutions are on the Calendar. I hope now that this matter is up that this amendment will be adopted, and that we shall dispose of the whole subject.

Mr. SARGENT. I have objected to the whole matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not when the resolution was taken up. An objection does not prevail unless it is made at the time a resolution or bill is taken up. When the Senate has once proceeded to consider it, it cannot be laid over by one objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to know the cost of printing this enormous quantity of matter?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know. I understand that the report of 1875 is stereotyped. What the cost is I do not know. The report of 1875 is already to be printed. That is all the information I have on the subject. This is the same number which has been printed every year. It is about all that the agricultural part of the community get out of the Government and they are very much pleased with this work. I think it does good. I hope the Senate will pass the resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to enter my protest; it seems to be all that I can do. I thought I objected in time to this extravagant expenditure of public money, this immense draft upon a fund entirely inadequate to do the current business of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That there may be no misunderstanding, the Chair will state his ruling. It is that whenever a bill is read in full, if requested, an objection then will send it over; but after a bill is in Committee of the Whole and under consideration, no objection can then prevail. So of a resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not object to the original resolution, but when amendments were offered entirely different in character, increasing the amount to an enormous extent, then I interposed the objection the very moment these amendments were offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A bill or resolution is liable to be amended in any form. Objection cannot pertain on account of the different stages. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, West, Withers, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Booth, Conkling, Cooper, Eaton, Hamlin, Kernan, Morrill, Sargent, Wallace, and Whyte—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. By the vote just taken a resolution which was intended to involve a cost to the Government of $10,000 has been changed to one costing $120,000. It looks like very brisk work in about ten minutes, and it exhausts about one-fourth of the whole appropriation for public printing. It is very rapid legislation.

I suppose after the vote that has been given in favor of this enormous printing it will be useless to protest any further. I simply call attention to the fact that it does not look very economical to expend $120,000 in addition to the cost of stereotyping and setting the type for these books by an amendment put on in this way; and it seems to me, although I do not question the ruling of the Chair, that it is going very far to say that where a proposition is brought forward to spend $10,000 an objection is not good when a proposition is made to change it to cost twelve times that amount.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Although my friend thinks the legislation is rapid it is really stereotyped legislation. It is what is done every year; and it would be a great deal better to have it fixed by a permanent statute than even by passing these resolutions. It does cost something, it is true, but it is the people's money and the people want this information, and they like this expenditure, as the vote in the House and the vote here always show.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that, while I consider this a very valuable document, I am in favor of limiting the printing of reports, particularly upon mining and other interests which are purely local in character, as I have been careful to explain to the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me a moment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. The report on mining was abolished last year on my motion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe the Senator at that time had something to say about the report on mining, and I made a similar remark, calling his attention to the fact that it was omitted from the sundry civil bill on my motion. I trust the Senator will remember it now, and next year will not say that I am in favor of the report on mining.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will join the Senator in economy on a great many other works which are prepared and which can only go out at the personal expense of members of Congress. I have insisted here that we ought to limit the publication of works unless there was some provision to send them out without personal charge to members of Congress; but this work, the Agricultural Report, is one that the agricultural community desires, which it appreciates. In my opinion they appreciate it more than any other work which is published by authority of Congress.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

VANCOUVER WATER COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 453) to authorize the Vancouver Water Company to lay water-pipes through the Fort Vancouver military reservation; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Vancouver Water Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Washington Territory, to lay down and keep in repair water-pipes for the conveyance of water through the military reservation of Fort Vancouver.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the words:

To be subject at all times to orders and regulations of the War Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not object to the amendment, but it seems to me it ought to be amended so as to authorize the company to remove the water-pipes, if they choose.

Mr. SPENCER. I think it does do that.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there any report from the Secretary of War on the subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No papers accompany the bill.

Mr. KELLY. I will state, if it be desired, the reason why this bill was introduced and why I desire it to pass. The Vancouver Water Company was authorized some years ago to construct and lay down pipes through the military reservation by the permission of the Secretary of War. Subsequently the Secretary learned that he had no authority to do that, but that it should be done by Congress. While the water-company is now passing water over the reservation, it has really no authority to do it, and therefore this bill was introduced. The amendment of the committee that it shall be under such regulations as may be established by the War Department I think is fair.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move in the amendment after "to," in the seventh line, to insert "removal and to;" so as to read:

To be subject at all times to removal and to orders and regulations of the War Department.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. While I was absent for a few moments in the service of the Senate, a concurrent resolution has passed, I understand, authorizing the publication of 300,000 copies of the Agricultural Report. Although I am opposed to what seems to me such an extravagant waste of public money, I do not propose to attempt to object to the will of the Senate, but I ask that the vote on the passage of the resolution may be reconsidered so that I may add an amendment, without which I do not think the resolution can be carried into effect. There is no money to pay for the printing. The sundry civil appropriation bill has cut down the appropriation for the public printing one-third, I think. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] will recollect how that is.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. And now having cut down the appropriation about one-third, we pass a resolution here to expend $150,000 more than we did last year, which cannot be carried into effect unless there is money for it, because if the Public Printer expends the money without an appropriation he is subjected to a severe penalty. I therefore move a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was passed, and I will then move that it be put in the form of a bill, making an appropriation to pay the expense of the printing.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there will not be an opportunity in some other bill devoted exclusively to appropriations to provide for this appropriation?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; every appropriation bill that has not already become a law has passed both Houses and is in the conference committee.

Mr. PADDOCK. It seems to me unnecessary to reconsider the resolution for the purpose of putting this amendment upon it. It seems to me some other provision could be more readily made.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator can suggest it, very well. I make this motion in good faith to the Senate. I am opposed to the printing of this enormous number of books for gratuitous distribution, but if it is the pleasure of the Senate to order it, I think we ought not to compel the Public Printer to incur the expense and then put him in the State's prison for spending the money. I am quite sure that unless the amendment I suggest is put upon the resolution the order of the Senate cannot be carried into effect.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this a Senate resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a Senate resolution, but should be changed to a bill. Not wishing the publication to be made, I am quite content to leave it as it is, in which case I am quite sure it will not be effective; but if it is the desire of the Senate to incur this great expense, then it must appropriate the money and take the responsibility.

Mr. PADDOCK. I object to a reconsideration.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt that if Congress would stop publishing political documents for distribution and other unnecessary works, we could save enough to publish this work, in which the great agricultural interest of this country is interested.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will my colleague on the committee tell me where we are going to save? We order so many copies of this report and then we appropriate a certain amount of money. We appropriate for the public printing a million of dollars and then we order a million and a half dollars' worth of printing to be done.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows any other direction in which money can be applied for public printing where it will carry with it greater beneficial results to the people? I object most thoroughly and most emphatically to the term "waste" employed by the Senator in connection with this appropriation. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied in my own mind that there is no printing done by the Government so acceptable to the people and so useful to the whole country as is this.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we should print Webster's Dictionary or the Holy Bible, I think it would be quite as useful to the country and there would be as great a demand for it. There is always an immense demand for books which we give away. I did not rise to argue the question, however. I have long known that it was the intention of the Senate and House to order this printing. I rise in good faith to the Senate to say that if they want this printing done they must reconsider the resolution and make an appropriation for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Can we have unanimous consent to take the resolution up at once and pass it, if it is reconsidered?

Mr. SARGENT. I will not object. I objected before on the ground that the Senator from Rhode Island now so ably states. I will not object provided the appropriation is made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What does the Senator from Rhode Island suggest?

Mr. ANTHONY. My amendment is to appropriate the money to print the 300,000 copies.

Mr. SARGENT. Which will take $120,000. I understand the type is set and it will cost forty cents a volume after it is stereotyped.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The type is set of the report for one year.

Mr. ANTHONY. It should be "$130,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. HOWE. Let me suggest that the resolution had better go to the House and they will concur without an amendment or with an amendment. If we require the printing to be done, the Printer will not do it unless he has funds to do it with, and if we come back here next winter and do not find the reports he will probably be able to tell us what the reason is, and then we can appropriate the money or not as we choose. I guess we had better not attempt to go into the question of making an appropriation at this time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to reconsider the vote and shall then move to put the resolution in the form of a bill with a proper appropriation; and then, although I shall not waste the time of the Senate in opposing it, I shall merely vote against it. If the Senator from Wisconsin does not want the books printed and is willing to defeat the resolution by indirection, I certainly have no objection; only I do not think it would be proper for me with the information which I happen to have upon the subject, having some charge of the public printing, to allow the Senate to make an order which cannot be executed.

Mr. HOWE. I may be allowed to say that I do not want to defeat this measure by indirection, and I do not mean to defeat it at all. I want the resolution to pass, and I undertake to say it will be executed if you pass it. It may be you will find yourself short next winter and will either have to make an additional appropriation for the Printing Office or have to stop printing them, but "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." This printing will have to be done, for I do not think we shall order printing enough this session to exhaust the appropriation made for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the motion will not prevail. It seems to me it is unnecessary to reconsider the resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not put it in the form of a special appropriation bill, and let the resolution stand as it is?

Mr. ANTHONY. The two provisions ought to go together. If we pass the resolution and should not pass the appropriation bill, then, in spite of what my friend from Wisconsin says, the order cannot be executed. All these appropriations are under a particular head. The Government Printer cannot take the appropriation made for the Treasury Department or the Interior Department and divert it to the publication of these reports.

Mr. WEST. I voted for the resolution, and am in favor of the appropriation for the reasonable cost that the Government will incur in carrying it into effect. An examination of the lately-passed sundry civil service bill will convince the Senate at once that it is idle to let the resolution stand as it is. The total amount appropriated for the printing of the Interior Department is $135,000 and for the Agricultural Department $9,000, making the amount $144,000 for all the printing of those two Departments. Consequently if this is to cost so much money it would exhaust all that you have appropriated for the Interior Department and the Agricultural Bureau, and your resolution as it stands is a nullity.

Mr. PADDOCK. Of course it will not take precedence of the other printing.

Mr. WEST. I know it will not take precedence. You will by no possibility get any Agricultural Reports printed under your resolution without such an amendment as appropriates the money necessary therefor.

Mr. INGALLS. These are for bound copies?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. In looking over the cost I find that for 1,250 copies for 1874 the cost to bind them was $200, or about sixteen cents apiece. You would be without books and without binding, most assuredly, as the resolution now stands, and the only way to make it effective is to reconsider it and add the amendment making the appropriation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest that the resolution stand as it is. A bill can be introduced making the appropriation. The House can amend the resolution by adding an appropriation or an appropriation can be added in conference. I do not see any necessity for our undoing what we have done. It seemed a little difficult to get the measure up, and it is, at any rate, an expression of the opinion of Congress on the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I cannot doubt that the Senator from Rhode Island is quite right about this matter. Surely no conference committee can import into this resolution an appropriation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Probably not.

Mr. CONKLING. Or even change it to a bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well, then what are we in the act of doing? This subject is now before us; the Senate is considering it; it is here, and what do Senators advocate? Here is the Public Printer, who has been the object of much reproach, first because he allowed Senators to order speeches, and printed them and sent them here and received pay from Senators, the law technically as it was said, requiring that the money should be put in his hands in advance. It was alleged to be a crime for him to do the printing and trust to the faith of Senators who had subscribed, and a serious inquiry was had to ascertain the length and breadth of the guilt of the Public Printer for doing that. Then came out charges of irregularity, of disregard of the formalities and technicalities of the law. Thus our attention has been called to this subject, and now what is proposed? One hundred and forty thousand dollars, and that only, by the action of both Houses, fortified by repeated conferences of conference committees, has been appropriated as the entire sum for printing for the Interior Department and the Agricultural Bureau, $9,000 of that money being appropriated for the Agricultural Bureau.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator——

Mr. CONKLING. I wish my friend would let me conclude my statement, and then I will hear him with great pleasure. Now we propose, making no appropriation whatever, warned by the Senator from Rhode Island of the facts, when we direct the printing of a work which is to cost $140,000 itself, or nearly that. Then where is the Public Printer to stand? One alternative is that there is to be committed to his discretion the question whether he will apply parcel of this $140,000, devoted to printing for that Department, to this book, or whether he will wholly refuse to devote anything to this book; whether he will undertake to rate and apportion this $140,000 as he pleases, or whether he will have to pick and choose and say, "I will print no Agricultural Reports; I will devote all this money to the residue," or "I will print some Agricultural Reports and devote only some of this money to the residue;" and by and by when we come back to ascertain the accountability of the Public Printer where does he stand and where do we stand? We have, when our attention was called to it, adopted a resolution grossly irregular, grossly tempting to this man, and uncertain as to what he should do.

Mr. ANTHONY. Compelling him to be uncertain.

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator says, in a sense compelling him to be uncertain, to make bricks without straw, to do that which, as the law stands, he has no right to do. In his discretion he passes upon it. He asks some individual Senator to advise him what he had better do, or he asks somebody else, or he evolves out of his own consciousness what perhaps he had better do, and when we come to hold him to his own responsibility we see that we have done an act destructive of all discipline, of all regularity of administration, disregarding all symmetry in legislation, opening the door for exactly that complaint which we may be called to consider.

I humbly submit that it is unjust to this officer, and that it is hardly worthy of the Senate to sit here with a resolution before it, when the chairman of the committee says "if you mean to print these books, appropriate the money; enable this man by law to justify himself in executing it, and do not pass a resolution directing it to be done when the Constitution says that no money shall be appropriated except by law," when every member of this body knows that this is not a law, but another mode of stimulating or directing this man to do a thing which he is to have no legal business to do after the Senate has made the direction. I voted against this resolution, as the Senator from California says he did, after hearing him, because when we cut down the appropriation of money for public printing one-third, to go and pile on an enormous item which would overtop it, if we had not cut it down, seemed to me to be utterly inconsistent with what we had done. Therefore I could not vote for it; but now, when more distinctly and sharply the figures are given to us, how can we justify ourselves in saying that this man, a subordinate officer, is to do a thing which, if he does do it, involves a wrong and which, if he refuses to do it, he is utterly to ignore the action of the Senate? Then it is said we can commit it to the House to do it when it is before us now, when here it is, and everybody says he does not object to its being considered, no technical objection standing in the way, just consider it and make it right; and we know all about it, for the facts are before us. I heard some Senator say "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I adopt that; and this is the very day, this is the very hour when this evil is pointed out to us, and I say we ought to make it right or we ought not to pass the resolution at all.

Mr. PADDOCK. I inquire of the Senator from New York if he does not think it is a little unfair to assume that the House will not make this appropriation in view of the fact that when they did appropriate for the expenses of the Government Printing Office they did not do it in the light of the fact that these publications would be authorized?

Mr. CONKLING. I should not think I was disrespectful to the House if I were to assume that the House would do just what it is proposed the Senate shall do, when it is proposed that it shall be done in this body, where there is no previous question, where there is none of that trip and twitch by which legislation is jerked through so quickly that you cannot see it go. When we have the abundant opportunity and do this thing, I do not think it will be disrespectful to the House to assume that they might do it; and as my friend [Mr. HAMLIN] says, whether they would do it or would not do it, we should not do it in violation of law. If it is so obligatory that my friend from Nebraska can trust the House to do it it does seem to me that he ought to trust himself and his fellow-Senators to do it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am willing to trust myself and the Senate and the House to do this thing in another way at another time and in perhaps a more proper form upon some appropriation bill. I will state to the Senator that I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has already prepared or is preparing a bill in reference to appropriations; in fact, as I believe, sir, with the view of covering these publications specially.

Mr. CONKLING. That is, a separate appropriation bill?

Mr. PADDOCK. I think it should be separate from this resolution. I think the appropriation itself should be placed upon an appropriation bill and not connected with this resolution in any manner, shape, or form.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a very frank statement and I am disposed to leave this subject on that assertion. If I understand the statement, as I construe it, it is this: it is a little easier to get this through by way of a resolution, which was voted for by many Senators in innocence of the fact—that a fulcrum is needed to complete it, and then take the chances of curing it by another bill. That is the idea.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think that it is more proper and for every reason safer to treat this proposition as an independent one, and the question of the appropriation afterward by itself.

Mr. CONKLING. For my part I am so primitive in my notions and so old-fashioned that I think the best way to do it is the way the Constitution says it shall be done, that is in round numbers to this effect: that you shall not directly or indirectly appropriate money out of the Treasury without making an appropriation according to law and by law, which means by the action of the two Houses and the action of the President, they being the law-making power. If any Senator can find out that it is wise to put the fingers of one House between the belt and the wheel by one kind of legislation so as to draw it in and necessitate afterward the passage of a separate bill for fear that if we did not put in the finger and the arm, and have the whole body pulled in by this process, they might refuse to appropriate the money, and if he can make that argument show that it ought to be done I think the same argument will show that it ought not to be done.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he assumes that because the authority to print is given, therefore the Printer is required absolutely, whether he may have the money or not, to print these documents?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator assume the contrary?

Mr. PADDOCK. I do assume the contrary, most certainly. The authority may be given, and if the money is not afterward supplied, he, of course, cannot and will not be required to print.

Mr. CONKLING. That is what I supposed the Senator would assume, and that is all I assume.

Mr. PADDOCK. If you do so authorize the Public Printer I think it is competent for him to stop if the appropriations are exhausted before he reaches this branch of the work, but, the publication being authorized, if a further appropriation is required it can be readily passed I am sure.

Mr. CONKLING. That is exactly what I supposed the Senator would assume and that is another way of presenting better than I did the objection to this whole proceeding. The Senator's argument is now that when we have passed this resolution it does not impose any obligation on the Printer; that it is a mere hurrah to do this thing; he is not to do it. Why? Because it would not give him any direction for the reason that this furnishes no money whatever to do it at all.

Mr. PADDOCK. There is no legal requirement that he shall do it unless he has the money.

Mr. CONKLING. To be ingenuous, as I have no doubt the Senator means to be, he ought to add the further opinion that, in addition to all that, it commits to the Printer, whoever he may be, the prerogative and the discretion to determine whether he will take this money and devote it, or deal it around to these different objects, so much to this, and more to that, and less to something else, or whether he will go on and devote his $140,000 to that to which it stands now devoted by law, and where undoubtedly it will go unless by this resolution or some other contrivance we say something which shall destroy that certainty and embark him on the sea of his own discretion as to what disposition he will make of it. I am surprised that Senators want to do this thing. I say nothing about the merits of it one way or another, but I am surprised that Senators should want to print a document which will cost $140,000, or whatever the sum is, for any information, and yet will not say on the face of the resolution what they mean. If they want it printed, appropriate the money to do it, but if they think it worth while to have it done, the resolution should not be passed to do the printing and then take the chance of getting in some other way some appropriation to carry it on.

Mr. LOGAN. I think there is no difficulty whatever in solving this problem. I cannot understand the difference between passing a separate appropriation bill for the amount of money to pay for the printing and adding that to the resolution itself. If the House of Representatives should concur in a resolution which we have passed for the printing of 300,000 Agricultural Reports, and the two Houses should have failed to make an appropriation for that printing, there then rests upon them a duty, and that is to make the appropriation; that is all there is to it. A mere reconsideration of this vote does not help it a particle. You can upon a separate bill just as easily as you can upon this resolution make such an appropriation. There is no authority extended over one that is not necessary to be extended over the other. We have the facts; they are brought to us. The chairman of the Committee on Printing says it will cost so much; and inasmuch as I am rather inclined to be a practical man more than otherwise, while my friends were discussing this proposition I drafted a bill and will offer it now, and ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to its being read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information as a part of the speech of the Senator from Illinois.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That $130,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to be applied to the printing of 300,000 Agricultural Reports ordered by a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Here is another bill which has been drawn which I will have read for information also. The only thing about this matter that some Senators do not like is that they wish the appropriation to go with the resolution. I always like to accommodate my friends, and if they feel better pleased with having the appropriation go with the order to print, I shall make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill suggested by the Senator from New Jersey.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be printed 100,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, 20,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate and 80,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives; and that he also cause to be printed 200,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875, 43,750 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 131,250 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies shall be for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture; and that the sum of $130,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the execution of the work, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If, by common consent, the bill I have proposed can pass, I think we had better pass it. Of course one objection would carry it over.

Mr. LOGAN. As I have the floor, I have but a word more to say. I do not see why there should be any opposition to the printing of this report. Senators who represent agricultural communities know the great value of this report to that portion of the constituency of this country. The leading agriculturists of this country prefer this report to anything else. They obtain therefrom great information.

Mr. ANTHONY. They prefer it because they do not have to pay for it.

Mr. LOGAN. They prefer it because they do not have to pay for it, the Senator says. No, sir; that is not the reason they prefer it. The reason why they prefer it is because it is a report made upon subjects in which they are interested and out of which they gain information which aids them in advancing that interest. That is the reason, and none other. I suppose the Senator might say for the same reason that the people would desire a report on any other subject because it cost them nothing. I suppose his constituents are more glad to have his speeches because they do not have to pay for them on the same principle, and yet my judgment is that they get as much information out of an Agricultural Report as they would out of one of his speeches; that is on the subject of agriculture, not on the subject of printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no doubt of that; but I have never asked to have my speeches printed at public cost.

Mr. LOGAN. But they do not cost the man who gets them anything; that is what I am talking about, not what it costs the Senator or any of my honorable friends here. I had reference to the cost to the individuals who receive the report. I say it does not cost them anything, nor does any other document cost them anything. If the reasoning is good in one instance it certainly is good in the other. When I referred to the Senator's speeches, I did not mean that his speeches were not as good as, and great deal better on some subjects than, those of any other Senator, especially so far as I am concerned, but certainly not on the subject of agriculture. I presume a speech of his on agriculture would be a good deal like a speech of mine on metaphysics or something of that kind. It certainly would not be a very readable document. I know that the great agricultural interest of this country are much interested in this report and always have been, and we never have published agricultural reports sufficient to satisfy not the whole community but those who really take an interest in examining these reports. I know so far as I am concerned—I only speak for myself—I have more calls from men, and intelligent men, for this report than I have for any other report that is printed by Congress, I care not on what subject it may be.

For these reasons I am in favor of appropriating the money necessary to print this report and opposed to the reconsideration of the resolution, and I agree with the Senator from New York. He says that somehow or other there is a desire to get the finger between the belt and the wheel in order to retain this. I do not care how you fix it, I want it retained. I agree that he is correct. I do not want it reconsidered, for the reason, that the Senate might vote it down. That is my reason, and I am frank enough to state it. I do not want it reconsidered. It was the sense of the Senate at the time it was passed, and I hope it is the sense of the Senate now. But inasmuch as it has been passed by both Houses, at this late hour of the session I do not want to see it reconsidered by one House or the other.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Two concurrent resolutions were passed by the House. There was a resolution pending here to print 25,000 copies. The Senator from Illinois was not in when those two resolutions were added as amendments to the resolution which was pending in the Senate. Now it has got to go to the House to be concurred in, and it seems to me that as it will satisfy everybody better, the best thing we can do is to take up by unanimous consent the bill which I introduced in which I make the appropriation and direct the printing. We can take it up by unanimous consent, and of course every Senator will vote as he pleases. I have no doubt that it will pass.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Now I ask for the consideration of the bill which I offered.

The bill (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875 was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, directed to cause to be printed 100,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, 20,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate and 80,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives; and that he also cause to be printed 200,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875, 43,750 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate and 131,250 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture; and the sum of $130,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the execution of the work, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. PADDOCK. I thought the understanding of the Senate was that the substitute in the shape of this bill was to be adopted without question.

Mr. SARGENT. That it should be brought up. I have not objected to its being brought up, but I made no arrangement upon the floor of the Senate or elsewhere by which my right to vote against the proposition can be given up. I am not making any delay; I simply want, in compliance with the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, to state one or two facts showing the necessity of the action which is now proposed by the Senate, not for the passage of the measure, but that it should be in this form rather than any other.

Congress, by the sundry civil bill, appropriated for the public printing and binding $1,133,737.50, which they divided among the Departments. A few of these I will notice as illustrating the manner in which we appropriate for public printing.

The estimates were considerably over a third higher than this, and the appropriation of last year was a third higher than the amount thus appropriated. Following the precedent heretofore a division was made of this gross amount among the Departments, and for this year we appropriate for the printing and binding of the State Department, $15,000; for the Treasury Department, $180,000; for the War Department, $72,000; for the Navy Department, $39,000; for the Interior Department, $135,000; for the Agricultural Department, $9,000; for the Department of Justice, $6,000; for the Post-Office Department, $105,000; for the Congressional Library, $15,000; for the Supreme Court of the United States, $20,000; for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $3,000; for the Court of Claims, $10,000; and for the debates and proceedings of Congress, $100,000. I have added up these different amounts at my seat and I may not be exactly correct, but they amount to about $709,000, distributed among the different Departments. The balance which is left, which is $324,000, is for printing ordered by Congress or ordered by law outside of the separate Departments. The amount ordered by law, which is irrevocable from year to year, and we have not modified it at all, by such information as I can hastily get, is at least $110,000, as, for instance, the printing of the message of the President and accompanying documents, the printing of the opinions of the Attorneys-General of the United States, the Congressional Directory, and things of that kind which are fixed by permanent statute from year to year and have not been changed this year. The amount is much more than $110,000, but I have been able to gather items enough to amount to $110,000 already. This reduces the amount of $324,000, apparently left available for the action of Congress, to $214,000. Then $130,000 will probably be the cost of the printing of these 300,000 volumes; I mean to say after they are stereotyped the cost yet to be paid upon these, perhaps including binding—though I think that would be a little more—would be $130,000, which would leave but $84,000 for all the other printing which Congress orders. Not a day passes here while we are in session that we do not order extra copies of some document. Some of these are very essential indeed; some of them give information to the country upon very important matters; some are political. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] objected to printing political documents; and yet they are necessary, and all parties concede the necessity where a political document favors its shade of opinion; but where those documents relate to great facts occurring in the country, are testimony taken under oath, which is necessary for public information, they ought to be printed; the facts should go out to the country; and there ought to be no party question upon the mere matter of printing them and letting men of all parties weigh them for what they are worth. But aside from this kind of printing there is much more that is necessary to facilitate our own business. All our bills are printed, all our reports are printed, and the cost of all this must come out of this appropriation, and we should have left but $84,000 for all the current work of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. Running the next session.

Mr. SARGENT. Of course this is inadequate. The principal objection which I urged to the printing of this document was that it absorbed nearly the whole available fund for the printing ordered by Congress for the fiscal year, and it was not right to put the Public Printer in the dilemma of refusing to obey a joint resolution of Congress or of making a deficiency by expending money which had not been appropriated for that purpose.

I have another objection which simply influences my vote, but perhaps would hardly have induced me to take any time on this proposition at all; and that is I think we should curtail as much as possible the printing of ordinary public documents. It is a very expensive system, amounts to a great deal of money, as a million and a half appropriation for printing shows; but that simply influences my vote, and I do not desire to delay proceedings for that reason.

Mr. LOGAN. If we printed more agricultural reports and dug out fewer rivers, we should be better off.

Mr. SARGENT. Perhaps that is true. One other remark and I shall yield the floor. Senators have said something about printing the mining report. Perhaps I did not pay sufficient attention to the remark that was made on that point. I stated at the time hastily that I had procured that to be stricken out last year from the sundry civil bill. On taxing my recollection since, I opposed it last year on the sundry civil bill and it went out. But aside from that circumstance, instead of my having from the occupations of my people any hostility to the agricultural interest, I desire to say that my State is one of the greatest agricultural States of this Union. The amount of wheat which we export to foreign countries compares with perhaps any other State in the Union; I doubt if it is excelled by any other State. My State is peculiarly an agricultural State. When it was originally acquired from Mexico, the question was raised in the Senate of the United States whether it was worthy of acquisition, and Daniel Webster used the remark that it was a country of rocks with rattlesnakes enough to fence it. Since that time, however, we have changed the opinion of all intelligent men, as well as of our own people. We have developed there by our industry and skill varied agricultural industries of moment, and I have no doubt that the people of my State who are engaged in that business receive as thankfully as the people of any section the Agricultural Reports. I am willing to any reasonable extent to satisfy that demand.

Mr. HARVEY. I hope this bill will pass and pass at once. A large majority of the members of the House by their votes have shown that they approve this publication, and it is made in the interest of the greatest productive industry of the country. The Senator from California has stated that he has no doubt his constituents desire to be furnished with the information contained in these reports. I have no doubt that much the largest number of the constituents of every Senator here feel a great anxiety for the information contained in these reports. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to say one word. The Senator from California has shown that the money for the public printing now available under the existing appropriation for the current year is $234,000. If this publication had been ordered without any specific appropriation, it would have reduced the appropriation to about $84,000, deducting from it the $110,000 ordered to be printed by permanent statutes. In my opinion the $84,000 has already been ordered by this Congress. I do not believe that the reports of the investigating committees and the other printing which we have ordered can be done within the amount that has been appropriated. Perhaps the country might not suffer a great deal if some of the printing should fail; but if some printing that has been ordered fails, the fault is in Congress in ordering work to be done and then failing to make the necessary appropriation to perform it, and while the officer charged with performing it is under legal penalties if he obeys the orders of Congress. A part of the $110,000 ordered by permanent statutes is in my opinion and in the opinion of the Senate a very unnecessary expenditure of public money. Twice on the report of the Committee on Printing we have repealed, so far as the Senate could repeal, the statutes that required a considerable part of this printing; but that action has not met with the favor of the other House. I think we might save half of it without any loss to the public service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion to reconsider lying over until action is taken on the bill presented by the Senator from New Jersey? There is no objection. The bill will be considered as read twice and it is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Key, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Cooper, Dawes, Eaton, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, Wallace, and Whyte—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, and Thurman—24.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now the resolution had better be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better reject that resolution so as to take it off the Calendar. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

EDUCATIONAL APPROPRIATION.

Mr. PATTERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate be requested to insert an appropriation of $5,000 in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of the Commissioner of Education contained in his letter of August 7, 1876, herewith annexed.

COMMISSION AS TO STANDARD OF VALUE.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives to appoint a commission to inquire into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver and the causes thereof, the policy of restoring the double standard, and of continuing greenbacks concurrently with the metallic standards, reported a bill (S. No. 1037) to appoint a commission to inquire into the change in the relative value of gold and silver and the causes thereof, the policy of restoring the double standard, and of continuing greenbacks concurrently with the metallic standards; which was read and passed to the second reading.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. HAMLIN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] for the printing of extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he will not yield until I call up a bill from the Committee on Appropriations to pay a deficiency for the New York post-office and custom-house which I think ought to be passed? I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. EATON. Certainly; I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill I have indicated.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4060) to provide for the payment of certain indebtedness incurred in the construction of the New York court-house and post-office building.

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the indebtedness incurred in the construction of the building for court-house and post-office in New York City, in excess of the amount appropriated for that purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, the sum of $227,566.78 is appropriated by the bill, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings in their report to the House of Representatives of July 17, 1876.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota how it was that, in violation of law, this amount was expended by any agent of the Government on any building? I thought the Committee on Appropriations were in the habit of holding officers to the appropriations. I do not mean to oppose the bill, but I want to know how it happened, because it seems to me if the architects or employés of public buildings can, at their discretion, overrun the appropriations made by law and then come to Congress to supply the deficiency, it is a very bad way of managing our fiscal affairs.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations do not attempt to justify the fact that this appropriation is required because of an excess of expenditure over appropriations. On the other hand they condemn that act, and I was instructed so to state to the Senate. However, I wish to say while condemning the act under any circumstances, for I think the law should not be violated at all and that no sufficiently good reason can be given for it, that there were some very strongly palliating circumstances in this case. I will read a short statement from the superintendent giving his reasons. In answer to a question from the committee of investigation he said:

I came into this office in January. That building was not even plastered then. The building had been promised to the Post-Office Department and the Law Department two years before, and I felt, if it was possible, it was my duty to get the building completed in time to get the courts in there in May, that that effort should be made; so I made a very strong effort to get the building completed, and we did an enormous amount of work. There was a tremendous pressure upon us by the Post-Office Department to get their offices out of where they were, and if we could not get the courts in there by the 15th of May, we would have been obliged to rent the building in which the courts were then held for another year. We endeavored to advance the prosecution of the Government buildings, and carried on the work with great vigor, and it was out of that pressure and the enormous amount of work that was done that these expenses were created in excess of the money in the Treasury. No injury came to the Government by it.

I think these circumstances certainly do palliate the offense very much.

Mr. STEVENSON. Whose letter is that and of what date?

Mr. WINDOM. It is an extract from the testimony of Mr. Potter, the Architect, taken before the committee who investigated this matter. I will say that the committee of the House have so thoroughly investigated it as to produce a document of this size, [exhibiting the report,] which sets out all the items that are to be paid out of this deficiency bill; and they say:

Your committee find that a full and valuable consideration has been received by the Government from the persons claiming compensation; that the articles furnished are of good quality, and, as far as your committee were able to learn, furnished at reasonable prices, and the articles of furniture placed in said building are all necessary for the use of the persons occupying said building engaged in the public service.

They also say:

Your committee are satisfied from all the evidence that all the persons holding claims against the Government embraced in the foregoing schedule are innocent parties, that they acted in good faith in the premi ses, and that in equity they are entitled to have their claims paid.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] inquires who they are. The list is given in this document.

Mr. DAWES. What I desire to know is whether the parties concerned were the original contractors or whether after the building was completed as a building this expenditure was among the merchants of the city in procuring furniture.

Mr. WINDOM. Here we have iron-work, $36,725, and the names of the parties given; for fire-proof shutters, $16,152.05; mail-elevators; iron-lathing; cut granite, &c.; iron-work, service of superintendent——

Mr. DAWES. How much cut granite was it necessary to get in there before the courts could use the building?

Mr. WINDOM. I suppose some of the debts for the building itself remained unpaid.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to find out whether this money was to go to the original contractor, who must have known just what money was appropriated. If it was to go to merchants outside with whom the officers dealt for the purpose of procuring furniture and the like, that would put a different aspect upon it. They were entirely innocent men, probably.

Mr. WINDOM. Mainly this money is due to persons who furnished articles of furniture and for finishing up the building, as stated in this evidence.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAN FRANCISCO MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2692) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and I ask that it be considered now. It will take but a moment.

The being no objection, the Senate as in the Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill. It relinquishes to the city and county of San Francisco all the right and title of the United States to the following-described property, being the two fifty-vara lots on which the old marine-hospital building now stands, fronting two hundred and seventy-five feet on the north side of Harrison street, between Spear and Main streets, with a uniform depth of one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches, as laid down on the official map of said city, to be used by the city and county of San Francisco solely for the purpose of a sailors' home. If the same shall at any time be used for any other than the purpose stated, or if the home shall not be opened within one year from the passage of the act, all right and title hereby relinquished shall revert back to, and again vest in, the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MORRILL. Has any report at this session been made by the Department as to what could be obtained from the sale of this property?

Mr. SARGENT. I have the House report in my hand showing that the whole amount the Government was offered was about $700. This is a building which was built away back in 1853. It was badly shattered by an earthquake, and it would cost probably fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to repair it. The ladies who wish to use it as a sailors' home have sufficient money to put the building in repair and are disposed to do it. It is a very worthy object. The building is away off on one side of the city, and the Government has not used it for twenty years. The building could not be put to better use and would not bring any money if sold. There is a unanimous report of the Naval Committee, and the bill has passed the House of Representatives. I trust the Senator will not object, as it is a very benevolent object and the property is now really of no value to the Government.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4085) to repeal part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me a moment? I think there will not be any objection to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing a commission to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHYTE. I object.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. SPENCER. I think if this was understood there would be no objection. It is a House resolution. Certainly there is some government needed here, and some steps ought to be taken during the recess. During the session of Congress it is impossible to prepare any bill. This resolution, as amended, provides for a committee of three Senators, to be designated by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House, to be designated by the Speaker of the House, to sit during the recess and frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, to be reported at the next session of Congress.

Mr. WHYTE. I object, because it must give rise to discussion.

Mr. SPENCER. I hardly think it will give rise to discussion.

Mr. PADDOCK. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for.

Mr. PADDOCK. I only object because I am satisfied this measure will give rise to infinite discussion.

HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 2d instant:

Resolved, That 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the late massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, when I had the floor yesterday afternoon, just before yielding I was speaking of the manner in which honorable Senators on this floor saw fit to speak of the distinguished gentleman who had been nominated as the candidate of the democratic party for the high office of President of the United States. There is one thing in that rejoices me, and I hope it may be so until the end of this discussion. That is that no democratic Senator has yet found the occasion of attacking the character of either of the nominees of the republican party. We recognize, or at least I do, the two gentlemen who have been placed in nomination by the republican party as highly respectable gentlemen in point of character and, so far as I know, in point of ability. I have not the honor of knowing personally the republican nominee for the Presidency, but I presume him to be a gentleman of fair ability.

And now I ought to say a word, for I care to say no more, regarding the position and character of the candidate of the democratic party for the office of President. He stands up high, no words of mine could elevate him in the opinion of his countrymen, but I have a word or two to say with regard to the candidate for the Vice-Presidency, because he has been the subject of abuse on this floor, unnecessary abuse. The distinguished Senator from Vermont, not now in his seat, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] in an argument of some length, has endeavored to convince the Senate, and through the Senate the country, not that there has been a terrible and horrible outrage at Hamburgh, but that Mr. Hendricks, the candidate of the democratic party for

Vice-President, is unworthy of the position because he is not honest, because in his political opinions he is not honest and will not carry out the laws under the Constitution of the United States. Sir, that is a severe charge to make against a man nominated as a candidate for high position, and the Senator has gone back and with an air of triumph, pointing to his books, said, "No man will deny it, for here is the record." The record of what? The record of the votes of an honest man in this Chamber with regard to a certain amendment, if it may be called such, proposed to the Constitution of the United States. Sir, has it come to this that Senators from Indiana and Delaware and Connecticut and New York are to go to Vermont to ascertain what is true constitutional doctrine in this country? Has the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee fed on any meat that makes him our Cæsar? He says Mr. Hendricks voted against the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. I hope he did if he believed it an improper amendment. If so, he ought to have voted against it. I have some good reading here. I wish the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] was in his seat; I desire the Secretary to read what purports to be an extract from a speech delivered by the Senator from Indiana in Indiana on the 29th day of September, 1865. I will thank the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Very well, say some; that is all very well if we can get the negroes to go there. But let me say that the colored States would be a balance of power in this country. I ask, is it desirable to have a colored State government? I say it is not; it is not for many reasons. One reason is that such States would perpetually constitute a balance of power. They would be held bound by that stringent tie that ever held men together: the tie of color and race, the tie of a down-trodden and despised race. As 300,000 slaveholders by a common tie were able to govern this nation for a long time, so 4,000,000 people bound together by a much stronger tie, despised by the whole world as they have been, would constantly vote and act together; and their united vote would constitute a balance of power that might control the government of this nation.

I submit, then, however clearly and strongly we may admit the natural right of the negro, I submit it to the intelligence of the people that colored State governments are not desirable; that they will bring about results that are not to be hoped for; that finally they would threaten to bring about and, I believe, would result in a war of races.

THE SOLUTION OF THE DIFFICULTY.

Now the question turns up, how can this be avoided? If I had the power I would arrange it in this way: I would give these men a period of probation and preparation; I would give them time to acquire a little property and get a little education; time to learn something about the simplest forms of business and prepare themselves for the exercise of political power. At the end of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, let them come into the enjoyment of their political rights. By that time these States will have been so completely filled up by emigration from the North and from Europe that the negroes will be in a permanent minority. Why? Because the negroes have no emigration, nothing but the natural increase, while we have emigration from all the world and natural increase besides. Thus, by postponing the thing only to such times as the negroes are qualified to enjoy political rights, the dangers I have been considering would have fully passed away, their influence would no longer be dangerous in the manner I have indicated, and a conflict of races would not be more likely to happen than it now is in Massachusetts. In Massachusetts the negroes have exercised political rights for twenty-five years, and yet there has been no disturbance there, no conflict of races. Why? Because the negroes have been in the minority.

Mr. EATON. So it seems, Mr. President, that in 1865 the honorable Senator from Indiana himself, the Jupiter Tonans of this whole business, occupied a position such as I occupied at that time. Has he changed his opinion? These were the honest convictions of the Senator from Indiana in 1865. What has occurred in the history of the country in the last eleven years that should have caused a change in the opinions of the honorable Senator? He has changed. Does anybody blame him for the position he occupied ten or eleven years ago? Nobody. Does anybody blame Hendricks for the position which he occupied ten or eleven years ago? No honorable man, no honest man. Sir, Mr. Hendricks did not believe that the amendment which was proposed was a proper one, and so he voted against it. Mr. Hendricks did not believe that the African race had the capability of self-government; neither did the honorable Senator from Indiana. But, sir, what is the opinion of Mr. Hendricks to-day? He says in his letter, as Mr. Tilden says in his letter, "We accept the amendments of the Constitution;" and I should like to see that Senator rise in his place here—I will give him my time—and say when it was that Samuel J. Tilden or Thomas A. Hendricks, or any other—I do not now speak of my southern friends, because gentlemen say they have been in rebellion—Tilden, or Hendricks, or any other leading democrat north of the Potomac River but what was always true to the Constitution. I ask any Senator to rise in his place and dispute it. There never was that man; not one. We stand by the Constitution. We stood by it from 1789 down to 1861—the old Constitution. We stand by it now with its amendments. We did not like them all; I did not for one; nor did the honorable Senator from Indiana, in my judgment, looking at his speech; but they have become a part of the organic law of the land. The democratic party has always been true to the organic law of the land; and if every republican Senator can put his hand upon his heart and say that the republican party from 1856 to 1861 was true to the Constitution, let him say so.

But, sir, I do not apologize for any act of Tilden or Hendricks. They are clad in an armor of steel, and I might well say, "Gnaw vipers! you gnaw steel." What next? We are told by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, traveling from one end of the Union to the other, that the rebel State of Texas has done a certain thing; and that word "rebel" seems to him a sweet morsel, and he rolls it under his tongue as a sweet morsel. When will Senators forget words of that character? When will Senators remember that this is a Union of equal States, and that Georgia, and Virginia, and Tennessee, and Carolina are represented here by the peers of the Senators from Vermont, and Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and New York? We are here as equals; and the term and word "rebel" ought not to be howled on this floor by anybody. It is done, and it can be done for only one purpose, and that is to taunt the representatives of the Southern States, to goad them, if possible, into some action that may not be pleasant to their friends at the North. It has no other object. But the distinguished Senator from Vermont has arrived in Texas, and he says—I will try to give his own words—"Democracy in Texas is but another name for re-organized rebellion." Sir, is that proper language to come from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this body, that the democratic party in Texas "is but another name for re-organized rebellion?" And why? He says the first thing they did was to break an irrevocable bond. This is the first time I ever heard that an irrevocable compact could be broken. It is a contradiction in terms. It is not good sense. An irrevocable thing cannot be broken. In the first place the philosophy of the distinguished Senator from Vermont is at fault; his knowledge of human government is at fault; his knowledge of what men can and cannot do is at fault. Sir, human intelligence and human power can form nothing that is irrevocable. It is not in the power of the Senate of the United States, it is not in the power of the State of New York, it is not in the power of the United States of America to form an irrevocable compact with anybody or anything. The term "irrevocable" is only to apply to Him who governs the universe. Our fathers during the revolutionary war formed an irrevocable and perpetual union. How long did it last? Ten years. Then they formed an irrevocable perpetual Constitution of the United States, and it has been amended fifteen times. The whole frame-work of this Government of compacts has been changed, and what five and twenty years ago was the very life-blood of the Constitution has no existence within it to-day. Talk about an irrevocable act—a constitutional lawyer, an able one I agree, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this Senate to talk about an irrevocable compact between two political bodies! Irrevocable compact! Ah, sir, he has had the hardihood to say upon this floor that the people of Texas revolutionized their government. What does he mean by it? He means just what we do at the North whenever we please to change our constitution. He says it was done in a revolutionary manner, not done under and by the terms of the instrument itself. Sir, time will not allow me to go into a discussion of this character. We had the same sort of an irrevocable constitution in my own State; but the best minds of my State, the best minds of New York, the best minds of the whole North are of the opinion that the people through their Legislature have the right to call conventions to form new constitutions. Such is my opinion, and such is the opinion of every distinguished lawyer that I know in my State, no matter what his political views may be. There is but one opinion, and it seems that the people who are represented in part by my distinguished friend upon the floor of this Senate [Mr. MAXEY] had the hardihood, the people of the great State of Texas had the hardihood through their Legislature to call a convention to change their constitution without consulting the distinguished Senator from Vermont!

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say that the resolution submitted to the people of Texas by the Legislature for the purpose of calling a convention was voted upon by the people and a convention was ordered by the people by a vote of more than 50,000 majority.

Mr. EATON. Sir, when the people whom I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor desire to change their constitution they will consult with their own leading men; and Hubbard and Ingersoll, Hawley and Harrison, and a thousand other distinguished men will determine with regard to the change in their form of government without consulting the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator or any other body on the face of the earth. And when the great State of New York, an empire of itself, with its five millions of people, desires to change its organic law, her Tilden, her Seymour, her CONKLING, her KERNAN, her Morgan will determine that matter, not the distinguished Senator from the State of Vermont.

Sir, Texas saw fit to exercise her right as a sovereign State of this Union. I say "sovereign State," for sovereign she is, for sovereign in many respects every State in this Union is. That is one of them, too. I thank God for it. There is where the sovereignty comes in; and that is sovereignty, if I understand the use of language and the use of words. When a State within the limits of this Union can form its own organic law in spite of the power of every other State in the Union, it is exercising the very highest branch of sovereignty. Sir, Texas saw fit to change her constitution, and as my distinguished friend says she did it by calling a convention of the people through her Legislature. Delegates were elected to that convention——

Mr. MAXEY. It was submitted to the people and ratified by the people.

Mr. EATON. That resolution was submitted to the people, which was entirely unnecessary in my judgment, but no matter, it makes it democratic; that resolution was submitted to the people, and by them obtained over 50,000 majority, and the Senator from Vermont says it was revolutionary. The people's delegates met in convention, formed a constitution and submitted it to the people, and by the people it was ratified by more than 50,000 majority, as I am informed, and that constitution is now the organic law of that State, not to be changed by the action of this or any other portion of the Union. Why talk about it? Why was it brought up here by the distinguished Senator from Vermont? Simply because the Senator says Texas made a compact by which if she was let back into the Union, suffered to come back into the Union, she was to give one-fourth of all her general revenues for school purposes. Why, sir, was Texas ever out of the Union? Five hundred thousand men laid down their lives and $4,000,000,000 of the earnings of the people were expended for the very purpose of keeping that and other States in the Union. I had supposed that Texas never went out. I know she tried to get out; but we would not let her; we kept her in. Now, says my distinguished friend, she made a compact and agreed to do certain things if we would take her back, let her become again a part of this great confederation of States; and, by the way, that was not his language; that is mine. Sir, what business had the Congress of the United States to make terms of that character with any State? It is for the people of New York, of Kentucky, of Georgia, of Vermont, and of Texas to determine what part of their revenues shall be applied for school or any other purposes. The Congress of the United States have nothing to do with a matter of that character, and whenever they undertake to do anything of that sort they travel out of their line of duty and law and right.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to state the exact facts in regard to that matter?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. On Saturday the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] arraigned the people of Texas in this language. He quoted from the constitution of 1869, adopted by the republican party, this clause:

> The public lands heretofore given to counties shall be under the control of the Legislature and may be sold under such regulations as the Legislature may prescribe, and in such case the proceeds of the sale shall be added to the school fund.

He then added:

> What does the revolutionary democratic constitution provide? It provides—

What the constitution does provide is that the county school fund belongs to the county of right, and that the constitution of 1869 had no authority whatever to interfere with the vested rights of the counties in their school funds. The convention which framed the revolutionary constitution, as he calls it, was called, as stated by the Senator from Connecticut, on a resolution submitted to the people, and by them adopted by an overwhelming majority of 50,000. The constitution was made and ratified in like manner. On that point, I wonder if the decision of the supreme court of the State of Texas when every member of that bench was a republican would be authority. If the Senator will give me the time, I will read a clause from a decision directly on this point, and show how the republican supreme court of the State of Texas thought in regard to this very question in contradistinction to how it has been represented here on this floor, and which I attempted on Saturday to have corrected but was not allowed to do so.

In the case of Galveston County vs. Tankersley, reported in the thirty-ninth volume of the Texas Supreme Court Reports, a decision in 1873 in which the direct question came up between the county of Galveston and Tankersley and others who had located land certificates upon the land belonging to that county, the county of Galveston being a corporation capable of suing and being sued under the laws of Texas instituted a suit in the nature of what is there known as an action of trespass to try title, to recover the land, and did so. Here is what the supreme court of the State of Texas, every member of which was at the time a republican, in the year 1873, say about the republican constitution of 1869 and about this identical clause which the Senator from Vermont quoted on Saturday:

> This suit was brought by Galveston County in 1867—

Mark you, 1867, not 1873, two years before the constitution of 1875 was adopted and while the constitution of 1869, the republican constitution, was in full force—

> This suit was brought by Galveston County in 1867, and, on the adoption of our present constitution—

The constitution of 1869—

> the defendants interposed a plea in abatement, alleging that since the institution of this suit, and since the filing of their answer, the title to the land sued for and claimed by plaintiff had passed out of Galveston County and become vested in the State of Texas by the new constitution.

That is the position of the Senator from Vermont. The court say:

> We do not consider that it was the purpose and intent of the framers of the constitution to cancel all the solemn contracts made with the several counties in regard to the school land.
> But we do not hesitate to say that if such was the purpose and intention of the convention, still they had no power or authority to do so. These grants were solemn acts of a contract made with the several counties, and this contract with Galveston County was duly executed years before the adoption of the constitution. The State had parted with the title to a body-corporate, capable of receiving and holding title to land, and she has not the power or authority, under the Constitution of the United States, to recall her grants or violate her executed contracts at pleasure. (Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87; Trustees of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward, 4 Wheaton, 570.) In the latter case the court say: "A contract is a compact between two or more persons. * * * A grant, in its own nature, amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to re-assert it." In the same case the court say: "It may also be admitted that corporations for mere public government, such as towns, cities, and counties, may in many respects be subject to legislative control. But it will hardly be contended that, in respect to such corporations, the legislative power is so transcendental that it may, at its will, take away the private property of the corporation, or change the use of its private funds."

So much for the authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator if he considers that decision of the supreme court of Texas to be good law?

Mr. MAXEY. Well, Mr. President, I am taking up the time of the Senator from Connecticut and I shall be short. I stated that it was the decision of the supreme court of Texas when every member of that court was a republican, and the decision of the supreme court of the State, delivered by Mr. Justice Ogden, a republican, upon a republican constitution adopted in 1869, in which he declares that the effort of that constitution to do precisely what the Senator from Vermont commended on Saturday, was revolutionary, was unconstitutional, null and void, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States. I say that the exposition of the law by the highest judicial tribunal known to the law is to me the law of the land so far as Texas is concerned, and that was the exposition given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, but my friend has missed the point.

Mr. MAXEY. No, sir; I am taking up the time of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly hope the Senator will indulge me.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to add one word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Vermont is asking the Senator from Texas a question whether he regards that as good law. I cannot permit my time to be taken up by a discussion between my distinguished friend from Vermont and my distinguished friend from Texas with regard to the ability and the character of the late supreme court of Texas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What can the Senator permit, then?

Mr. EATON. It is republican law, and it ought to satisfy the honorable Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield longer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no. The Senator from Connecticut is too courteous a gentleman for that, notwithstanding the Chair.

Mr. MAXEY. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Texas allow me to correct him before he goes on?

Mr. MAXEY. I have not control of the floor, though I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. EATON. Go on, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. EATON. I ought to say here that my friend from Vermont shall have all the time that he will say is parliamentary and proper. The Senator from Texas desired to read a clause from a decision of the supreme court of his own State with regard to the very constitution that was in question here the other day. He has read it.

Mr. MAXEY. That supreme court was a republican court, every member of it.

Mr. EATON. That report goes for what it is worth. If it is good law, then it should satisfy the honorable Senator from Vermont; if it is not good law, he will have ample time and opportunity to attack it; and really if he desires to attack that law and wants a little of my time, he shall have it now. I do not want, however, a long debate between my friends while I am on the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I want to ask my friend from Texas——

Mr. MAXEY. I will go one step further——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Connecticut yielded the floor to the Senator from Texas. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator from Texas goes on I wish to ask him the courtesy of allowing me to call his attention to the precise point that was in discussion the other day. If he is not willing, I have nothing to say.

Mr. MAXEY. I am perfectly willing to discuss any question of constitutional law with the Senator from Vermont, though I am not so wise or so distinguished as he may be, whenever the occasion will give us both time to do ourselves justice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is not willing now to have me correct the misapprehension into which he has fallen.

Mr. MAXEY. I would yield if I had the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Connecticut says you do have the floor.

Mr. MAXEY. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to ask my honorable friend from Texas if what I said the other day was not that this new constitution of the State of Texas as it is called—I do not know whether in point of law it is new or not; that depends on its validity—did not substantially change the old constitution in respect of the appropriation of public money for the use of schools? Now the Senator comes to me with a decision of the supreme court of Texas which holds that the old constitution in certain respects about county lands, as I understand, lands granted to counties, was inoperative.

Mr. MAXEY. That you yourself quoted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose it was inoperative and unconstitutional, what has that to do with the question? Does that make the new constitution any more constitutional than the old one was?

Mr. MAXEY. It seems to me that if there were vested rights in the various counties of Texas to their lands, if the State of Texas or the republic of Texas—for part of it was during the days of the republic—parted with its title to lands by patent, the State or republic became divested of all right, title, or interest it had therein, and it became vested in the counties to which it had been granted, then any attempt on the part of this constitution to divest vested rights was in itself unconstitutional, null, and void. This land had been parted with to the various counties of the State, patented to those counties; the expense of the location, survey, and issue of patents was all paid for by the various counties; the right became vested in those counties by the issuance of those patents; and the constitution of 1869 attempted to divest vested rights; and the supreme court appointed by a republican governor and confirmed by a republican senate declared that clause of the constitution unconstitutional, null, and void. So far, then, as that question is concerned I leave it as settled by the highest judicial tribunal known to the State of Texas which had the right to pronounce on that constitution.

Now, Mr. President, one other point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has missed the point again entirely that I was putting to him.

Mr. MAXEY. No, sir; one other point. It was charged that the democratic party had thrown its whole weight against the dissemination of education by public schools, and the action of the fourteenth Legislature was quoted, which expired before the last democratic convention was held in this present year in January; and the second clause of the democratic platform adopted by that convention is:

> The democratic party now and in the past, adhering to its policy of maintaining an efficient system of general education, declares it to be the duty of the Legislature of the State to speedily establish and make provision for the support and maintenance of public free-schools; and to this end to exercise the whole power with which it is invested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did the Legislature do it?

Mr. MAXEY. Since that time another Legislature, not the fourteenth to which the Senator referred but the fifteenth Legislature, is to-day in session. My own business here has occupied my whole time so that I have not had the means of keeping up with the senate and house journals; the general laws have not been published; and therefore I cannot say what has been done; but I do say that here was a solemn command given by the democratic party in a State convention, and the largest ever held in the State, to do all in their power to advance education and all that the constitution gives them the right to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask——

Mr. MAXEY. I will state now that I have occupied this much of the time of the Senator from Connecticut by his consent because the subject of my own State was up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Connecticut allow me to ask the Senator from Texas one question?

Mr. EATON. I had rather my friend should state some one point, because this will be interminable if it goes on in this way. My friend and I may wish to get into a discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish only to ask one question.

Mr. EATON. One; but I fear it will lead to another.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then my friend declines to allow me to ask one question of the Senator from Texas on this very point.

Mr. EATON. No, I will not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will ask my friend from Texas, taking these two constitutions, the one of 1869 that was adopted and ratified by the Congress of the United States under this solemn and express stipulation that as to public schools it should stay as it was in substance, and the new one when the democratic party came into power in that State, the new one of 1874, whether in respect of the appropriation of the general revenues of the State that by the old constitution were to be employed to the extent of one quarter for public schools and the new one that they need not be employed at all unless the Legislature chooses to do it—my question is whether that is going forward or going back?

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, one moment. I beg in all kindness to say that the question is not a fair one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then decline to let it be answered and go ahead.

Mr. EATON. I will decline to let it be answered and I will go ahead.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

Mr. EATON. I decline because the gentleman put the same question the other day, precisely the same question to the Senator from Texas that he puts now again. If he has any question he desires to put to me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut, then?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the Senator from Connecticut the keeper of my friend from Texas, or ought my friend from Texas not be allowed to determine whether my question to him is a fair one or not?

Mr. EATON. Sir; I am no man's keeper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you ought to let the Senator from Texas answer.

Mr. EATON. Nor are you the Senator to determine what I ought to do or not.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like the Senator to permit me——

Mr. EATON. It is not proper that the Senator from Vermont should tell me what is courteous or proper on this floor.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say that I do not regard the remark of the Senator from Vermont as at all courteous. It is not such a remark as I would make to him. No man is my keeper. I had the floor by courtesy, and having had the floor by courtesy——

Mr. EATON. I propose now to go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will not the Senator from Connecticut allow me to say one word when I am accused of discourtesy? I wish to say to my good friend from Texas that I was not speaking to him or of him. The Senator from Connecticut had declined to allow the Senator from Texas to answer a plain, straight question that I put to him on the very point under discussion. Then I asked the Senator from Connecticut whether he was the keeper of the Senator from Texas and whether the Senator from Texas had not the right to determine whether the question was a fair one or not. He said that he would take care of that himself, substantially. So I hope my friend from Texas will not consider that I implied anything as to him, but I did imply to my friend from Connecticut that he assumed to be the keeper of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. EATON. The time was mine; and when the Senator from Vermont asked from me as a courtesy to put a question to the Senator from Texas, and then reiterated the same question which he put himself in his own time the other day, I did not regard it as proper and do not now. The RECORD has that question and the RECORD has its answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And it has it now.

Mr. EATON. It may have it now. My position on this whole business is that the distinguished Senator from Vermont is no more the keeper of the State of Texas than he is of his brother-Senators on this floor; and when Texas determines to change her constitution it does not become him to stand up on the floor of this Senate and talk about the democratic majority being rebellion re-organized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not even if the compact says so?

Mr. EATON. Compact! Irrevocable compact! I do not wish to go through with that term "irrevocable." If the Senator had been in his seat he would have learned my opinion with regard to the term "irrevocable" when applied to human government, human compacts and agreements between States.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said during this discussion, both by the honorable Senator from Vermont and by the honorable Senator from Indiana, not now in his seat, that the design of the democratic party was to carry the presidential election in certain States in this Union by defending outrages. Sir, by what authority do either of these Senators make a charge of that character against the democratic party of the United States? The distinguished Senator from Indiana says it is so because he says that there is 30,000 majority in this State, 25,000 majority in that State, 40,000 majority in the other State, and by a system of terrorism, by a system of outrages, the democratic party intend to carry those States. O, Mr. President, how a little fact, how a little truth wipes away all trash and nonsense of this character. I hold in my hand a republican paper, not a democratic paper, but a republican paper published in this goodly city of Washington, called the National Republican. This paper was issued this morning, and—will you believe it, Mr. President—it says that the democratic party have carried Alabama by 30,000 majority. Will you believe another thing it says—let the honorable Senator from Indiana weep—not an outrage, not a trouble, not the slightest difficulty in the world, a fair election, a good election, an honest election—30,000 majority, all the members of Congress but one, and a large majority in both branches of the Legislature!

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. EATON. When I make a statement myself and authorize it to be made from my own knowledge, I have no objection to being questioned about it. I said that a republican paper published in the city of Washington stated such facts; it does.

Mr. SPENCER. I was only going to state to the Senate that those are Associated Press dispatches; the paper does not hold itself responsible for them. It is true that yesterday the election went very largely democratic in the State of Alabama, and it is equally true that in many counties in Alabama the colored people are so intimidated that they did not dare to vote.

Mr. EATON. Well, I do not know that.

Mr. SPENCER. I do.

Mr. EATON. You believe it?

Mr. SPENCER. I believe it.

Mr. EATON. You do not know it, for you were not there.

Mr. SPENCER. I was not there yesterday, but was there on a previous occasion.

Mr. EATON. Then you do not know it. If a gentleman says he knows a thing, that is one thing; belief is one thing and knowledge another. The Associated Press is not under the control of the democratic party "by a long deal," as my good friend from Vermont is fond of saying.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me a moment?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understand the Senator from Connecticut to say that the Associated Press is not under the control of the democratic party in the South. That may be true; but every agent of the Associated Press in the South is a democrat. That is true.

Mr. EATON. I suppose they could not get anybody else there who could read and write. [Laughter.] It is necessary that they should be democrats. I understand that the associated telegraphic dispatch company—if that be the term; I do not know what the term is; it is a matter of no consequence—is under the charge of a gentleman by the name of Orton, whom I have met and who I believe to be a very strong republican, I am sorry to say.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him again, I will state that the Associated Press is under the control, I believe, of Mr. Simonton, and that the Western Union Telegraph Company, of which Mr. Orton is the president, really has nothing to do with it. I ask the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] if I am not correct?

Mr. SARGENT. I did not hear the remark.

Mr. SPENCER. I say that the Associated Press is under the control of Mr. Simonton.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. Very likely my friend is right. Is not that gentleman a good, fair, square republican too?

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to have the Senator from California state the fact.

Mr. SARGENT. My impression is that Mr. Simonton is a republican. I think he has that credit.

Mr. EATON. Very well. I do not say it is to his discredit, by any manner of means; and when you can point to one to whom it is a credit I shall be very willing to admit it, I assure you.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very glad the Senator will admit so much in favor of any republican.

Mr. EATON. I do. I have very many warm friends who are republicans. Some five hundred republicans voted for me the last time I was a candidate in my town. As I was saying, the Senator from Alabama believes, or he would not say so, that there was intimidation in his State yesterday at the election or previons to the election.

Mr. SPENCER. I will state, if the Senator will allow me, what I do believe. I believe that in a large number of counties in the State of Alabama the colored people were so intimidated that they did not dare to go to the polls and vote yesterday.

Mr. EATON. I give the Senator full credit for his belief, and now let me say to him that I do not believe any such thing. From what I hear from colored men from his own State and from colored men from other States, I do not believe any such thing. The time has about gone by when those men were to be cooped up, lashed, tied together, and forced to vote. Let me tell you what one of them told me in the State of Virginia on the eve of an election four years ago. I speak now whereof I know. I knew one of the candidates; he was a personal friend of mine; and I said to a black man who was brought in connection with me in performing some service about my person, "Are you going to vote for Colonel B.?" Said he, "No, I dare not; they would kill me if I did." There are two sides to this story. Gentlemen who have more knowledge than I have may correct me hereafter, but I know this much, that the black man has been controlled by his own fellows at the instigation of white men who band together and assume it to be a crime to vote the democratic ticket. That time is passing by. The election in Alabama yesterday shows it. The elections in all these States, I trust, will show it hereafter. Who finds any fault with the manner in which the elections are carried on in the Old Dominion close by us, across the river here? No one. Every man enjoys his right under the Constitution, no matter what his color, no matter what his previous condition, may be. So it is in Georgia; so it is everywhere where the democracy rules. We intend it to be so all over this country.

I dislike getting into this discussion. It is not to my taste to make a speech of this character, a speech that belongs more to the stump, if I may be allowed to use the expression, than it does to the Senate; but I could not sit here and hear the peer of any man living on God's footstool accused of dishonesty, accused of being opposed to the best interests of this common land of ours. I submit to no such imputation, and I rebuke it wherever I find it, whether in the Senate or in the church. I for one will not submit to have language of this character applied to my party, to its leaders and its purest men.

The honorable Senator from Vermont closed a somewhat lengthy speech with poetry. I find no fault with his poetry. It would not do him and some other Senators that I know any harm if they would read of peace every night before they go to bed and every morning before they read their prayers. It is well that there should be a feeling of brotherhood and love going out from our breasts toward all the people of this broad Union. We are one people and are destined to be one people, so far as human knowledge can see, forever; members of a common Union, always having the same thing at heart, the good of the country, the welfare of its citizens, and the purity of its Government. Every Senator, I hope and trust, entertains the same opinions that I know govern me. I hope this Union will exist forever. I might as well close upon this point also with a few lines. I would that this Union might exist forever:

> A giant oak uplifts its lofty form,
> Greens in the sun and strengthens in the storm;
> Long in its shade shall children's children come,
> And earth's poor traveler find a welcome home;
> Long shall it stand, and every blast defy,
> Till time's last whirlwind rends the sky.

Sir, I have nothing more to say upon this part of the subject. The fashion has been set me of talking about various things upon one bill, and as I said I would and this is as good a time to redeem my word as any other, I should like to say a word or two with regard to the figures which have been put before the people of this country by the honorable Senators from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] Neither of them do I see in his seat. I do not well see how I can go on without the Senator from Massachusetts. I should be glad, if he is in the Senate, if he would take his seat, for I have certain questions to put to him before I get through with the discussion of this matter. My friend, the Senator from West Virginia, has put before the Senate and before the country a condition of affairs in the Treasury Department that has been, in my judgment, entirely unanswerable. No results have been obtained by the resolution which he had the honor to introduce. The Senate sent the resolution to a committee overloaded with work, the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Finance, as I know from what members of that committee have said on the floor of the Senate, gave no attention to that matter. They simply addressed a communication to the Treasury Department. The answer to that communication was a set of figures which have been made a part of the speech of the Senator from Ohio and have gone out to the world as a part of his speech.

Mr. BOUTWELL entered the Chamber.

Mr. EATON. I say that, in my judgment, it was the duty of the Senate to have sent that resolution to a special committee. It is admitted here, if I am not mistaken, and if I am I will thank my friend from Massachusetts to correct me, that there has been a change in the statements amounting to over $200,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. EATON. Certainly; this is a matter of figures.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What I had to say in reply to the Senator from West Virginia related to his method of computation. As I understand, that difference of $200,000,000 is reached by this process: He takes ten years, between 1860 and 1870 and finds in each of those years a statement of the public debt by warrants, as it was made up previous to 1870, and the statement by receipts and expenditures which differs each year to a certain amount, some years more and some years less, and he adds together those differences for eight or ten years and realizes as the result the sum of something like $200,000,000. I do not understand the Senator from Connecticut to claim that there is any such difference in the sum for any one year.

Mr. EATON. I ascertained that matter before the Senator from West Virginia did. The greatest difference that I ascertained was about $90,000,000; a little less than $90,000,000, if I recollect aright.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will say that that, I think, was in McCulloch's time, and I think the year that the statement was published he appended a note showing that there was this difference for that particular year, or something like that difference, between the statement of the public debt made up under warrants and as put in made up under receipts and expenditures; but I do think the honorable Senator from West Virginia and the honorable Senator from Connecticut will agree that those differences (they were not errors) through many years should not be aggregated and the statement made that the differences amounted to so much. I think that would be as incorrect as it would be for a man who has kept an account of his indebtedness and who should find at the end of each year that he was in debt a thousand dollars, when he had reached ten years would to aggregate his indebtedness and say it amounted to $10,000.

Mr. EATON. The honorable Senator has the advantage of his statement. What I say is this, and I desire it to go to the country, that the accountant does not live who can take the reports of the Treasury Department and the reports of the Register of the Treasury and make them agree. It cannot be done.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In answer to that——

Mr. EATON. I do not know that I care to be answered just now on that point.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I thought the proposition on which the Senator introduced me into the Senate was that if he was in error I should correct him. That is the invitation upon which I came.

Mr. EATON. I did not mean to introduce the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I said that I did not care to go on in his absence.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In regard to the Senator's remark that there was not on the face of the earth an accountant who could reconcile the statements of the Treasury Department, I would simply answer that there have been four different sets of accountants who have done that particular thing. In 1869 and 1870 a set of accountants in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury did that thing, and the record remains to this day. In the year——

Mr. EATON. Wait one moment. I do not choose to be interrupted and unintentionally misrepresented. I did not say that no accountant in the United States could go into the Treasury Department and take its books and make them agree. What I say is this, and the gentleman may have time to answer, that no accountant or number of accountants in the United States can take the reports of the Treasury Department and the reports of the Register of the Treasury and balance the accounts. It cannot be done.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I agree exactly with what the honorable Senator from Connecticut says; but he will allow me to correct the error of his statement, which was, I believe, if the reporter were to copy the words of the honorable Senator from Connecticut and read them to the Senate, that there was no accountant on the face of the earth who could reconcile the accounts of the Treasury Department——

Mr. EATON. The reporter may read what I did say, but I did not say any such thing. What I meant to say was this, and I will repeat what I intended to say, so that if I did not say it I will correct it now: that there was no accountant on the face of the earth who could take the reports of the Treasury Department and the reports of the Register of the Treasury and balance the accounts. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator confines himself to the published reports, of course those reports do not furnish the materials by which any expert can ascertain whether the balance was correct or not; but that is true of the reports of every organization and of every institution in the country. It is true of the Senator's own bank account. If there were to be a public statement to-day of the balance of his account, either in black or red, upon the books of the bank, that statement would not furnish the means of ascertaining whether the balance was correct or not; but you must go to the institution itself, or to the records of the institution. What I say is that by the books of the Treasury Department the statements made to the public from 1870 forward have been reconciled and with the exception of a few errors found to agree with the statements made previous to 1870 by four sets of accountants; first, by accountants in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury in the year 1869-'70; secondly, by accountants in the Office of the Register of the Treasury in 1871; and thirdly and fourthly by separate sets of accountants working in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and in the Office of the Register of the Treasury during the present session of Congress and since the resolution was introduced by the honorable Senator from West Virginia. These four examinations have corresponded not only to a dollar but to a cent; and if there can be any hard test of the truth of results, it can be no better ascertained than by four such independent investigations as have been made on this subject.

Mr. EATON. That may be so. That is something I have no knowledge of except the information which is tendered me by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I long ago learned one thing in the course of a not very short life, that if I had any doubt with regard to the accuracy of a public servant, I should not take the reports of that public servant in order to solve the question of accuracy. Take a great commercial house in New York which sells its fifty or seventy-five million dollars a year, for there are one or two such houses there. If a rumor is started that there is some difficulty in the accounts of the cashier, they would not set that cashier to examine his own accounts. They would look to men outside. Therefore it was proper that a resolution should be introduced; that resolution ought to have gone to a special committee, and that committee ought to have had the power to employ experts. There should have been a thorough examination of this whole business, for I beg to say that there is a feeling abroad that this matter is wrong.

The Senator from Massachusetts said in his place on the floor of the Senate the other day that there had not been a change in any of the figures of the books of the Department. There can be no figures when we speak of a Department. I do not mean loose paper, I mean Department accounts which are kept in books. That is what I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say, and I understood the Senator from Ohio to echo the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts. Has the Senator from Massachusetts given the matter a personal examination? I beg to say here in putting this question to the Senator that under no circumstances—and he knows me well enough to know that not for one moment do I question the entire integrity of the Senator from Massachusetts when an active officer of the Treasury Department. He knows me well enough, too, to know that if I believed he was guilty of wrong there I shou'd state the fact to him and to the country also. Do I understand the Senator to mean the Senate to infer that he knows, not that he believes, not that he has been told, but does he know of his own knowledge that there have been no forced balances upon some of the books of the Treasury Department? Is he prepared to say to the Senate, with a full understanding of the import of the question, that he knows of his own knowledge that there have been no forced balances on any of the books of the Treasury Department proper or of the Register of the Treasury?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Of course I have not gone over all the books of the Treasury Department; but I no more believe that there have ever been alterations in the books of the Treasury than I believe that the records of the Senate have been altered. I never heard any such thing suggested inside of the Department, never heard it in my life until it was possibly inferred from the remarks made by the Senator from West Virginia. I have been told over and over again by the officers, and Mr. Bristow, the recent Secretary of the Treasury, who was in no way concerned in these transactions, in his letters to the Senate says that the books of the Department have never been changed. The simple truth was this, and nothing that can be suggested or stated or proved as having any foundation in fact will change the statement I make, which is that the books of the Treasury Department remain as they were previous to any time, so far as I have any knowledge or belief. I never heard the thing suggested by any one except the suggestions that have been made here on the floor of the Senate. The only thing that was done was that in 1869 and 1870, finding that there had been errors in previous statements, an investigation was undertaken and certain errors were found. The statements that had been made to the country previously remain, and after the discovery of those errors the statements that were subsequently made were made to correspond with what we believed to be the truth. After ascertaining the truth, it would, it seems to me, have been a greater offense to the country to have continued to restate the errors than by the statement of the truth to suggest that errors had been made in previous times. There was nothing for the Secretary to do except to do that. I wish to say again that nothing cast any imputation upon the integrity of those who had kept the accounts; that the country never lost a cent by the errors; and that the statements affected no financial fact, nor did they in any way affect the fortunes of the country.

Mr. EATON. I supposed I should get the answer which I have had from the honorable Senater from Massachusetts. From an examination which I under his lead conducted in that Department, I well knew it was not in his power or in the power of any living man to give a personal examination to those accounts. Secretary Bristow says the accounts are all right. What he means by it is that he believes they are all right, not that he has examined all the accounts in the Treasurer's Department and in the Office of the Register of the Treasury. Of course he has done no such thing. He believes in the integrity of the officials, and so does my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to say to the Senator, and I think his experience in the Treasury Department will justify the remark I make, as I am sure that my experience justifies me in making the remark, that there could be no change in the books of the Treasury Department affecting a balance which could be made without the knowledge of at least twenty-five different persons who have charge of various books, the results of which have to be marshaled into various ledgers which are tested by comparison with books kept by other independent persons. It would be one of the most difficult things to change the books of the Department so as to affect a balance without the knowledge of the change being known to twenty-five or thirty persons; which is, in itself, pretty good security that the thing could not be done.

Mr. EATON. There is some force in the remark just made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and yet I learned enough while there to believe that two men could combine, three certainly to take a hundred million dollars from the Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. O, no. If three persons, each of whom has an independent key to a separate lock in which the reserve is kept, which is the large body of the money, were to combine they might force it out of the Treasury; but when you come to change the books so as to force a balance you have not only got to deal with three persons, but with eight or ten times three, who must be in collusion, in conspiracy; and when the thing was done, there would be nothing in the world to reward them for it, because they have not the control of a cent of money and never can get it except by going into the office of the Treasurer and robbing precisely as some other persons might do. Therefore they would have no motive to change the books; they would get nothing for it.

Mr. EATON. I have no desire to go into the question with regard to what might be done or what might not be done as to the false issue of securities or the taking away of securities or anything else. It is not worth my while, nor do I care to alarm the feelings of the community upon a subject of that character; but I commend to my friend from Massachusetts the testimony given the other day by General Spinner before a House committee. I have not seen it, but I have heard statements of that testimony which place some of the actions of the Treasury officials in not a proper or a pleasant light. I do not know it to be true, but I have heard it said by competent accountants—and I should have gone into the inquiry myself if this resolution had gone to a special committee—that the interest account of the Treasury Department was from $1,500,000 to $2,500,000 wrong. That I have heard from a man who has long been an official in that Department, a man of great shrewdness and great worth.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Do I understand the Senator to say that the account is wrong from $1,500,000 to $2,500,000?

Mr. EATON. I do say just that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to have the Senator give some ground for the statement.

Mr. EATON. I do not know that I care for it now. It will be known if it is so; the country will demand to know it. The country will know certainly the whole history of the Treasury operations with regard to the interest, with regard to the syndicate, so called, and with regard to all the transactions of the Department. If there had been a proper committee instituted, it would have been known before now. In my judgment there will be found errors, to use a mild term, in the interest account of the United States. I am informed by men in whose character I have great confidence and place full reliance, in whose knowledge I have great confidence also, that there will be found gross errors in the interest account of the United States.

But that is not the subject to which I mainly intended to direct the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Massachusetts presented certain tables here the other day with regard to the relative expenditures in 1860 and 1875. Two years were brought in juxtaposition to each other, and now I beg, if my friend will not consider it impertinent——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Before the Senator leaves the subject of the interest account, inasmuch as he has made a statement and it is upon the record, I should like to make a statement as to the mode of doing business in reference to the payment and the issue of bonds, which I think will satisfy most persons—I hope it will satisfy the honorable Senator from Connecticut—that such a condition of things is very impossible. I think it will be hardly necessary to say here that the Secretary of the Treasury never has a dollar of public money in his hands, and could not get a dollar by any other process than the Senator from Connecticut, or any other man could. He has no control over the money. Nothing comes into his hands, nothing passes through his hands, and he is only responsible for the mode of conducting the Department. The bonds which are issued to bear interest are issued under circumstances, I submit, affording the best possible security. If the mode of doing business in the Treasury Department in that particular can be placed against the mode of doing business in the Bank of England or in the Bank of France, it will be seen that the securities taken here are much greater than the securities taken elsewhere. In the first place, the paper made is of a peculiar sort. It is made under the direction of the Government and under the control of Government officers. Every sheet of paper is counted. It is cut at the mill of a particular size, destined for the issue of particular securities. The books of the Treasury Department show the number of sheets of paper manufactured of every size, the use for which it is to be put, and its destination. When it arrives at the Treasury Department, it is counted and put into the hands of the paper division, and it is turned over by installments as it is wanted for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is subject to three separate impressions in three different places: one in New York, one under one superintendence in the Treasury, and a third under a third superintendence in the Treasury. The plates used by each of these divisions are engraved under separate authority and kept in the hands of separate custodians; and no security of the Government can be perfected except by the use of these three separate plates in the control of three separate and independent sets of men. When a bond is perfected in that way, it goes to the Office of the Register of the Treasury, and is there recorded, and the public debt of the country is charged with the nominal value of the bond. It is then sent to the Treasurer of the United States, and is there issued, and he is made accountable for the sum of money which he receives upon its issue by the books of the Register of the Treasury, and therefore he must account for every issue. In the Office of the Register of the Treasury is a ledger opened, in which the bonds are entered with reference to the payment of the interest. If you open one of these ledgers, you will see the number of the bond, the date of its issue, the act under which it was issued, and a square corresponding to each coupon on that bond. Whenever a coupon is returned by the Treasurer, it goes to the Register, and before the Treasurer is allowed in his account for the payment made on account of that coupon, the coupon itself is entered upon this ledger in the place assigned to it.

Therefore there never can be a second payment of interest upon any bond, nor can there be a payment of interest upon any bond not issued by the United States; because the coupon, its number, its date, and its reference must conform to the bond on which it was issued. Therefore the probability is so slight that there can be any interest paid by the Government of the United States which is not justly due that I think it cannot be taken into the account by any reasonable man.

Mr. EATON. There is one thing my friend can say, that he has had plenty of time to make his statement, although he has hardly touched the point.

Mr. DAVIS. Before my friend from Connecticut leaves the debt statement, there is one point which I have never been able to understand, and I have never asked the direct question of the ex-Secretary. I would be glad now, as the Senator from Massachusetts has made an explanation, to read the figures from two reports, that of 1869, which was during the Senator's administration, and that of 1871, which was also during his administration. I find that in 1871 the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, in his statement as made up in his office and as since that time it has continued in the reports, stated that the public debt June 30, 1869, was $2,588,452,213.94. The Register reports for that same year the public indebtedness to have been $2,489,002,480.58, a difference of $99,000,000 between the statement as reported by the Register and as reported by the Secretary two years afterward.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That arises from two circumstances. In the first place, the Register's statement as made up did not include the interest accumulated; that is, the interest earned.

Mr. DAVIS. My friend will understand that the interest had been paid two years previous, and it is charged and reported to Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is true, the interest had been paid; but at the time the Register made up his statement for the year he did not include the interest which was earned upon the public debt, but which had not been paid. There is always a considerable amount.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me say to my friend that that could not have been, because the interest runs along regularly. The next year we find a difference in the public debt as reported of about $75,000,000; that is, an increase of that amount when the Secretary's new table is made up for the next year instead of $99,000,000 which it would have continued as about the amount of interest. It is $75,000,000 the next year, and the next year after that there is hardly any difference. Therefore it could not have been the interest account. The ex-Secretary will at once see that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What year is that?

Mr. DAVIS. I gave two years. The first was 1869.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Was the debt due that year?

Mr. DAVIS. The debt was due the 30th of June, 1869. By the table made up in the Secretary's office and reported to the country it was about $99,000,000 more than it was in the Register's report for the same year. That is, the table made up in 1871 by the Secretary for 1869 increased it $99,000,000. Let me say, as the Senator knows, that since 1869 the amount has been increased $99,000,000. It may throw some suggestion upon the answer if the Senator will look at the year 1862, when Mr. Chase reported the amount of the debt in round numbers at $514,000,000. It remained that sum in the reports from that time up to 1871, when this statement was remodeled, and then it was put down at $524,000,000. Fessenden, Chase, and McCulloch all reported $514,000,000, and it is now reported in the debt statement at $524,000,000, which is $10,000,000 above that sum.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Of course there could have been no particular motive for increasing the public debt or any statement concerning it. If I had any object about it, it would be to reduce the public debt; but I will explain that difference, although I have not before me the figures.

Mr. DAVIS. I will hand the books to the Senator.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not care about the books, because I understand the facts. It is due to one or both of two circumstances. One circumstance inevitably is to be considered in connection with those facts. The interest account, as I state, was included after the report of 1869; that is, beginning with 1870, I included the interest earned and not paid as a part of the public debt, which had not been included in the time previous. When I revised the statements for the previous years upon the basis of receipts and expenditures, that item was also included.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Am I to understand that it was the habit of the Register to include the interest account and the habit of the Secretary of the Treasury not to include the interest account?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It was the habit of the Secretary of the Treasury after I took charge of the Department to take into view the interest account; but the Register never did; he merely took the principal as it appeared in his books.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The habit of the Secretaries of the Treasury preceding your administration was not to consider it?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The whole of it is that previous to my time there was no check on the Register. He kept a set of books, and there were no means elsewhere in the Treasury Department for ascertaining whether his accounts were correct or not. Now, although I believe that I have had to defend myself more in reference to it than all things else, I thought it was in the public interest that there should be a check upon the Register, and I did therefore open in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury a new set of books, entirely independent of anything that had existed before, and opened those books upon the principle of ascertaining and keeping an account of the public indebtedness upon the basis of receipts and expenditures; and that led to this inquiry which resulted in showing that there had been some inaccuracies.

The account of the Register was kept upon warrants; and the effect of that will be seen from the statement which I will make. For example, if a bond were prepared for issue, it would go to the office of the Register, and it would be entered; and as soon as it was entered it was an item in the account of the debt of the United States. The debt of the United States was swollen just to the extent of the nominal value of that bond; but as a matter of fact the bond had not been issued from the Treasury Department, nothing had been received in exchange for it, and it was not until the bond went into the hands of the Treasurer and was sold and he received the money that it really became a debt of the United States.

The change which was made in the books kept in the office of the Secretary as distinguished from those kept in the Register's Office was that we entered that as a public debt when the bond was actually issued, not when it was registered in the Office of the Register. Then, on the other hand, in the redemption of bonds the Treasurer would pay for bonds due and redeemed or for bonds purchased, and he would claim an allowance on account of the redemption or the purchase of such bonds; but those bonds or his account of the purchase together with the bonds would go through the Office of the First Auditor and the First Comptroller and to the Register before the Register would charge off those bonds as paid. The consequence was that his account would be too large on both sides when there was business; when the Government was issuing new bonds, when it was redeeming old ones his account would be too large as representing the issue greater than it had been, and the books of his office would show that the redemptions were less than they actually had been at the Treasurer's Office. The books which were opened in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury were based upon receipts and expenditures. That is, we charged a bond when we got the money for it, we credited the loan account when we had paid for a bond and it was redeemed. The consequence was that these two accounts necessarily differed just to the extent of the amount of the bonds and notes of the United States that had been in the Register's Office and not issued or that had been redeemed by the Treasurer and not entered upon the books of the Register of the Treasury. Therefore there would always be a difference; but at any day you could follow these bonds and these notes and ascertain the value of all those in transitu, and by deducting from one amount or adding to the other if everything was right the two accounts would agree. And that explains the difference or a large part of the difference to which the Senator from West Virginia has now called my attention.

Mr. DAVIS. I have listened with some degree of satisfaction to the Senator from Massachusetts, but the bond question according to my judgment cannot enter into an account that has been closed, fixed, determined, reported to Congress in some cases for thirty years and in some cases ten years and in some cases nine years. I can see that in the current accounts running along on the 30th of June there might be differences, as the Senator has explained; but bear in mind that there are six weeks allowed by law, and practice four months allowed to close up those accounts before they report to Congress. From June to November is always allowed for the purpose of correcting such errors as the Senator speaks of. The accounts are kept open, as the Senator knows better than I do, for four or five months.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But the accounts are kept open, not in reference to the loans and indebtedness of the country, but kept open so as to get the receipts of money actually paid on or before the 30th of June. The accounts of receipts are kept open for the purpose of showing in the following December the amount actually received during the last fiscal year; but it does not show the loan account. The loan account closes right down on the 30th of June.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator will know that in 1870 or 1871 when these tables were remodeled and restated, according to what Secretary Bristow says, there were no bonds being issued, there were no bonds coming into the Treasury at that time?

Mr. BOUTWELL. We were always changing them.

Mr. DAVIS. You must issue new bonds in exchange for old bonds; but I cannot see—and I have given it all the thought possible—how it is that when you go back, as was done in 1870 and 1871, when the debt statement was remodeled, from 1836 down to 1870; and the restatement made a difference in some years of a million and in other years of nearly $100,000,000, and in the aggregate the total was decreased $247,000,000 from the previous statements. I can see very well on the bond question if one year it was too much and in others too little the result in the end would come out about balance; but how it is that the public indebtedness has increased in the aggregate over $200,000,000, I have not been able to see. Look at the other statements; take the expenditures, or take the revenue after it had gone into the Treasury, how was it got out and how it was reported afterward at different amounts. I know there will be a difference in the accounts between the Register and the Treasurer, but there should be no difference, if the books are kept properly, between the Register and the Secretary's office. How this great difference has come in different times I am unable to account for, and I have given it all the consideration I have been able to give it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It would be difficult for me to explain it any further. If you take one year, the honorable Senator from West Virginia does not observe that when we went back and analyzed the statements of previous years, those statements having been made up and reported on the basis of warrants, the account was restated upon the basis of receipts and expenditures; and, therefore, there would be just the same difference if that account were restated ten years after the transaction had taken place as there would have been if the account had been stated at the time on that basis. That did not make any difference; it produced the same result.

Mr. DAVIS. The books had been regularly balanced every year and reports made to Congress, and there had been no difference in them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Because they were stated on a different theory; that is on the theory of receipts and expenditures, and the original entries were made on the theory of warrants. Therefore, in each year there would be a difference depending upon the amount of business going on at the time. Now what is the point on which I should make complaint in regard to the theory of the Senator from West Virginia? He finds, as in 1865 perhaps, a difference of $10,000,000; that is, in 1865 he finds that the statement of the accounts on the basis of warrants and the statement of the accounts on receipts and expenditures differs $10,000,000, which could be explained, as the Senator from West Virginia can very well see, by the business in transitu between the Register's Office and the Office of Treasurer. Suppose in 1866 there are $10,000,000 difference also, the result of the same facts. I do not think that it is reasonable to add those two $10,000,000 together and say "there is a difference of $20,000,000." In that way, as I understand, the $20,000,000 of difference are arrived at.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Connecticut desires to go on, I will not interfere with him; but this is a point on which I desire information. I only want a moment longer, as I see the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to explain as far as he can these discrepancies, for there are great discrepancies in the reports to Congress. As to the books, I am not able to state. I understand, and the Senator knows better than I do whether it is a fact or not, that when this re-examination took place, though the Register is the official bookkeeper of the Government and his Office the final resting-place of all warrants on which money has been paid, there was no re-examination in that Office whatever of warrants or books, but a statement was made up in the Secretary's Office, sent from the Secretary's Office to the Register, and he directed to make his annual statement to Congress correspond with the sheet sent from the Secretary's Office, without regard to the facts or figures or warrants in his own Office. I understand that to be so. I do not state it for a fact; but it comes so straight to me that, unless the Senator says it is not so, I state it as a fact; I believe it to be a fact.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no doubt this is true, after the investigation was made in the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury, that with reference to future statements of the balances in previous years, the Register, either of his own motion or by some direction or understanding, made up his statement to correspond with the statement made in the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no doubt of that; but I read the other day in the presence of the Senate a letter from the Register of the Treasury directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated I think in 1871, in which he said that he had been over these accounts independently of the examination made in the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury and found that his results corresponded exactly with those attained in the Office of the Secretary, and he gave the tables showing the processes by which the result was reached.

Mr. DAVIS. I listened with some attention to the letter read and afterward read it, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts is probably mistaken as to what the Register says. I understand from that letter that there was no examination whatever in his Office. He is the official book-keeper of the Government and his Office is the final resting-place of all warrants and the only office from which a restatement of the accounts could be made. I understand that in that Office there was no re-examination; it was made in the Secretary's Office. I understand that if there had been such a re-examination, going back to 1836, forty years of time, it would have taken perhaps five years to have done it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. O, no.

Mr. DAVIS. Every warrant in that Office would have had to be re-examined so as to restate the account and I understand there were millions upon millions of them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The exact fact, as I understand it, was that for the year 1870 the statements of the Register were based upon the examination made in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no doubt about that. His report for 1870 was based on the examinations made in the office of the Secretary; but that he then proceeded independently to an examination from 1836, when there was no public debt of any magnitude, and reached a result for himself, and that result corresponded exactly with the result previously reached in the office of the Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand exactly different. I think the Senator is mistaken, and I might say that I had a conversation with the Register, though not for two or three months past, and I asked the question, as I thought I had a right to do, whether or not the warrants in his Office since he had been there had ever been re-examined so as to make out the fact whether or not the statements as remodeled in the Secretary's office were true, and I understood that there had been no re-examination of warrants in that Office, and his statements were supposed to correspond with the reports to Congress at the time they were made. That is my understanding. I understand—the Senator can correct me if it is not so—that in that Office there has never been a re-examination of the accounts up to the present day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand differently, that there has been a thorough examination and re-examination. There have been two examinations in the Register's Office.

Mr. DAVIS. Then it is unfortunate that the Committee on Finance, who had four or five months to examine and make the report as to whether or not the figures I had presented were correct, did not learn that fact. I understand that committee, though they attempt to explain them away, do not impeach a single figure. Every figure that I presented was taken from the official statements to Congress and is correct. I understand that that committee, as a committee, or perhaps as individuals, never asked a question in the Department as to whether or not there was a restatement made or how it was made or how it came to be made. The Senator himself was a member of that committee, and he knows whether or not the committee as a committee visited the Department and made any examination. I understand they did not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not act with the committee at all. I never met with the committee or conversed with any member on the subject.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts did not say, as I was very certain he could not say, that there had been no forced balances, so called, in the Treasury Department. My friend from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] has placed in my hand testimony before the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, which is the testimony of General Spinner. I have not had the time nor has he to read it through, but I find this:

By Mr. WILSON:

Question. Was any part of that fund used to balance the public-debt statements, to your knowledge?

Answer. I cannot tell. The public-debt statement was a curious thing. I do not know how the law has been latterly, but when I first came into the Treasury the Treasurer was directed by law to publish weekly statements in one or two papers in the city of Washington. I found that they prepared a statement upstairs and published it, to which my name was attached, and I objected to that. They did not want me to publish my statement.

Q. Who did not want you to publish your statement?

A. The Secretary of the Treasury or his assistant. That was Mr. Harrington, I think under Mr. Chase, and was early in the war. They would publish a statement that did not accord with my statement, and I would not permit my name to be signed to it, and so they used to publish a statement as the statement of the Treasurer of the United States, and they attached my name to it, but it did not emanate from my office.

Q. Did it differ materially from your statement?

A. I do not recollect. I remember that they forced balances in some way or other so that it did not accord with my statement. They pretended that they had done things up-stairs that I did not know any thing about, and I did not like it at the time. I afterward got the law changed in some way so that it became the duty of the Secretary to make the statements.

Q. And then you were not responsible in any way?

A. Then I was not responsible and knew nothing about the debt statements and rarely regarded them. I differed with all the Secretaries in that. They have a rule that nothing must be divulged that takes place in the Treasury. My idea was that a public officer should have no secrets; that the public had a right to know everything, and when I was asked questions, unless I was prevented from doing it, I always answered them.

That is not very full testimony; it is not explicit testimony; but it goes to substantiate what I have been informed and what I stated to the Senate. My information was that there had been forced balances in some of the departments of the Treasury, and here is a man who swears to it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. What officer?

Mr. EATON. The late Treasurer of the United States, General Spinner. He swears it was so. I have just had this put in my hands. I heard something about it yesterday.

Now, I say again that the resolution introduced by the Senator from West Virginia ought to have been the subject of inquiry by a special committee which should have had the power to summon experts and expend as much money as was necessary in order that they might make a thorough examination of the condition of the Treasury. I fear there is something wrong there. My friend from Massachusetts smiles. I will not quote from Shakspeare on that point. [Laughter.] I say I fear. I hope not; I pray not. If a committee had been instituted and that committee had ascertained that everything was entirely right and correct, I should have rejoiced. It is not for me to undertake to injure the good name of my country, not for me to undertake to injure the good name of the Government; but the testimony of this late officer of the Treasury Department seems to me to show, in the absence of absolute knowledge on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts, that there must have been a change in the figures, for there cannot be, my friend knows it as well as I do, a forced balance unless there be a change in the figures upon some of the books of some portion of the Department. That is the very meaning of the term "forced balance"—false balance, knowingly wrong. That is what this man testifies to. His testimony is before the Senate. I read precisely what it was and it may go for what it is worth before the country. I do not think the testimony of a public officer who for many years—I do not know how many——

Mr. BOUTWELL rose.

Mr. EATON. My friend has the right to reply; but I hardly think the explanation ought to be made in my speech. There is the testimony of the late Treasurer of the United States. If it can be explained, very well.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not propose to explain it away, because I do not know anything about it. I have only this to say, that his testimony as read relates to transactions that took place when Mr. Harrington was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in the administration of Governor Chase, and therefore I have really no means of knowing about it more than other persons unless it had come to me by tradition in the Treasury Department. I do not consider myself any more responsible for it——

Mr. EATON. O, you are not on trial.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Than for the administration of Albert Gallatin. I have only to say that I never heard of such a case. After I became the Secretary of the Treasury, by law and by usage, the statements of the public debt were issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I never had any interference with General Spinner in regard to that, except in so far as from his office the facts were furnished on which the statements were made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the fund to which he referred, the naval pension money?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not know. I have not read it.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Massachusetts almost seems to take the ground that I have got him on trial.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not at all; but there is this to be said: I have been made responsible, and from that responsibility I do not shrink, for having issued the statements of 1870 and 1871, and I mean to say that the utmost investigation in my judgment will show that those statements are correct and that the statements made in previous times were erroneous, but upon that point we cannot settle it here——

Mr. EATON. There may have been a great deal of stealing before you came in.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This was introduced in connection with the other matter, and I thought it proper to say that so far as the testimony showed they were transactions that occurred six or eight years before I had anything to do with the Treasury.

Mr. EATON. During the war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Connecticut, who does not intend to put this thing in a false light I am sure, to the fact that if he looks a little further back in this testimony of General Spinner, he will see, so far as I can now judge from a hasty perusal, that he was being inquired of about the naval pension fund, as there appears on the preceding page this question by Mr. Wilson:

Q. Was any part of this fund ever transferred to the naval pension fund?

A. I do not know. The naval pension fund was a very large fund, upon which the Treasury paid a low rate of interest—4 per cent., I think, though I do not recollect certainly. That fund was in the Treasury a long while, and I do not know but it is there yet.

Then the inquiries go on to know whether any part of this fund was transferred to Jay Cooke & Co., and he says he does not know, and then comes what my friend read. Now, it may turn out, and I suspect it probably will, that this supposed forcing of balances was a mere question whether the naval pension fund, which has sometimes been regarded as a separate trust, and at other times as belonging to the United States, was carried into the statements of the public debt.

Mr. EATON. I do not suppose this touches it at all. It was a balance, it was the public-debt statement about which he was speaking.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As affected by the naval-pension fund.

Mr. EATON. No matter what affected it; it was the public-debt statement he was speaking about, and that they forced balances in that public-debt statement. I do not think my friend from Vermont has bettered this thing any I certainly do not want anything added. I had not read it; I did not know to what it referred. It was put into my hands while I was conversing with my friend from Massachusetts, but I want it distinctly understood that I will make an examination into this testimony and ascertain hereafter. I only read it because it showed what I had been informed by another officer in the Department heretofore was true, that there had been forced balances in that Department. Now, Mr. President, I leave that.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to say that I believe the pension fund has never come up to $20,000,000. It has been about $14,000,000. The amount involved in a single year here is nearly $100,000,000 in some cases, so that it could not be the pension fund that caused the difference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am merely taking the testimony of the witnesses referred to.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I find certain tables published in the RECORD of the 24th of July, introduced by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and if he will permit me—if the question is an improper one he may decline to answer it, and he will pardon me for putting it—I should like to know if the Senator is responsible for the correctness of this statement?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; I am not. I am only responsible for this: that Mr. Conant, the present Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, under whose direction the tables were made, is an honest man; that he has honestly done his duty; that they have been honestly reported to him by his subordinates, and that he has reported honestly to the Senate. I presented the statement, taking that much responsibility.

Mr. EATON. Those tables are not true, and I did not suppose that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts was or would be responsible for statements that right on their face are manifestly false and incorrect; and if the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Conant, puts his name to statements of this character to go broadcast throughout this land he ought to be removed from his office, for he is not a fit man to occupy it. The statements are not true. I am not now talking about an opinion which Mr. Conant may have; I am not now talking about his judgment with regard to a matter; that is another thing; but he puts before the country what he as an accountant knows is not true; and I shall be soon done with this gentleman, for I would not dishonor this body nor disgrace myself by going through with this whole table before the Senate when I can cover it up with fraud in one minute.

Just see how this man makes out his statements. He is trying to show—this is pretty poor business he has got into—that it cost but a trifle more to support the Government of the United States in 1875 than it did in 1860, and he has produced a statement here—the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has put it before the Senate and it has gone to the people—and in order to reduce the expenditures in the year 1875 what has he done—not my friend, but Mr. Conant? He finds, after making deductions amounting to I believe $189,000,000 owing to the war, that the expenses of all the different Departments of the Government of the United States not increased by war expenditures were in 1875 $84,773,762.49. Now, what does he do to reduce it still further? He deducts $12\frac{675}{1000}$ per cent., the average premium on gold during the year, the expenditures here given being in currency, while those of 1860 were in gold—$10,745,074.40. He takes that from the $84,773,762.49, and that leaves as the expenses of the Government, taking out the war expenses, $74,028,688.09.

When I stamp a thing with fraud upon its very face in one respect, I do not take up the time of the Senate with the miserable conclusions of a miserable accountant. Just think of it one moment. In order to reduce the expenditures in the opinion of the people of the United States so as to bring them down to very nearly what they were fifteen years ago, he has taken out for the difference between gold and currency $10,745,074.40, being $12\frac{675}{1000}$ per cent. upon the gross amount of $84,000,000 and over. Now look at it, mark it, see the fraud of this Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. I know what he meant perfectly well. It would be a matter of argument if it were true. It was as there was a difference of over 12½ per cent. between the purchasing power of coin and paper, therefore it was proper to deduct that. My friend from Massachusetts bows his head as though that were correct. Now let us look at it for one moment. I will settle this question in one moment so that there will be no more attempts by anybody to sustain a set of tables of this character. What was the civil list? Fourteen million eight hundred and ninety-one thousand four hundred and forty dollars and one cent. What was the foreign list? One million two hundred and fourteen thousand eight hundred dollars and eighteen cents. What was the pay of the Army? Ten million eight hundred and seventy thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars and thirty-nine cents. What was the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps? Seven million seven hundred and eighteen thousand eight hundred and forty-seven dollars and four cents, making in all $34,695,853.62, which was paid in currency. The purchasing power of the currency had nothing to do with this amount. Suppose it had all been paid into my hands as for the civil list or the pay of the Army and the Navy, it is not for matters purchased for the Army or the Navy; it is the mere bills that were paid for the pay of the soldiers in the Army and the marines and sailors of the Navy. The amount with which he has gone to the people, which is entirely a fraud, was $4,400,000 in round numbers. There is $4,400,000 shown to be an absolute fraud in the very inception of this thing. Am I right? Who will dispute it? I do not say that the whole ten millions is a fraud. That is another matter. I say this, the expenses of the civil list were paid in currency. If any Senator will deny it I will give him the floor. The expenses of the Army, $10,870,760, were paid in currency. It is the pay-bill of the Army, not the beef and pork that are bought or the powder and shot. The pay of the Navy and Marine Corps was $7,718,847 and it was all paid in currency. And yet this Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has dared to say that there should be a deduction of $4,400,000 in favor of the expenses of the Government in 1875 on these items because of the difference between gold and currency. Sir, it is a fraud upon the people of the United States. I rejoice that my distinguished friend from Massachusetts did not back this fraud. That he had not examined it I know, for if he had he would not have presented it and had it go before the people of the United States.

I said I would not go through this, and I will not, because it would take me two hours; but I desire it to go upon the record and go before the country that this fraud is unmasked to the tune of over $4,000,000 in one item; and hereafter when we do go before the people we shall show that there are more than forty other millions in the same way. Sir, this Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States undertakes to make figures to go forth to the people to be used as a campaign speech, and they are false. I pronounce them to be false. Any Senator who will look at them will know that they are false. I am not now talking—that is matter of argument—whether it would be a proper deduction because of the difference between the purchasing power of paper and gold. That is another question. But it was when paper was used that this Assistant Secretary of the Treasury has fraudulently said to the people of the United States that there should be a difference of over $4,000,000 made in these three items. I say here that when this whole matter is examined it will not be merely $4,000,000, but it will be $40,000,000. I do not like to find any fault with what my brethren do, but I must say that before tables of this character are spread upon the records and sent forth to the people of the United States great care ought to be taken to see that they are reasonably correct. Of the opinion of this man I have nothing to say. I would not give a rush for his opinion. He says there should be $28,000,000 taken from the expenses of the Government for miscellaneous matter because of the war. That is his opinion. I am not going into that at all. It is not worthy of my position, nor of the Senate. When I have unmasked the fraud of the man, I leave him to be dissected hereafter by others.

So I say, Mr. President, in regard to these tables that were presented here a few days ago, and have gone forth to the people probably to be used as a campaign speech, let this go forth also to show that there is fraud here, to show that one of the high officers of the Government has been guilty of this fraud, and he one of the men who are brought here to swear to the Committee on Finance that the accounts of the Government are correct. Sir, point me to a man who will put a table of this sort forth, that I know, and you know, and every man knows who will look at it, is a fraud, do not bring that man before this grave body in order to make the people believe that the accounts are right in the Treasury or any other Department.

Sir, what I say with regard to this paper, which was made by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, I ought to have said days and days ago, because I know that it has done harm. I know the newspapers have seized it, I know that speakers upon the stump have seized it in order to show that there was but little more cost in 1875 to the people of the United States in the maintenance of their Government than there was in 1860, and I should have made this explanation long, long ago.

Mr. President, I desire to say but one other thing, and then I trust it will be the last time I shall have occasion to engage in a discussion of this character on the floor of the Senate. I have not desired it. I regret that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had not examined this table before he suffered it to be published in the RECORD, because whatever his opinion may be in regard to the propriety of making the difference between gold and paper, it is only when gold is used, not when paper is used. When paper is used to buy articles of commerce necessary to the Army and to the Navy, that is one thing; then it becomes a subject of argument; but when paper is used to pay the debts of the United States, to the soldier in the field, to the sailor on the ship, then it does not become a matter of argument. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, not guilty of any improper act himself, will regret, in my judgment, as much as I do that this paper has been presented by him without a thorough examination.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only desire to say in regard to the paper commented on, and especially in regard to Mr. Conant, that I venture to assert that I think the honorable Senator from Conneticut would not have used the word "fraud" once, much less frequently, in regard to Mr. Conant if he had considered that in this paper there was no concealment whatever. It is a statement of the expenditures for the year and a specific statement of the deductions made. There is nothing concealed. Mr. Conant deducted $12\frac{675}{1000}$ per cent. as the average premium on gold for the year 1875 upon the idea that as the expenditures for the year 1860 were in a gold currency and the expenditures of 1875 were in a paper currency, and that paper currency was depreciated to the extent of over 12½ per cent. on the dollar, it was a reasonable thing in coming at the comparative statement of the expenses for the two years to equalize the currency and put the expenditures of both years in gold. That may be an error; it may not be wrong; but certainly even in the popular sense, to say nothing of legal sense, there was no fraud in it. There was a perfectly clear statement of the manner in which he had proceeded in the statement, and I should differ with the honorable Senator from Connecticut in regard to the propriety of that statement. For example, consider one item amounting to $10,000,000 and more, which he stated, the pay of the Army. It is very well known that we advanced the pay of the Army from thirteen to sixteen dollars a month, more than 20 per cent., on account of the depreciated value of the currency in which they were to be paid, and when Mr. Conant made his deduction of 12½ per cent. he reduced the sum less than it had been increased by the legislation of Congress in regard to the pay of the Army. So as to the pay of the Navy, my recollection, not distinct, is that during the war and when our money was depreciated the pay of the Navy was increased. I think no person can come to any other conclusion than this, that when you undertake to ascertain the comparative expenses of the Government in two years the expenses should be stated in the same currency, whether it be coin or whether it be paper. But the facts are all upon the document. Every person, the Senator from Connecticut and everybody else, can form a judgment for himself whether the processes are right. There was no concealment as to what the processes were. I have only risen to say that I see no element of fraud in the statement so far as Mr. Conant is concerned, but only an opportunity for an honest difference of opinion as to whether he should have made a deduction on account of the payments being in paper in 1875 as against gold in 1860.

Mr. EATON. One moment.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will allow me, I desire to express my surprise that a Senator who ordinarily observes so carefully the amenities of official as well as social life should allow himself to employ such terms of opprobrium as those which he has directed against the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in connection with the report to which he has referred. Passing by the merits of the question under discussion, I exceedingly regret that my friend should use such language toward an officer whose only offense is that he entertains and has expressed certain views and conclusions concerning which the Senator entertains a different opinion.

Mr. EATON. I accept the rebuke of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska in good temper, but I have no words to take back. I am only sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts proceeds to defend this man; that is all. That I regret. He proceeds to defend the Assistant Secretary in a transaction full of deceit, as is perfectly plain. He takes the entire expenditures after he has executed judgment upon one hundred millions more or less, and he proceeds then to deduct $12\frac{675}{1000}$ per cent. from the whole amount, and my friend from Massachusetts tries to excuse him on the ground that the Army pay was increased some time. Was the civil pay increased? Was everything increased enough to make up the forty-nine millions which I read? No, Mr. President, not so. It was an error. It was designed to deceive the people.

Mr. WALLACE obtained the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALLACE. I will yield for the present to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Pennsylvania for yielding to me. I have been trying to get the floor all day.

Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Indiana proposes to print 10,000 copies of the President's message. Objection is made to that on the ground that the papers are ex parte. Let us inquire into the nature of these papers. The first paper is a letter of Governor Chamberlain, of South Carolina, to the President. Governor Chamberlain is a man of ability, cool, clear-headed, and moderate in all his views and not likely to make any hasty statements. As an evidence that he has not made any rash statement, let us compare the date of his letter with the date of the transactions at Hamburgh. His letter is dated the 22d of July; the riot occurred at Hamburgh on the 8th of July. There were thus two full weeks. Hamburgh is only eighty miles from Columbia, the State capital of South Carolina, with which it has railroad and telegraph communication. Now, will any person believe that Governor Chamberlain wrote this letter without a full knowledge of all the facts, without every effort on his part to get all the information he could in regard to the transaction? Governor Chamberlain before he sends his letter to the President waits until he gets a report from his attorney-general; and let me say right here in regard to this letter of Governor Chamberlain that it has been published in the South Carolina papers, in democratic and in republican papers, and as far as I have noticed a majority of the democratic papers of the State have indorsed and joined in the statement of the facts as made by the governor in this letter. There are some newspapers representing a certain portion of the democratic party in South Carolina that do not approve of this letter. They charge Governor Chamberlain with going out of his way in writing; but I have not seen in any one of the papers an attempt to deny the facts as set forth by him.

Governor Chamberlain occupies this position in South Carolina: His administration has been so acceptable to the people of the whole State, to the people of all parties, that to-day the democratic party in South Carolina is divided upon the question whether they shall nominate a democratic candidate for governor on the 15th of August or whether they shall wait until the republicans make a nomination in September, and if they nominate Mr. Chamberlain, whether they (the democrats) will not accept him as their candidate for governor. This letter comes from a gentleman holding that position to both parties in South Carolina; and it is fair to presume, as he seems to have pleased both parties in his administration as governor, that he told as near the truth as he could get at the truth in writing his letter to the President.

The following is the entire text of the letter, of which only portions have been heretofore published here:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, July 22, 1876.

SIR: The recent massacre at Hamburgh, in this State, is a matter so closely connected with the public peace of this State that I desire to call your attention to it for the purpose of laying before you my views of its effect, and the measures which it may become necessary to adopt to prevent the recurrence of similar events.

It is, in the first place, manifestly impossible to determine with absolute certainty the motives of those who were engaged in perpetrating the massacre at Hamburgh. The demand which was made by the mob upon the militia company for the surrender of their arms, taken in connection with the fact that the militia are not shown to have committed or threatened any injury to any persons in that community, would seem to indicate a purpose to deprive the militia of their rights, on account of their race or political opinions It seems impossible to find a rational or adequate cause for such a demand, except in the fact that the militia company was composed of negroes, or in the additional fact that they were, besides being negroes, members of the republican party. Those who made the demand were, on the other hand, white men, and members of the democratic party. The lines of race and political party were the lines which marked the respective parties to the affair at Hamburgh. I mention this as a fact, and as apparently the most trustworthy index of the motives and aims which inspired those who brought on this conflict.

As affecting the public peace, however, the effect of this massacre is more important than the motives which prompted it. Upon this point I can speak with more confidence. It is not to be doubted that the effect of this massacre has been to cause wide-spread terror and apprehension among the colored race and the republicans of this State. There is as little doubt, on the other hand, that a feeling of triumph and political elation has been caused by this massacre in the minds of many of the white people and democrats. The fears of the one side correspond with the hopes of the other side.

I do not intend to overstate any matters connected with this affair, nor to omit any statement which seems to me essential to a full understanding of its significance. It is certainly true that most, though not all, of those who have spoken through the newspapers or otherwise here, on the white or democratic side, upon this matter, have condemned the massacre. Their opposition to such conduct has not, however, sufficed to prevent this massacre, nor do I see any greater reason for believing that it will do so in the future. That class which now engage in this cruel work certainly disregard the expressed sentiments of those who assume to speak, for the most part, for their communities, and go forward without fear of public opinion or punishment.

It is sometimes asked, Why do not the colored race return this violence with violence? Why do they suffer themselves to be thus terrorized, when their numbers greatly exceed those of their enemies in the localities where many of these outrages occur? The answer is not difficult. The long habit of command and self-assertion on the part of the whites of these southern States; their superior intelligence as compared with the colored race; the fact that at least four-fifths of the property of these States are in their hands, are causes which contribute to give them an easy physical superiority thus far over the recently emancipated race, which still exhibit the effects of their long slavery in their habit of yielding to the more imperious and resolute will and the superior intelligence and material resources of the white men.

Add to this that in almost every southern community there may be found a considerable number of daring, lawless, reckless white men, accustomed to arms and deeds of violence, over whom the restraints of the sentiments of the better and more conservative classes of society have little, if any, power, who are inspired by an intense and brutal hatred of the negro as a free man, and more particularly as a voter and a republican, and you have the elements which would naturally give rise to, and in point of fact do give rise to, nearly all the scenes of bloody violence which occur in the Southern States. Besides all this, another fact must be noted here, a fact which, in my judgment, marks and explains the world-wide difference between the effects of such occurrences as this at Hamburgh upon the mass of the white people here and the effects of deeds of blood and violence upon the people of other sections of the country; namely, that such occurrences as this at Hamburgh have generally resulted in what is thought to be political advantage to the democratic party here. From this fact it results that the white people here are induced, to a considerable extent, to overlook the naked brutality of the occurrence and seek to find some excuse or explanation of conduct which ought to receive only unqualified abhorrence and condemnation, followed by speedy and adequate punishment. In this way it often happens that a few reckless men are permitted or encouraged to terrorize a whole community and destroy all freedom of action on the part of those who differ from them in political opinions. The more respectable portions of the white people here content themselves with verbal perfunctory denunciations and never adopt such measures or arouse such a public sentiment as would here, as well as elsewhere, put a stop to such occurrences.

In respect to the Hamburgh massacre, as I have said, the fact is unquestionable that it has resulted in great immediate alarm among the colored people and all republicans in that section of the State. Judging from past experience, they see in this occurrence a new evidence of a purpose to subject the majority of the voters in that vicinity to such a degree of fear as to keep them from the polls on election day, and thus reverse or stifle the true political voice of the majority of the people.

But the Hamburgh massacre has produced another effect. It has, as a matter of fact, caused a firm belief on the part of most republicans here that this affair at Hamburgh is only the beginning of a series of similar race and party collisions in our State, the deliberate aim of which is believed by them to be the political subjugation and control of this State. They see, therefore, in this event what foreshadows a campaign of blood and violence, such a campaign as is popularly known as a campaign conducted on the "Mississippi plan."

From what I have now said it will not be difficult to understand the feeling of a majority of the citizens in a considerable part of this State. It is one of intense solicitude for their lives and liberties. It is one of fear that, in the passion and excitement of the current political campaign, physical violence is to be used to overcome the political will of the people. I confine myself here to a statement of what I believe to be the facts of the present situation in this State as connected with the public peace and order, without any expression of my individual feelings and opinions. My first duty is to seek to restore and preserve public peace and order, to the end that every man in South Carolina may freely and safely enjoy all his civil rights and privileges, including the right to vote. It is to this end that I now call your attention to these matters. I shall go forward to do all in my power as governor to accomplish the ends above indicated, but I deem it important to advise you of the facts now stated, and to solicit from you some indication of your views upon the questions presented. To be more specific, will the General Government exert itself vigorously to repress violence in this State during the present political campaign on the part of persons belonging to either political party, whenever that violence shall be beyond the control of the State authorities? Will the General Government take such precautions as may be suitable, in view of the feeling of alarm already referred to, to restore confidence to the poor people of both races and political parties in this State, by such a distribution of the military forces now here as will render the intervention of the General Government prompt and effective, if it shall become necessary, in restoring peace and order?

It seems proper to add that I am moved to make this communication to you by no motive or feeling save such as should animate me as the chief executive of this State, bound to do justice to all and to oppress none. I venture to say that I have given sufficient evidence by my whole conduct in this office that, as governor, I am guided by my oath of office and my duty to all the people. I challenge any proof or indication, from any word or act of mine as governor, that I am capable of doing injustice, or denying justice, to any citizen of this State. But I do deem it my solemn duty to do my utmost to secure a fair and free election in this State; to protect every man in the free enjoyment of his political rights, and to see to it that no man or combination of men, of any political party, shall overawe or put in fear or danger any citizen of South Carolina in the exercise of his civil rights. In accomplishing these results, I now recognize, with deep regret, that there are many indications that it will be necessary for me to invoke the aid which, under the Constitution and laws, the authorities of the General Government may extend under certain circumstance.

And I trust you will permit me to add that I know no official duty more binding, in my judgment, on the Chief Executive of the United States than that of exercising the powers with which he is invested for the protection of the States against domestic violence and for the protection of the individual citizen in the exercise of his political rights, whenever a proper call is made upon him. I understand that an American citizen has a right to vote as he pleases; to vote one ticket as freely and safely as another; to vote wrong as freely and safely as to vote right; and I know that whenever, upon whatsoever pretext, large bodies of citizens can be coerced by force or fear into absenting themselves from the polls, or voting in a way contrary to their judgment or inclination, the foundation of every man's civil freedom is deeply, if not fatally, shaken.

I inclose for your information respecting the Hamburgh massacre the following documents: The report of Hon. William Stone, attorney-general of this State; the report of General H. W. Purvis, adjutant and inspector general; a copy of all the evidence taken before the coroner's jury; a copy of the printed statement of General M. C. Butler; a copy of a letter addressed by me to Hon. T. J. ROBERTSON; an address to the American people by the colored people of Charleston, and a similar address by a committee appointed at a convention of leading representatives of the colored people of this State, at Columbia, on the 20th instant.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor of South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT.

I now ask attention to the letter of the President in reply to the letter of Governor Chamberlain. I have been amazed, and I am sure the country will be no less so, to hear the criticisms of Senators on this letter. How the President could have said less I am at a loss to conceive, and in their cooler moments, when this subject is contemplated in the light of history, those Senators who have condemned the President will regret that their partisan feelings should have led them so far astray.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., July 26, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 22d of July, and all the inclosures enumerated therein, giving an account of the late barbarous massacre of innocent men at the town of Hamburgh, South Carolina. The views which you express as to the duty you owe to your oath of office, and to the citizen, to secure to all their civil rights, including the right to vote according to the dictates of their own consciences, and the further duty of the Executive of the nation to give all needful aid, when properly called on to do so, to enable you to insure this inalienable right, I fully concur in. The scene at Hamburgh, as cruel, bloodthirsty, wanton, unprovoked, and as uncalled for as it was, is only a repetition of the course that has been pursued in other southern States within the last few years, notably in Mississippi and Louisiana. Mississippi is governed to-day by officials chosen through fraud and violence such as would scarcely be accredited to savages, much less to a civilized and Christian people. How long these things are to continue or what is to be the final remedy, the great Ruler of the universe only knows. But I have an abiding faith that the remedy will come, and come speedily, and earnestly hope that it will come peacefully. There has never been a desire on the part of the North to humiliate the South. Nothing is claimed for one State that is not freely accorded to all the others, unless it may be the right to kill negroes and republicans without fear of punishment and without loss of caste or reputation. This has seemed to be a privilege claimed by a few States.

I repeat again that I fully agree with you as to the measure of your duties in the present emergency, and as to my duties. Go on, and let every governor, where the same dangers threaten the peace of his State, go on in the conscientious performance of his duties to the humblest as well as the proudest citizen, and I will give every aid for which I can find law or constitutional power. Government that cannot give protection to the life, property, and all guaranteed civil rights (in this country the greatest is an untrameled ballot) to the citizen is in so far a failure, and every energy of the oppressed should be exerted (always within the law and by constitutional means) to regain lost privileges or protection. Too long denial of guaranteed rights is sure to lead to revolution, bloody resolution, where suffering must fall upon the guilty as well as the innocent. Expressing the hope that the better judgment and co-operation of the citizens of the State over which you have presided so ably may enable you to secure a fair trial and punishment of all offenders, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and without aid from the Federal Government, but with the promise of such aid on the conditions named in the foregoing, I subscribe myself, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT.

Hon. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN.
Governor of South Carolina.

But the governor waited until he could get further information. He sent Mr. Stone, his attorney-general, to Hamburgh to attend the investigation and inquire into the transaction and make a report to him. Now who is Mr. Stone? He is a young gentleman, well known as an upright lawyer of Charleston. He is a republican, but I have never known him to take any active part in politics. I can safely say he is respected by people of all classes. He goes to Hamburgh and makes this report to the governor of the State. The report of the attorney-general is inclosed by Governor Chamberlain to the President. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Columbia, South Carolina, July 12, 1876.

SIR: According to your request of Monday last, I have visited Hamburgh for the purpose of ascertaining the facts connected with the killing of several men there on the night of the 8th of July.

My information has been derived chiefly from Trial Justice Rivers and from the testimony of persons who have been examined before the coroner's jury, now in session, and from those who received wounds from the armed body of white men who had taken them prisoners. From this information the following facts seem to be clearly established:

During the administration of Governor Scott a company of State militia was organized at Hamburgh, of which Prince Rivers was captain. This company was known as Company A, Ninth Regiment National Guard of the State of South Carolina. Arms were at that time furnished to it, and some ammunition.

This company, previous to May, 1876, had for some time but few names on its rolls, drilled rarely, and scarcely kept alive its organization. But in May of this year the number of members increased to about eighty, and one Doc Adams was chosen captain.

On the 4th of July the company drilled on one of the public streets in the town of Hamburgh. The street on which they drilled was between one hundred and one hundred and fifty feet wide; but it was little used, and was overgrown with grass except in that portion which was used as a carriage-road. While the company was thus drilling Thomas Butler and Henry Getzen, his brother-in-law, came along in a carriage, and demanded that the company should make way for them. Adams halted the company, remonstrated with Butler and Getzen for thus seeking to interfere with the company, and called their attention to the fact that there was plenty of room on each side of the company to pass.

Finding them unwilling to turn out of their course, Adams finally opened ranks and allowed them to drive through.

This incident seems to have angered Butler and Getzen, who made complaint before Trial Justice Rivers against the militia company for obstructing the highway. The trial justice on the following day issued a warrant against Adams, as he was the captain of the company, and had him brought before him for trial. During the progress of the trial Adams was arrested by the trial justice for contempt of court, and subsequently the case was continued until four o'clock Saturday afternoon, July 8.

At that time Butler and Getzen, with General M. C. Butler, who had been employed by Robert J. Butler, father of the former, as their attorney, repaired to the office of the trial justice, but Adams did not appear.

General Butler inquired as to the nature of the charges against Adams, and asked if the trial justice was to hear the case as trial justice or in his official capacity of major-general of militia. To this the trial justice replied that he was to hear the case as a trial justice, but if the facts showed that a military offense had been committed, Adams would have to be tried by a court-martial. General Butler then stated that he thought the case might be arranged, and at his suggestion, time was given him to see the parties. After this the trial justice did not see General Butler at his office, but learned that he had gone over to Augusta. In the mean time the trial justice had been informed that some two or three hundred armed white men were in Hamburgh, and that a demand had been made by them that the militia should surrender their arms. After a consultation with Messrs. Jefferson and Spencer, Rivers sent for General Butler. He rode up to the back gate of Rivers's house; the two had a conversation, in which General Butler said that he had given orders to have the guns given up in half an hour, and the time was nearly up. Rivers asked if some other arrangement could not be made, to which General Butler replied in the negative.

Bivers then asked if he would not consent to have him receive the arms, box them up, and send them to the governor, to which General Butler replied that he would box them up and send them to the governor, and if he (the governor) should return them to the company it would be at his own risk. Rivers then asked if they would give a bond for the arms, to which General Butler said that he would stand the bond, and, turning to another person—I think R. J. Butler—asked if he wouldn't go on a bond also, to which he replied that he would. Rivers then asked for time before fire should be opened on the militia, so that he might have a conference with the militia officers. This was acceded to, and Rivers then went to the building known as the Sibley building, in the second story of which the company had its armory and drill-room, and where it was then assembled, and told Captain Adams what might be expected if he should refuse to give up the arms. To this Adams replied that General Butler had no right to the guns; that the company held them, and he proposed to hold them unless General Butler showed some authority to take them. After this interview Rivers returned to General Butler, with whom was Robert J. Butler. He told them the decision to which the company had come. Then Robert J. Butler said that General Butler was his attorney; that he had come to settle the matter. If the company would apologize for the insult to his son and son-in-law he would do nothing more, but the whole matter was in General Butler's hands. General Butler said that as the men would not meet him he would have no more to do with them. General Butler was asked by Rivers if he would guarantee the safety of the town should the militia surrender their arms. He said that would depend on how the men behaved themselves afterward. This statement is confirmed by S. P. Pixley.

While these negotiations were going on, the armed body of white men in the town were concentrated on the bank of the river near the Sibley building. Soon after they were broken off firing began. Men who were in the building say that it was commenced by the whites firing upon the building. Adams gave his orders not to shoot until he directed them to. The company had very little ammunition, and all they had was a portion of that issued to the company when it was first organized.

After the firing was begun it was returned by the militia, and one of the attacking party, McKee Merriwether, was shot through the head and instantly killed. After this a piece of artillery, said to belong to the Washington Artillery, of Augusta, was brought over from Augusta, and four charges of canister were fired from it upon the armery, but without injuring any one. The persons in the armory escaped from the rear by means of ladders, and hid under floors of adjacent buildings or wherever else they could find shelter.

The first man killed by the whites was James Cook, town marshal. He had been in the armory, but was not a member of the company. He had gone into the street from the rear of the Sibley building, and was at once fired on and fell dead instantly, pierced by five or six bullets. Afterward the whites began their search for the members of the company. They succeeded in getting about twenty-five colored men as prisoners, some of whom were never members of the company. As fast as they were captured they were taken to a place near the South Carolina Railroad, where a large party of armed men stood guard over them. None of those thus captured had arms in their hands.

Subsequently, and at about two o'clock a. m., six men took A. T. Attaway out of the "ring." He and his mother begged for his life, but in vain. He was told to turn round, and was then shot to death by the crowd. David Phillips was next taken out, and was similarly killed. Pompey Curry was next called out. He recognized among the by-standers Henry Getzen and Dr. Pierce Butler, and called on them to keep the other men from killing him. He ran, and was shot at as he ran, one bullet striking him in the right leg below the knee.

Afterward, Albert Myniart, Moses Parks, and Hampton Stephens were killed. Stephens did not belong to the company. Nelder John Parker, who has been commonly referred to in the newspaper reports as John Thomas, was corporal in the company. When he was arrested and taken to the spot where the other prisoners were, he recognized among the party two gentlemen of Augusta, named Twiggs and Chaffee. He appealed to them for protection. They said he should not be hurt. He states that General M. C. Butler asked if he was one of the d—d rascals. The reply was in the affirmative. He was then shot in the back. Messrs. Twiggs and Chaffee then said if he was shot again they would shoot the ones who did it. They took him off, and had him taken to Augusta. He was shot before Attaway was killed. He may recover from his wounds.

One Butler Edwards was taken as a prisoner. He says he was taken before General Butler, who at the time was in the street near the Sibley building. This was about twelve o'clock.

Threats were made to shoot him. General Butler directed that he be taken to the others. He recognized among the crowd one Captain Carnile and —— Dunbar, of Augusta; said he had a long talk with the former. He was among the prisoners who were let loose and told to run; as they ran they were fired at, and he was shot in the head. He was not a member of the company.

Willis Davis, one of the members of the company, was taken to the place where were the other prisoners. The men stated that John Swaringen, of Edgefield County, had charge of the prisoners. He states that he saw General Butler before the men were killed, who asked him what he was doing, and told him he would have enough of it before he got through. He was shot in the arm near the elbow when about twenty paces distant from the crowd. The ball is still in his arm, and he suffers much pain. He also states that some of the young men from Georgia remonstrated against shooting the prisoners, but in vain.

Besides the killing and wounding of the men herein named, the party broke open several stores and houses, and, in some instances, robbed the inmates. They took from Mr. Charles Roll, the postmaster, and a very respectable white citizen, a gun which he had in his store, and his private property. From an old colored man named Jacob Samuels, in his employ, they took a watch and set fire to his house. They broke open the house of Trial Justice Rivers and did much damage, as well as robbed him of clothing. They obtained kerosene oil and attempted to set fire to a house, but were prevented by Colonel A. P. Butler from doing so. The ropes of the public wells were cut, and some fences were torn down.

So far as I can learn, the primary object of the whites was to take away from the militia their arms.

The man Parker, who was wounded, states that on Friday, the 7th instant, he had a long talk with one Harrison Butler (white) on Broad street, Augusta. Butler told him that if Rivers did not give orders for the militia to give up their arms they would take them any way on the next day.

On Saturday rumors were abroad in Hamburgh that there were armed parties coming in to take the guns, but little credit was attached to them.

One of the white citizens of Hamburgh heard a conversation between David Phillips and General Butler in the afternoon. Phillips talked very "big," as the gentleman said, and General Butler told him that they wanted those guns and were bound to have them.

In the afternoon Colonel A. P. Butler went to the various stores in town and told the proprietors that they must not sell any liquor to his men. In spite of this, however, some of the men compelled one of the storekeepers to furnish them liquor. From the same person they obtained kerosene oil to use in setting fire to a house.

The whites were armed with guns and small-arms of various kinds, and many of them had axes and hatchets.

It is proper to state that the intendant of Hamburgh, Mr. Gardner, was informed by General Butler, in an interview with him, that the arms of the company must be given up.

Trial Justice Rivers is now holding an inquest and taking the testimony of witnesses. Until their verdict is rendered it will be impossible to tell who were engaged in the attack on the militia and the subsequent killing and wounding of the colored men.

It may be possible that a careful, judicial investigation may show some slight errors in some of the minor details stated in this report. But making due allowance for such errors, the facts show the demand on the militia to give up their arms was made by persons without lawful authority to enforce such demand or to receive the arms had they been surrendered; that the attack on the militia to compel a compliance with this demand was without lawful excuse or justification; and that after there had been some twenty or twenty-five prisoners captured and completely in the power of their captors, and without means of making further resistance, five of them were deliberately shot to death and three more severely wounded. It further appears that, not content with thus satisfying their vengeance, many of the crowd added to their guilt the crime of robbery of defenseless people, and were only prevented from arson by the efforts of their own leaders.

Yours, very respectfully,

WILLIAM STONE,
Attorney-General South Carolina.

Hon. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor.

Now, I should say that that was official. It may be ex parte, but it certainly is official. The letter of the governor of South Carolina is certainly official. I will grant that it may be ex parte; but it is an official document, and I will ask Senators this question: Under the Constitution of the United States the governor has a right to call on the President of the United States for troops to suppress domestic violence. Does the Constitution require the governor before he makes that call to wait until the courts have examined the question? Does the Constitution of the United States require the governor to wait until he can get the whole testimony, until he can hear both sides? By no means. If a riot occurs in a State and there is domestic violence that he has not the power to suppress, he acts on the testimony that is before him, the best information he can get, and he makes his call on the President of the United States in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. Governor Chamberlain did not call on the President in this letter for troops exactly, but he makes suggestions as to what he deems necessary to be done in the way of sending troops already in the State to certain localities. It is an official document upon which the President had a right to act. The letter of the attorney-general to the governor is an official document, and upon that the governor had the right to act.

Now, we will go a little further. We also find the letter of the adjutant-general of the State. He is a State officer, and was sent to Hamburgh by order of the governor to investigate the transactions and he makes his report to the governor; the governor incloses that to the President. Is not that an official report? Is not that a report which the President of the United States is bound to take notice of, and on which he had a right to form his judgment and take action?

The following brief report of that officer tells its own story:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ADJUTANT AND INSPECTOR GENERAL,
Columbia, South Carolina, July 12, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with your letter of instructions of the 10th instant, I at once proceeded to Hamburgh, Aiken County, South Carolina, where I arrived yesterday morning, the 11th instant, when I at once proceeded to examine into the cause of the recent disturbances at that place.

The town of Hamburgh presented just such an appearance as one would that was, after being raided upon by a hostile army, with but this difference, that the latter would not descend to robbery and plunder, as well as murder. Nearly every colored man's house in the town (and Louis Schiller's, white) was broken into, and plundered, furniture broken, bedding and clothing stolen, and a general scene of devastation prevailing everywhere.

From all I could ascertain, as well as from the testimony taken before the coroner's jury, (copy herewith transmitted,) General M. C. Butler is charged with being the sole cause of the trouble, and from conversation held with many citizens in Hamburgh, all agreed that had he, Butler, been so disposed, one word from him would have stopped the scene of carnage that ensued.

I respectfully invite the attention of your excellency to the testimony of P. R. Rivers, esq., trial justice at Hamburgh, marked "A," of John Gardener, esq., intendant of the town, marked "B," and also that of Alexander Grinage, page 10 of testimony taken before the coroner's jury.

H. W. PURVIS,
Adjutant and Inspector General, South Carolina.

His Excellency D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

Now we come to another paper; that is, the evidence taken before the coroner's jury investigating the facts relating to the massacre. It is among the documents inclosed by the President in his message to the Senate. It contains a list of the jurors (duly sworn) and the whole testimony taken before the jury. I wish I had time to read it. I know Senators are tired, but I should like every Senator in this body to hear that testimony read. I was surprised on Saturday when this matter was brought up to hear a Senator, one of the most distinguished on that side of the Chamber, [Mr. THURMAN] say that he had read and knew very little about the Hamburgh transaction. I wish that Senator was here and I had the time to have the Clerk read this testimony. I think that he would join with me, he would join with every man in South Carolina who deplores such outrages, in denouncing the men who commit them. It is a sad and sickening tale of "man's inhumanity to man."

The next is a "Statement of M. C. Butler, of South Carolina." General Butler, the gentleman referred to here, has been charged and returned by the coroner's inquest as one of the parties accessory to these murders before the fact.

I think the Senator from Connecticut said, what has the President to do with that? I give the President credit for sending in the letter of General M. C. Butler. General Butler sends a statement to the Register, a newspaper in the city of Columbia, in his own defense. Governor Chamberlain, I have no doubt, though I do not know the fact, inclosed that to the President. The President, to show his sense of right and his desire for fair play, his desire to see every man heard in his own defense, to give every man an opportunity to exonerate himself from these charges, incloses that letter to the Senate, so that it may be spread all over the country; and yet fault is found with the President for doing that which I call simple justice; and if General Butler was here to-day he would thank the President for giving him an opportunity to be heard in this high forum in his own defense.

But the President goes further than that. General Butler was not satisfied with his first statement in his own defense to the Columbia Register, but he wrote a letter to the editor of the Journal of Commerce in Charleston. I will tell you why he wrote the letter to that journal. It is because we have a curious state of affairs in South Carolina which the people at the North do not understand, but very well understood throughout the South. The President incloses that to the Senate, so that that will come before the public, and yet on the other side fault is found with the President because he has done that. I say the President should be entitled to credit for that, too.

The next is a letter from Governor Chamberlain to Hon. T. J. ROBERTSON.

Mr. ROBERTSON is a member of this body. He writes to the governor of the State for a statement of the facts in relation to the Hamburgh massacre. Governor Chamberlain sends a statement of the facts to my colleague and it is published in the New York Herald. The President incloses that for the information of the Senate. That is objected to.

Then we have an address to the American people by the colored citizens of Charleston.

The Senator from Connecticut wants to know what the President of the United States has to do with that. O, yes! Mr. President, the colored people of Charleston have dared to issue an address to the people of the United States asking their sympathy and protection, against what? Against murderers; murderers in the democratic party; every man of them a member of that party; every man of them if he is not hung before the election will vote the democratic ticket; and because the colored people of Charleston meet to present an address to the people of the United States asking for their protection against a band of democratic murderers the Senate of the United States and the people of the United States are asked by a Senator in this body, "What has the President of the United States to do with that?" I say to you that if the President of the United States had not sent that to the Senate and given it to the public and given it the force and the power of his sanction, he would have fallen short of his duty.

Among the documents is an address by a committee appointed at a convention of leading representatives of Columbia, the capital of the State.

The first address of colored citizens at Charleston was at a public meeting in the city of Charleston. This address is from the leading representatives of the colored people of the whole State assembled at Columbia, upon invitation of the chairman of the republican State committee. Senators may say in regard to these two documents that they are not official; I will grant that; that they are ex parte; I will grant that; but they come from the representatives of a race who are in danger, they come from the representatives of a race who are entitled to the protection of the President of the United States, and of this Senate, and of the people of the United States against murderers, no matter who they are or where they are, and they have a right to be heard here in this place and all over this broad country.

That is all that relate to the Hamburgh massacre.

No. 11, No. 12, and No. 13 relate to matters in Mississippi. I have no more to do with that than any other Senator, but feel a deep interest in the sad condition of affairs in all the southern States. I am not like the Senator from Connecticut. I do not know whether he has even read these papers, but he says he does not believe them. Let us briefly inquire into them. The district attorney of Mississippi writes to the Attorney-General of the United States. I should like to know what right the Senator from Connecticut has to dispute what the district attorney of Mississippi says to the Attorney-General of the United States? By what authority can he say that what this man says to his superior officer is not true? I do not know that it is true, but I presume it is true. But there is one thing that I do know, that I have no right to say it is false and I am just as confident that he has no right to say it is false.

So with the "copy of report of a grand jury lately in session in Oxford, Mississippi." That is a report of a grand jury, men who are sworn to do their duty, and I take it for granted that it is true; and, knowing the condition of affairs in that State, somewhat familiar with the election in Mississippi in 1875, I know the "ways that are dark" that are resorted to to carry elections in the South by our democratic friends; and I have no doubt about the truth of these documents.

I have referred to all the papers accompanying this message and all the papers that are proposed to be printed. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on Saturday objected to the printing of those documents because they were ex parte. In my plain way, I have replied to that. But the Senator gave another reason for his objection to the printing of these documents. His other objection was the expense. Mr. President, the other branch of Congress this whole session has been engaged in investigating the doings and transactions of Federal officers. They have been on a grand and a wild hunt for republican thieves and they have caught some, and I am glad of it. If there is a thief in the republican party, I hope the democrats will find him and arrest him and punish him. I shall be the last man to attempt to protect republican thieves. There is not a republican Senator on this floor who has ever by implication or his vote attempted to protect republican thieves. But while they have been on this grand hunt for republican thieves, they have been so unfortunate as to catch a lot of democratic thieves. All the reports of those investigations are to be published to the world. It will cost thousands and thousands of dollars. Has any republican Senator risen in his place and objected to an appropriation to pay the expenses of the publication of the reports of those investigating committees? Never, that I have heard. I know I have not. I know I am prepared to vote to publish to the American people the evidence to convict the republican thieves whenever it is asked, I do not care what the amount is; the people are entitled to the information, no matter what it costs. But this resolution of the Senator from Indiana calls upon the Senate to do what? To publish 10,000 extra copies of this message and the accompanying documents. It will cost probably $300. The Senator from Delaware objects. Now, I ask the Senator from Delaware why he objects to an appropriation of $300 to publish the evidence upon which we can convict democratic murderers? We have helped to expose the republican thieves, and you must not object when we ask you to publish evidence that will convict democratic murderers in South Carolina or elsewhere. No, Mr. President, let the truth be told. If the republican party is guilty of anything, let them be exposed; if the democratic party has been guilty of anything, let them be exposed. If there are members of the republican party who are thieves, let us expose them; if there are members of the democratic party who murder men for their opinion's sake and that alone—because the murders at Hamburgh were for nothing else; they were murders for opinion's sake—I say let them be exposed. Let the people of this country know who are guilty in both parties and who are responsible for these crimes.

Mr. President, I have referred to the papers accompanying the message sent to the President by Governor Chamberlain; they contain his view from his stand-point. I hold in my hand an account of the bloody work at Hamburgh, in the News and Courier of July 10, 1876. The News and Courier is a democratic newspaper, published in Charleston. It represents what is known in our politics in South Carolina as the fusion wing of the democratic party. As I remarked a few minutes ago, the democratic party in South Carolina is divided upon the question of accepting Mr. Chamberlain as their candidate or nominating a straight-out democratic candidate. This report does not vary from but confirms all the statements made by Governor Chamberlain.

I have here also an article from the Charleston Journal of Commerce, the other democratic paper published there representing what is known as the straight-out faction, and which considers itself democratic par excellence. The News and Courier calls it "the bloody work at Hamburgh," while the Journal of Commerce heads its article "A hullabaloo," with the hope of turning this dreadful massacre into ridicule. These two papers represent the two factions into which the democratic party in the State is divided; and neither of them pretend to dispute the facts in the case, but assign different causes for the occurrence and give different reasons for their disapproval. The Journal of Commerce is edited by R. Barnwell Rhett, jr., a national name well known in the history of the country, and represents what is understood to be the true chivalry of the State; the men of real worth and respectability in the democratic party, the men who believe in principle and will fight for it.

THE PARTIES IN THE HAMBURGH RIOT.

Mr. President, I come to a part of my remarks which I regret my duty compels me to make. Who is implicated in this Hamburgh massacre? The other day, in answer to the Senator from Texas, I had the names of the parties that are returned by the coroner's jury as implicated in these murders read; and I say here publicly before the Senate, as I will say in South Carolina when I go home from every stump where I expect to speak, that I am sorry to see in this list the names of certain gentlemen. I find here the names of over eighty persons, citizens of South Carolina and Georgia. I know some of these parties. The Georgians I do not know. The other day, in answer to the Senator from Texas, I said that these gentlemen represented the best families in South Carolina. I say so to-day; and I say for them, I say for their friends, that I regret to find them in this position. General M. C. Butler, who is charged in the coroner's return as being implicated in these murders before the fact, is the nephew of Senator Butler, who formerly represented South Carolina upon this floor. I have no hesitation at all in saying here that General M. C. Butler in South Carolina is considered a high-toned, honorable gentleman. He bears that reputation wherever he is known. He was a gallant soldier. No braver, no truer man ever drew a sword in the confederate army. His blade shone the brightest upon every battle-field, and he proved his devotion to the cause that he believed was right by leaving a leg upon the field. He always has been honored and respected by that portion of the people of South Carolina who desired to be considered the ruling class. In 1870 he was the reform candidate for lieutenant-governor. There has never been a convention of the democratic party in South Carolina since the war that he has not been a delegate. I see that he is a delegate to the democratic convention that meets in Columbia on the 15th of this month; yet he is included in the report of this coroner's inquest as one of the parties implicated. I have known General Butler ever since I have been in South Carolina. I have known him personally and favorably. I have received acts of kindness from him, and would be the last man to do him injustice. I respect him as a gentleman, and I pray God that he may be able to exonerate himself before the court and before a jury of his countrymen. If General Butler is guilty of the charge that is laid against him, let him be punished; but I shall rejoice as much as the wife of his bosom would rejoice if it shall be proven that he is innocent.

But somebody is guilty, Mr. President, of these murders at Hamburgh. The fact that the people were murdered, the fact that ten American citizens without cause or provocation were murdered in cold blood cannot be denied, and somebody is responsible; it is not for me to say who. Here is the list that has been returned by the coroner's inquest upon the testimony sworn to. I am not like the the Senator from Connecticut, and I will not say everything is "false." I know it is ex parte testimony, but it is the usual course. We have the same laws in South Carolina that you have in New York, Pennsylvania, or Connecticut, and other well-regulated States. We have our coroner's inquests, and we call before them such witnesses as the coroner thinks necessary and proper to give evidence, and that is the evidence upon which this return has been made.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I do so because I do not exactly understand a statement he has made. He speaks of General Butler as a high-minded honorable gentleman. That I have no right to controvert, and I do not desire to do so. He says he hopes he will be proved innocent. I hope everybody is innocent, but I want to ask the Senator if he believes the statements that are sworn to in reference to his conduct and the conduct of these others in regard to the murder of these negroes?

Mr. PATTERSON. Of course I believe them. I have no right to suppose that the persons that went before that coroner's inquest swore falsely. Of course I believe them; I have no right to disbelieve them; but I am sorry for the parties implicated, and when the trial comes off in the Aiken Court House I shall rejoice if General Butler and the other gentlemen named here, whom I know and for whom I have always had respect, and whose families I respect, can exonerate themselves. If the testimony should establish their guilt, then I say, while I regret it, yet like a good citizen I of course hope that they will be punished. That is what I say.

Mr. WEST. As it suits the convenience of the Senator from South Carolina and there are some matters of executive business that require attention, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire an adjournment?

Mr. WEST. The Senator from South Carolina yielded the floor temporarily.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will go on to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 8, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I rise to a question of privilege. I am reported in this morning's RECORD in reference to the vote on the passage of the bill to repeal the resumption-day clause of the act of January 14, 1875, as saying: "I desire to state that, if permitted, I should vote 'no.'" On the contrary, I stated most distinctly that if permitted I would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The correction will be made accordingly.

DEATH OF GENERAL CUSTER.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to spread upon the records of the House of Representatives a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of Texas in reference to the death of General Custer.

There was no objection, and the resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution H. R. No. 395.

Whereas General G. A. Custer has endeared himself to the people of the frontier of Texas and elsewhere by his bold and dashing operations against the Indians; and whereas the news of his late sudden death while in discharge of his dangerous duties is received: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That we tender our sincere condolence to the family of the deceased and to the people of our suffering frontier, and that the governor be requested to forward a copy of this joint resolution to our Senators and Members of Congress, with the request that the same be spread upon the Journals of Congress, and a copy of the same be forwarded to the family of the deceased.

Approved July 28, 1876.

The joint resolution was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 163) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the resolution be printed.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following be proposed to the several States of the Union as an amendment to the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

SEC. 2. No public property or money raised by taxation or from any public fund or property in any State or place subject to the legislative power of Congress shall ever be given to or be under the control of any religious sect or denomination.

SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

REFUND TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1146) to refund to the State of North Carolina certain moneys therein named; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

E. J. GURLEY.

Mr. BRIGHT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 593) for the relief of E. G. Gurley, of McLennan County, Texas; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS M. HOWARD.

Mr. BRIGHT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3766) for the relief of Thomas M. Howard, of Lewis County, Missouri; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. PARRISH.

Mr. BRIGHT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 830) for the relief of Joseph W. Parrish; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

D. W. PRICE AND THOMAS AKERS.

Mr. BRIGHT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1464, a bill (H. R. No. 4074) for the relief of D. W. Price and Thomas Akers; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER & CO.

Mr. BRIGHT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3161) for the relief of Alexander & Co. for the loss of whisky by the negligence of the Government; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH FROM THE MISSOURI TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4075) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider?

Mr. McCRARY. Yes; not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that it is a rule of the House that when the reference of a bill is made by unanimous consent it is made just as in the morning hour on Monday, with the understanding that the bill is not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the rule, except as to reports of committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] was introducing a bill. He now understands it was a report from a committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Chair will remember that the rule only applies to bills, and it has been so held this session. I think that by parity of reasoning it ought also to cover resolutions, so that gentlemen asking unanimous consent to refer could not afterward by a motion to reconsider take advantage of the generosity of the House.

Mr. FRYE. Is it understood that this bill is not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is distinctly understood that it is not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. And the Chair thinks that that is the safer method as to reports from committees generally. As regards the introduction of bills there can be no question as to the rule.

L. H. FITZHUGH.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, instructed to pay to L. H. Fitzhugh, late Doorkeeper, an amount equal to the salary of Doorkeeper from the date of the consolidation of the office of Doorkeeper with that of Sergeant-at-Arms, May 22 last, to the 1st day of August; the said Fitzhugh having been detained and engaged in settling his accounts to that date.

THEODORUS B. M. MASON.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the joint resolution (S. No. 17) authorizing Lieutenant Theodorus B. M. Mason, of the United States Navy, to accept a silver medal from the King of Italy.

I will state to the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has reported adversely on all applications for leave to receive decorations from foreign governments. But this question relating to medals has not been presented to the committee, and I desire to have this bill referred that the question may be considered deliberately and formally reported upon.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

APOLINE A. BLAIR.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4076) granting a pension to Apoline A. Blair; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN F. CHANEY.

Mr. LEVY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4077) for the relief of John F. Chaney, a resident of East Feliciana Parish, in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIE CIRCULATION.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4078) to secure the prompt resumption of specie circulation and par money; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. COX. I move to amend that motion so that the bill shall go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Indiana that that would carry the bill to the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency instead of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. COX. All similar bills have gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The question being taken on Mr. COX's amendment, there were—ayes 51, noes 21.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. COX. The House do not understand the question exactly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] who introduced a bill for reference and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to amend that motion so as to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BANKS. It ought not to be referred to that committee, from the fact that they have reported adversely upon this subject. A traveling commission has already been appointed to inquire into this matter.

Mr. COX. There has been no bill reported to that committee providing for the appointment of such commission.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to secure the prompt resumption of specie circulation and par money.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, required to use the $10,000,000 in Treasury notes, made a special fund under the provisions of joint resolution for the issue of silver coin, substitute for House resolution No. 109 of the present Congress, in the purchase of silver bullion as rapidly as may be, and to coin the same into dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver, and said dollars shall be legal tender for all debts both public and private, and when said silver coin and bullion shall amount to the sum of $10,000,000 the Secretary of the Treasury shall exchange the said coined dollars for Treasury notes when presented at the Treasury in Washington in sums of $1,000 or over, and the notes thus received in exchange for dollars shall be used in the purchase of silver bullion for coining, and from and after the date of this offered exchange the Treasury notes of the United States shall be received by the Government which issued them for all dues, duties, and debts of every description.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall also cause to be executed a new series of bonds of the Government, the expense of which shall be under the appropriation for the Treasury Department, in denominations of $50 and multiples, bearing interest at the rate of one cent a day in coin for each $100 and exchangeable at will of the holder with Treasury notes at the Treasury or any of the subtreasuries of the United States. These bonds shall be sold to our citizens at par for gold or silver bullion at the market price, provided such price be not above their minting value, and for Treasury notes dollar for dollar. All bullion received for these bonds shall be kept as a special fund separate and apart from other money in the Treasury, and when coined or made into standard bars shall be used only in the purchase or redemption of the coin interest-bearing securities of the Government earning a higher rate of interest than those herein authorized. And all Treasury notes received for these bonds shall be used in the purchase of bullion for this special bond-redemption fund, and while there be bonds subject to call this fund shall not be allowed to exceed the sum of $10,000,000; but when no bonds can be called it may accumulate until bonds mature, when they shall be called and paid to the full amount of the fund.

SEC. 3. All acts or resolutions or parts thereof in conflict with the provisions of this are hereby repealed.

Mr. COX. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency had already reported a resolution appointing a commission to which this subject should be referred. But the Senate have not agreed to that resolution. This bill should not be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, but to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which, under the rules and practice of the House, has had the consideration of these subjects.

Mr. BANKS. Not by the rules. The practice of the House requires that a bill of this kind shall be referred to a committee that is not unfriendly to it. So far as the Committee on Banking and Currency is concerned, it has prejudged this question; it has entered its judgment against it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has no authority for saying that the matter has been prejudged. Where does the gentleman get his authority for saying we have prejudged it?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to enter my protest against the principle stated by my colleague, [Mr. BANKS,] that we should refuse to refer a bill except to a committee friendly to it. On the contrary, the rules of this House provide that all subjects of a certain character must be referred to certain named committees.

It is true when there is a doubt as to whether a measure is within the jurisdiction of a certain committee that doubt is solved by a direct vote in the House. It is also true that it never has been held by this House that we should not refer a matter to a committee that has it within its jurisdiction because it may have reported against other similar measures.

Suppose that the proposition was to refer a matter of amendment to the Constitution or of legislation to the Judiciary Committee. Does anybody suppose or will any one claim that it should go to the Committee on Rules, or to the Committee on Mines and Mining, because the Judiciary Committee has expressed at some time an adverse opinion upon the subject?

Mr. BANKS. My objection does not rest upon any old parliamentary law or rules, nor does the rule of the House rest upon any such principle as that. The rule of the House rests upon the principle of absolute and natural justice, that the reference of a subject to a committee is for the purpose of inquiry. Now if that committee has decided against the subject which it is proposed shall be referred to it, then it ought not to be referred to that committee, because it would not be inquired into. There is nothing in the rules which absolutely requires, against the judgment of the House, that a matter of this kind shall be referred to one particular committee; it may be referred to any one of many committees. Inasmuch as the Committee on Banking and Currency has decided and reported against measures of this kind, recommending that further inquiry shall be referred to a commission that is to hold its sessions after this session of Congress shall have closed, it is evident that no such measure as this should be now referred to that committee.

Mr. COX. I say again to the gentleman that we have come to no conclusion upon the subject.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I am somewhat surprised that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. COX] should desire that this bill to be referred to his committee, after having reported from that committee a resolution virtually admitting their inability to decide this question. They have reported here a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint commission to take charge of all these questions, thereby admitting their own inability to settle them. I would have no objection to that committee taking charge of this question if they would pledge themselves to report upon it, either for or against the proposition. But after the passage of the resolution reported from that committee the other day, authorizing the appointment of a commission for the avowed purpose of taking this great question of making the silver dollar a legal tender from before the House for the remainder of this session, I want this bill referred to a committee that will be likely to make a report upon it. If the gentleman from New York will pledge himself to make a report upon this bill, or have his committee do so, either for or against it, so that the question can come before the House, I will withdraw my objection and let the bill be referred to his committee.

Mr. BANKS. One remark to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] which I forgot to mention when I was up before. This is a bill concerning coins and it ought to go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. There is no reason whatever for referring it to a committee that has jurisdiction only of the subject of currency, and of a currency which, in the opinion if not of the gentleman from New York at least of many of his friends, is regarded as but worthless paper.

Mr. COX. There is such a thing as a metallic currency, and that is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, according to the rules and methods of procedure of this House.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] who brings in this bill really proposes to kill it by referring it to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, for he knows that that committee cannot report at any time. If they should report during the morning hour, we have already had some illustration of the way they succeed in their endeavor to carry matters through this House.

The gentleman asks me to pledge myself to make a report upon this bill. I cannot pledge that my committee will act upon this matter. All that I can say is that hitherto we have refrained from discussing it, not having it strictly before us. I could not pledge my committee to report upon this subject; no member, either as chairman or otherwise, can pledge his committee to a particular course. This is too large a question to be pledged either pro or con. The gentleman from Indiana not only would require his bill to commit suicide at this time, but he would go further and claim that it should be referred to a committee already favorable to it, thereby himself prejudging the question. Therefore, I say this bill ought to go where similar bills have gone, to the proper organ of the House authorized under the rules to consider the subject.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] having withdrawn his objection to the reference of this bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, there is no question before the House upon which there is a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand the gentleman.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I will withdraw my objection if the gentleman will pledge himself that his committee will report upon it.

Mr. COX. How can I pledge my committee to any particular course?

Mr. KASSON. I desire to call attention for one moment to two of the rules of the House bearing directly upon this subject. Rule 148 is as follows:

An additional standing committee shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress, to consist of seven members, to be entitled a "Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures;" and to this committee shall be referred all bills, resolutions, and communications to the House upon that subject.

Another committee, the Committee on Banking and Currency, by usage as well as because of the use of the word "currency" in the title of the committee, has taken jurisdiction to a certain extent of the subject of metallic currency. This bill also contains a proposition for the creation of a new interest-bearing security of the Government, a subject which belongs to the Committee of Ways and Means. The rule which defines the duties of the Committee on Mines and Mining limits the jurisdiction of that committee to subjects relating to mines and mining. Consequently it is evident that while one provision of the bill might justify us in referring it to the Committee of Ways and Means, while another relating to coinage might suggest its reference to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and while other provisions which relate to the currency might make the Committee on Banking and Currency a proper committee for its consideration, yet it contains no provisions relating to mines or mining; and consequently it does not, within the meaning of the rules, belong to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] is to refer the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which motion the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to amend by striking out "Coinage, Weights, and Measures" and inserting "Banking and Currency." Upon this question the Chair has appointed as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 80.

So the amendment of Mr. COX was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, to refer the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, it was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be understood that this bill is not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be understood.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry which is in the nature of a question of order relating to the vote just taken. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency would have authority to report upon this bill at any time. I inquire of the Chair whether the authority to report at any time, which was given to that committee, was not limited to the question of the repeal of the resumption act, and whether upon other questions that committee does not stand in the same position as other committees of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not before him the rule referred to by the gentleman; but he understands it refers to the question of the currency generally.

SALE OF INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I entered some time ago a motion to reconsider the vote on the report of the committee of conference upon the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage now the bill (S. No. 1007) concerning the employment of Indian scouts.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. BANNING. I think if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] would allow me to make a statement he would withdraw his call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BANNING. I think that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] would hear me he would give way.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday; but pending the demand for that, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] rises to make a report from a committee of conference, which is privileged and will be received at this time.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, the committee of conference upon the river and harbor bill——

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the papers connected with this bill are with the Senate; and until the report and papers come from the Senate this matter cannot be considered by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not advised as to the facts. If the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, then the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the gentleman from West Virginia state whether he has the papers.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have the floor, and desire to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be kind enough to speak to the point which has been raised and the question of fact whether the papers are in the possession of the Senate or of the House.

Mr. HEREFORD. If I can be protected in my right to the floor, I wish to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that the papers are not here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has asked the gentleman from West Virginia to speak to that matter of fact. If the papers are not in the possession of the House the point is well taken, and the report cannot now be made.

Mr. KASSON. The Clerk is the officer to certify to that fact. The papers are in his possession if they are here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the papers are not in the possession of the House.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have the floor, and I desire to proceed. The rules of the House declare that—

> In all cases of conference asked after a vote of disagreement, &c., the conferees of the House asking it are to leave the papers with the conferees of the other; and of course the report must be first made to the House agreeing to the conference.

The committee of conference on the part of the Senate have made their report to that body.

Mr. RANDALL. But the Senate has not acted on it.

Mr. HEREFORD. And according to the rules, as I understand them, I have the right to make the report which I have sent to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the papers in this case, together with the bill, are in the possession of the Senate; that no message has been received from the Senate as to their action, and consequently in the absence of those papers the matter cannot be acted on in the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the unfinished business at the adjournment yesterday. That unfinished business is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that requests for leave of absence be granted. Pending that motion the House adjourned.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the list of requests be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Mr. BELL for two weeks;
To Mr. O'BRIEN indefinitely;
To Mr. DURAND indefinitely from the 8th instant;
To Mr. A. S. HEWITT——

Mr. CONGER. I suggest in reading the list that the reasons be given which are assigned for making the request.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I do not care to hear the names read.

Mr. CONGER. Let us have the reason why the leave of absence is requested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that in each case some reason has been assigned for the request for leave of absence.

Mr. CONGER. Where request is made on account of sickness leave of absence should be granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Some ask leave on account of sickness and some on account of important business. That is the usual form in which they are made.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my request.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will it be in order to move that we all be excused?

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DURAND. I withdraw my request for leave of absence.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to know if there could not be separation as to those who ask leave of absence on account of sickness from those who ask leave of absence simply on account of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to a separate vote on each name if he desires it.

Mr. TURNEY. I also withdraw my request for leave of absence.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 59.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The Chair appoints Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. RANDALL tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we may as well have the yeas and nays. Such as are sick should be excused, of course.

Mr. HUBBELL. I have sent to the Speaker's desk a request for leave of absence, and I have done so because I have two sick children at home.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman sent his request this morning, it is not among these requests which were pending at the adjournment yesterday.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask then that it be included in the list with the other names. I am obliged to go home at any rate. It takes nine days' travel for me to go home and return, and therefore I have asked indefinite leave of absence.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask for a separate vote on the request of the gentleman from Michigan, for that request certainly should be granted.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I withdraw my request for leave of absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. RANDALL. My motive was to find out such as ask for leave of absence on account of sickness, so that those requests may be granted. There is no reason, and certainly there is no propriety, where requests for leave of absence are made merely on account of business, that they should be granted. It may be that within a few days this session will close, and I think it not unreasonable that gentlemen who are well should stay here and attend to business with the rest of us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the original applications for leave of absence.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BELL asks leave of absence for two weeks on account of illness;
Mr. O'BRIEN asks indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family;
Mr. HEWITT, of New York, asks leave of absence for five days on account of sudden illness;
Mr. COCHRANE, of Pennsylvania, asks leave of absence until Thursday morning next;
Mr. GOODE, of Virginia, asks leave of absence for three days;
Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, asks leave of absence for two weeks;
Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, asks indefinite leave of absence;
Mr. PHELPS asks leave of absence for ten days from to-morrow;
Mr. GIBSON asks leave of absence for two days from the 8th instant;
Mr. G. A. BAGLEY asks leave of absence for ten days from the 9th instant;
Mr. CHITTENDEN asks indefinite leave of absence from Tuesday next;
Mr. COLLINS asks leave of absence for five days;
Mr. ADAMS asks leave of absence for ten days;
Mr. DOBBINS asks leave of absence for one week;
Mr. WALKER, of New York, asks leave of absence for two weeks from the 8th instant;
Mr. PLATT asks leave of absence for four days from Tuesday next; and
Mr. SOUTHARD asks leave of absence for four days.

Mr. RANDALL. My object is accomplished in giving notice to gentlemen who are not called away by sickness that they ought to remain here. I withdraw all opposition to granting leave of absence in those cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman in charge of the appropriation bills thinks that the granting of these requests for leave of absence will in any way endanger a quorum, I am bound as a matter of loyalty to the business of the House to say I think we ought not to grant the requests, and, so far as I am concerned, will withdraw my motion that they be granted.

Mr. RANDALL. In my judgment, a few days will bring us to the determination of this session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have never known a leave of absence to be refused, and everybody understanding requests for leave of absence in this way are always granted, a large number of gentlemen whose names are upon the list have actually left the city, and it would embarrass them to have their names brought up in this public way and leave of absence refused.

It would put every one of them in an exceedingly embarrassing position. I am sure their requests would not be refused unless the gentlemen in charge of the public business think that granting their requests would result in the loss of a quorum. If the gentleman takes that view, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I am apprised that nearly one hundred members are absent. This is not confined to this side of the House. There is about a relative proportion of absentees from each side of the House. We have constantly within a short time past found ourselves without a quorum. It has been difficult to keep a quorum; and in view of the fact that in all human probability we shall be able to adjourn in a very few days, I thought gentlemen who simply desired leave of absence on account of business would facilitate the public business by remaining those few days; and hence my opposition in the first instance to granting their request. I now withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Further count not being demanded, the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] prevails, and the several requests for leave of absence are granted.

Mr. HUBBELL. I now ask that my application be acted upon.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Chair if it is in order to move that all the applications for leave which specify as the reason for the application the sickness of a member or of any member of his family or the death of a member of his family be granted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will make that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that all the applications for leave of absence have already been granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts as wanting to establish a rule for the future. The various requests for leave of absence which were on the Speaker's table have now been granted.

Mr. HOAR. I do not insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] asks for leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and leave of absence was granted.

HEIRS OF FIDELIO S. HUNT.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3750) for the relief of the heirs of Fidelio S. Hunt, late collector of internal revenue of the second district of Mississippi; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HURLBUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced (by request) a bill (H. R. No. 4079) providing for a district and circuit court of the United States in the State of Colorado, and for the appointment of district judge, attorney, and marshal; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be prinetd.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, by unanimous consent, introduced (by request) a bill (H. R. No. 4080) repealing so much of the act of May 21, 1872, as authorizes the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to run across the public reservation to their depot on Sixth street; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4081) for the relief of John T. Armstrong, of Alexandria, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DR. A. G. TEBAULT.

Mr. CABELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4082) for the relief of Dr. A. G. Tebault, of Princess Anne County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put on its passage the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships. This is a matter of great importance to a large portion of the people of this country.

Mr. BLAND. I think I must call for the regular order.

Mr. WADDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to state what the object of the bill is?

Mr. BLAND. I cannot yield for action on any bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. This will not take more than a single moment, and it is very important that the bill should pass.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to state to the House that this bill is unanimously approved by the Committees on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of both branches and has just passed the Senate. It will not take more than a moment to pass it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read for information. It authorizes the Postmaster-General to accept from the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, for service in transporting the mails of the United States between San Francisco and China, the steamships City of Sidney, City of New York, and City of San Francisco, the same being new iron American-built ships of more than three thousand tons register; said iron steamships to be substituted for any wooden side-wheel steamers now lawfully doing service under the act of Congress of February 7, 1865; provided that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed as creating, reviving, or recognizing any claim now pending, or as a basis of any claim which may hereafter be preferred against the United States by said steamship company growing out of any existing law or contract whatever, except such as may lawfully exist under the law of February 7, 1865.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to the present consideration of this bill. The last clause in it ought to be considered carefully.

Mr. WADDELL. As I have already stated, the bill has been carefully considered and approved by the Committees on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of both Houses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Argument is not in order. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the last clause be again reported.

The Clerk again read the proviso of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at the present time?

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the language of the last clause is very ambiguous.

Mr. WADDELL. It is the most carefully guarded language that the best lawyers could use to cover the avoidance of responsibility on the part of the Government.

Mr. BLAND. I must object.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN LOCUSTS, ETC.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4083) to authorize the appointment of a commission to investigate and gather information relative to the Rocky Mountain locust (or grasshopper) and other injurious insects; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN THOMAS B. HUNT.

Mr. STRAIT also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4084) for the relief and re-appointment of Captain Thomas B. Hunt, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 2692) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California;

The bill (H. R. No. 4060) to provide for the payment of certain indebtedness incurred in the construction of the New York court-house and post-office building;

The bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky;

The bill (H. R. No. 2252) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood; and

The bill (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 1915) to change the name of the steamboat Robert Ross.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 453) to authorize the Vancouver Water Company to lay water-pipes through the Fort Vancouver military reservation;

A bill (S. No. 788) for the relief of Robert N. Eddy;

A bill (S. No. 840) for the relief of Norman H. Ryan; and

A bill (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875.

REPAVEMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. WILLARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill repeals all that part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876, which provides that said pavement shall be fully completed and ready for use December 1, 1876.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4085) to repeal part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876, was received and read a first and second time.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STOCKBRIDGE AND MUNSEE INDIANS.

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4086) for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES B. VARNEY.

Mr. GOODIN, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Public Lands the bill (S. No. 808) for the relief of Charles B. Varney, of Portland, Maine, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the pay of the clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be, and is hereby, increased $1 per day, said increase to date from day of appointment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLAND. I cannot yield any further. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HALE. I move to reconsider all the votes taken this morning upon the various reports of committees and bills for reference; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that all bills introduced and referred by unanimous consent cannot under the rule be brought back on motions to reconsider. And in this case the same order will be entered in regard to each one of the reports of the committees.

Mr. HALE. That should be done.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to allow some bills to be reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLAND. I cannot yield any longer, and must demand the regular order.

SILVER AND GOLD COINAGE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will now begin at twenty minutes past one o'clock. Reports of a public nature are now in order from committees. The unfinished business coming over from the last morning hour is the bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the products of silver and gold mines, and for other purposes, reported by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] from the Committee on Mines and Mining. The pending question is upon the call for the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. As the session is so near its close, I must insist upon the demand for the previous question without any further debate upon this bill.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HALE. On that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; there being 16 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. PIERCE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; and pending that motion I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. PIERCE; and upon a division there were—ayes 15, noes 55.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. PIERCE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being upon a division—ayes 25, noes 77; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and there were—yea 1, nays 184, not voting 100; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Frye—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Beebe, Blackburn, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Conger, Cook, Cox, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Davy, Dibrell, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Eames, Eden, Egbert, Evans, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Fort, Foster, Franklin, Freeman, Garfield, Gause, Gibson, Goodin, Gunter, Andrew H. Williams, Benjamin Wilson, James Wilson, Woodburn, Yeates, and Young—184.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bass, Bell, Bliss, Blount, Bradley, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cason, Chapin, Chittenden, Cochrane, Collins, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Fuller, Glover, Goode, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Henry R. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiting, Wike, Andrew Williams, Alpheus S. Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodworth—100.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the call of Mr. PIERCE for the yeas and nays upon the motion of Mr. ODELL that the House adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 2, nays 167, not voting 116; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Douglas and Frye—2.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, George A. Bagley, Ballou, Banks, Beebe, Blackburn, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Williams, Willis, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—116.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HOUSE. My colleague, Mr. ATKINS, has been called away from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. My colleague, Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, is absent on account of sickness in his family. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. WALDRON, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "no," I think.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] whether he still insists on refusing to allow amendments to be offered?

Mr. BLAND. There are two amendments pending; one is to strike out the fourth section; and the other to strike out that provision of the bill which proposes to make silver coin a legal tender for duties on imports. On the bill with those amendments I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I still ask the gentleman whether he will allow us to offer amendments?

Mr. BLAND. I did make such an offer, but——

Mr. PIERCE. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to agree that when it adjourns it will adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. KASSON. That is right. If we can have no opportunity for amendment, we cannot consent to have this bill acted on.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PIERCE, there were—ayes 33, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PIERCE and Mr. BLAND were appointed.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I will yield for any amendment which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] desires to offer. [Cries of "Regular order."] I want it understood that I will yield to allow the gentleman from Iowa to offer amendments.

Mr. KASSON. I am asking for the right of all members of the minority to offer amendments.

Many MEMBERS. ["Regular order!"]

Mr. BLAND. I will say that I am willing to yield for amendments——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) The regular order is called for; and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will take his place as a teller.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 11, noes 66; no quorum voting.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move a call of the House.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SAVAGE, there were—ayes 23, noes 37.

Several MEMBERS. "Further count!"

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SAVAGE and Mr. PIERCE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 23, noes 49.

So the motion for a call of the House was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

Mr. BLAND. I wish to state that I am willing to allow such amendments to the bill as gentlemen may desire to offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the point made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] it is the duty of the Chair to announce that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. SAVAGE. I make the point that, without regard to the lapse of sixty minutes, the morning hour does not expire till some business of higher privilege intervenes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point taken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAVAGE] is sustained by the Chair, that the intervention of some business of higher privilege is necessary to terminate the morning hour.

Mr. BLAND. As I have said, I am willing that gentlemen shall offer such amendments as they desire to this bill.

Mr. KASSON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair.) There is no regular order, unless some superior motion is made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BLAND. I do not yield to any such motion. I am willing to yield to allow gentlemen to offer all the amendments they want to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio is that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BLAND. Does the motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table take me off the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has terminated by the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table. It is a superior motion and is in order at this time.

Mr. BLAND. Have I not the right to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question before the House is the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. BLAND. I hope that motion will be voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House can vote it down if it wants to.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I insist on my motion for the previous question on the silver bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the following bill for consideration and put it on its passage at this time——

Mr. BLAND. Is that of any higher privilege than my demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not; but the Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the morning hour has expired, that it necessarily expired on the making of the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table. The morning hour having expired, the gentleman cannot get back to the morning hour to-day in any way the Chair knows of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the regular order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the gentleman's bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, for that is in the morning hour, and the morning hour has expired.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITE. I am sure there will be no objection to the bill I ask be put upon its passage if it is properly understood. There was only one objection made to it on the Private Calendar, and the gentleman who made that objection now withdraws it, as it was made by him under misapprehension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that motion must be put to the House.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALE. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the President's message was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, and upon that I wish to be heard. Before I go on, however, I give notice that before the end of the hour I will, by arrangement, yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who will afterward take charge of the motion as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a privileged motion.

Mr. YEATES. What is the motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine calls up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the President's message was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, and is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to gentlemen of the House, while there was anything seemingly important pending, while there was any actual business, I did not seek to obtrude this matter. Having charge of it all the time, I deem this the most suitable time to call it up, and I propose now to proceed with what I have to say.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HALE. My friend from Massachusetts asked me to yield to him.

Mr. BANNING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me in reference to important business. If he will let me state it he will see that it is important. It is in reference to supplying scouts——

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not take me off the floor until I have finished my explanation.

Mr. HALE. I see I shall have to yield my whole time if I yield to one, and therefore I must go on.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Maine will be allowed to proceed without interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor on the motion to reconsider, and will proceed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I propose, as certain short-comings of this House have been referred to in the message of the President, to review some of the incidents and events of this session of the House of Representatives. I am all the more inclined to this duty, sir, because upon Tuesday last the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] declared that there is a wide and general dissatisfaction with the republican party throughout the country, and that the people demanded a change. While listening to that declaration, I thought of the counter-blast of Carl Schurz, who says lately that whatever may be the errors of the republican party, it is very clear that democracy affords no relief. Luckily the present House of Representatives gives us the chance to judge of democracy, not by its promises, but by its performances.

That party carried the country in the half revolution which swept over the country in 1874. To all appearance it had the popular voice behind it. It secured almost two-thirds of the members upon this floor, thus giving to it almost irresistible power to drive through any needed and justly desired reform, should it take upon its shoulders any such measure. It had to all appearance, I say, the popular voice to sustain it. Democracy was here in such strength that whatever wise measures it should propose for actual relief to any suffering interest, there never has been a time when it could not against all objections in other quarters drive both the Senate and the Executive into consonant action. For, Mr. Speaker, it has never been, and I venture to predict will never be the case, that the popular branch of the American Congress, when it is committed to any just measure of reform, any wide-reaching policy that meets with approval from the people, can be stayed either by the Senate or by the Executive. In that regard, whenever that question and that time shall be reached, American history will duplicate English history, and it will be found, as it should be found, that with the House arrayed for the right, and the Senate or the Executive arrayed for the wrong, the Senate or the Executive must and will yield.

The dominant party in the House of Representatives had such an opportunity afforded it when it assembled on the first Monday of December last as no party has ever had. The whole country was intent upon the action of that party for the coming session. It had been sent here upon certain promises of reform in directions that affected the living interests of the people—the question of civil service reform, the question of relief from taxation, the question of finance and the currency, and other broad general questions—upon none of which that party failed to promise largely in the canvass, that resulted in its success. In December last its promises matured, and it was confronted with pay-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no time to speak at length of the spectacle that Washington City presented to the country at the date of the assembling of this Congress. There were to be distributed by the dominant party in the House in all perhaps three hundred offices, reckoning from the page upon the floor and the folder below up to the Speakership and Clerkship of the House. And every gentleman here remembers that the city was crowded in its streets, that the hotels and the corridors of the House were thronged, and that for every place a hundred hungry applicants presented themselves here clamoring and scrambling for the good places and, failing in them, for the small places. The House was organized and the work of the headsman began at once. Now, I appeal to any member upon this floor who was here in the last Congress to look over the places attached to this House, and which fell under the control of democracy under the promise of a civil-service reform, and see how many familiar faces he discovers, faces that were here in the last Congress. Two or three only arrest my attention. One gentleman in the Clerk's office is allowed to remain there because of his familiarity with certain financial details and the difficulty of filling his place. The paying-teller, in the Sergeant-at-Arms's office, is left, and here and there is spared, as a monument of the past, an old soldier attending our doors. All of the rest have been ruthlessly submitted to the ax of the headsman, have been turned out and others put in their places.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are more Union soldiers in the employ of this House than were in the employ of the last House.

Mr. HALE. I have heard that statement before. I do not accept it as true; my figures are different now.

Mr. RUSK. Soldiers of which army?

Mr. SPRINGER. Soldiers who were in the Union service.

Mr. HALE. This was a specimen of civil-service reform with a vengeance. But it had one advantage, and my friends on the other side were entitled to that advantage. It disembarrassed the party in control. It left the House in the hands of its friends. And looking on and remembering how his party promised reform in political methods and moderation whenever it should be placed in power, it may be that Governor Tilden interpreted the action of his party as the fulfillment of its promises, and therefore in his letter of acceptance encourages the faithful followers of civil-service reform in these ingenious words:

> The public interest in an honest, skillful performance of official trust must not be sacrificed to the usufruct of the incumbents.

I fancy that we are likely to hear something of the "usufruct of the incumbents" as a political evil should the presidential election go democratic.

But I must follow the course of the House. The Speaker was elected and appointed his committees, and just here was a most serious outcropping of what might be expected in the future if the elections of 1874 be repeated in 1876. It had been predicted, it had been feared, that a democratic triumph meant the restoration to power of that element in the democratic party which carried the country into civil war and maintained that war for four cruel, tragic, desolating years. There was throughout the country a growing suspicion that this was a threatening danger. The democratic leaders knew this feeling of apprehension in the country; they have always denied it, and there have been here and elsewhere many protestations of modesty from gentlemen representing that element in the democratic party, that with them there was no existing intent of gaining the control of the Government through the control of the democratic party.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] in his speech declared—I do not use his exact words—that if any man believed that there was any danger of the South getting control of the democratic party or the country, it was a hallucination which observation and a little experience would surely dispel. I do not quote his language, but the spirit of his statement.

Now, the Speaker of this House sat in that chair, the representative of the whole party that had made him Speaker. He it was who could feel his party's pulse and measure its demands. As I have always believed, he is a very fair man; a man who will endeavor under any circumstances to do what he believes is right, withal an intense party man, and one who, instead of setting himself in the way of a pronounced demand by his party, would seek to answer that demand.

His first duty was to organize the committees of this House and to appoint their chairmen. This is one of the most delicate duties intrusted to the Speaker of the House. The legislation of the country is shaped in the committee-rooms. The voice of the committee is uttered by its chairman. His influence is largely potential; he represents the essential interests committed to his committee, and aside from his membership is looked upon by the country, if he be a man of prominence, as the indication of the policy to be pursued by the committee on matters submitted to it. These chairmanships are the highest honors that the Speaker can confer. They are greatly desired by the ablest men in the House.

Now I have here a list of the committees of the Forty-fourth Congress, with the chairman of each and the section and State from which he comes. I have taken the thirty-three old standing committees of the House, who do its work, who shape legislation, who give tone and character to all that we do here.

Committees of the Forty-fourth Congress with southern chairmen.

Elections, Mr. Harris, of Virginia.
Pacific Railroad, Mr. Lamar, of Mississippi.
Claims, Mr. Bright, of Tennessee.
Commerce, Mr. Hereford, of West Virginia.
Post-Office and Post-Roads, Mr. Clark, of Missouri.
District of Columbia, Mr. Buckner, of Missouri.
Judiciary, Mr. Knott, of Kentucky.
Public Expenditures, Mr. Milliken, of Kentucky.
Private Land Claims, Mr. Gunter, of Arkansas.
Manufactures, Mr. Stone, of Missouri.
Agriculture, Mr. Caldwell, of Alabama.
Indian Affairs, Mr. Scales, of North Carolina.
Naval Affairs, Mr. Whitthorne, of Tennessee.
Foreign Affairs, Mr. Swann, of Maryland.
Revolutionary Pensions, Mr. Hunton, of Virginia.
Railways and Canals, Mr. Jones, of Kentucky.
Mines and Mining, Mr. Bland, of Missouri.
Education and Labor, Mr. Walker, of Virginia.
Revision of the Laws, Mr. Durham, of Kentucky.
Coinage, Weights, and Measures, Mr. Stephens, of Georgia.
Patents, Mr. Vance, of North Carolina.

Committees with northern chairmen.

Ways and Means, Mr. Morrison, of Illinois.
Appropriations, Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania.
Banking and Currency, Mr. Cox, of New York.
Public Lands, Mr. Sayler, of Ohio.
War Claims, Mr. Eden, of Illinois.
Military Affairs, Mr. Banning, of Ohio.
Militia, Mr. Cowan, of Ohio.
Territories, Mr. Southard, of Ohio.
Invalid Pensions, Mr. Jenks, of Pennsylvania.
Public Buildings and Grounds, Mr. Holman, of Indiana.
Accounts, Mr. Williams, of Indiana.
Library, Mr. Clymer, of Pennsylvania.

In this list I have not taken into account either the small and heretofore unknown committee on expenditures of the different Departments nor the special committees. I take the old standing committees, who always have done and will do the important work of the House of Representatives.

Here it is seen that of these thirty-three committees organized by the Speaker in the first month of this session, twenty-one are put into the hands of gentlemen from the section lately hostile to the Government, and which it is claimed is not seeking to arrogate power in the democratic party; while upon the other side are but twelve committees given to the entire Northern States.

And these twenty-one committees that are so intrusted are not obscure committees. I find among them the Committee of Elections, the first on the list, a committee that largely controls and shapes the membership of this House. The Committee of Claims, with all of the responsibility of dealing justly with good claims and yet of protecting the Treasury from bad ones, is in the list. The important Committee on Commerce, treating some of the largest subjects that the American people deal with. The Committee for the District of Columbia; the Committee on the Judiciary, the great law committee of the House; the Committee on Private Land Claims; the Committee on Manufactures; the Committees on Indian Affairs, on Naval Affairs, on Foreign Affairs, on Railways and Canals, on Mines and Mining, on Education and Labor, and other committees are intrusted to southern men.

And in this first act of the democratic party through its Speaker, indicating where in the future power must be lodged if that party obtains control of the Government, I find that the section of the country from which I come, New England, although she felt the revulsion in 1874 and elected a large delegation of democrats to this Congress, was not awarded a single chairmanship; while Kentucky has four, Missouri as many, Virginia three, and other southern States several each.

I have here an old Directory of Congress in the days before the war, and I have looked it over to see how committees were apportioned then, and I do not find the South more strongly intrenched than now under the Speaker of this House acting at the dictation of his party at the beginning of the Forty-fourth Congress. Yet we are to be lulled by the talk which we hear that there is no danger of the southern element in the democratic party controlling and dictating its course in the future. Bearing upon this and showing how closely most of these prominent gentlemen were connected with the "lost cause," I give a list of the members of this Congress who were in some way associated with the "confederacy." The list has been made up from the Congressional Directory.

In the same direction was the course pursued in the various offices about the House.

Perhaps there is nothing that illustrates these two propositions, first, the promise of civil-service reform, and then the denial that the South is gradually absorbing the democratic party, than that presented by the post-office of this House, where a clean sweep was made.

In the Forty-third Congress the Postmaster was a Union soldier, who had lost a leg at Kenesaw.

But I will give the lists for both the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses:

Henry Sherwood, Postmaster, entered the service in the Second Michigan Cavalry early in the war. He was in all the battles in the West, from Perrysville to the battle of Kenesaw Mountain, in 1864, and lost a leg at the fight at Lattimer's Mill, on the left of Kenesaw.

Joseph F. Wilson, assistant postmaster, entered the service from Illinois, and in one of the battles of the war had his lower jaw entirely shot away.

Francis A. Wardell entered the service in 1861, in a Massachusetts regiment, and was totally disabled by wounds received at the battle of Winchester, Virginia, September 19, 1864.

J. H. Paine entered the Army from Ohio, and served honorably during the war.

R. S. Bishop served in a Michigan regiment during the war, and had his arm shot away by a rebel bullet.

R. S. McMichael, while in service in a Wisconsin regiment, nearly lost his eyesight in the honorable discharge of his duty.

D. B. Bradley enlisted in a Wisconsin regiment in 1861, and was honorably discharged November, 1864.

A. M. Legg, from New York, served during the war in our Navy.

C. M. Thomas, Iowa; J. H. Lytle and W. B. Sessions, New York; J. D. Serun and D. F. Bishop, Pennsylvania; and Cripti Palmoni, District of Columbia, were appointed from civil life.

The employés of the Forty-fourth Congress are as follows:

James M. Stewart, Postmaster, from Virginia, was captain in the rebel army, and served with J. E. B. Stuart's raiding cavalry.

Edgar Snowden, assistant postmaster, from Virginia, was a press correspondent in the rebel army.

G. W. Rock, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

G. W. Kennedy, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

A. W. C. Nowlin, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

W. H. Robertson, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

J. R. Fisher, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

W. B. Lowry, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

E. C. Glass, Virginia, served in the rebel army.

The other employés are Richard Allen, Virginia; Edward Estes, New York, who took the modified oath.

I must touch lightly upon this matter of the outside organization of the House.

Here and there individual cases attract attention and deserve mention, both as showing removals without cause and also showing the very superior order of merit introduced by the party just taking possession of the House. For instance we had an old journal clerk, a venerable and accomplished man, who had sat at that desk for thirty years, who had been adopted by a republican administration sixteen years ago, who had sat there as a come-over from a democratic administration. He is a marvel to-day of intelligence and accuracy upon parliamentary law, and was never more needed in this House in the interests of correct legislation than at a time when new hands took the reins. I refer of course to Mr. Barclay. But short shrift was given to him; and there was substituted for him a pronounced democrat; and in a little while my friends on the other side found as one result of their "civil-service reform" in displacing this veteran that the new incumbent was thriftily putting himself in a position to make merchandise of the important place that he held here.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me a single moment?

Mr. HALE. I find that my time is being consumed so fast that I am afraid I shall not be able to yield any time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Barclay resigned.

Mr. HALE. We all know about his resignation.

Mr. HARRISON. Why did you not state it?

Mr. HALE. I will state it.

Mr. FRANKLIN. You said he was displaced.

Mr. HALE. I say again that he was displaced. When Mr. Barclay found that such was the clamor and push for office upon the Clerk of this House for his place as well as all others, and that his removal was imminent, he resigned, and that will not be denied.

Mr. HARRISON. It is denied.

Mr. HALE. He resigned in order that he might show his own self-respect, as it was very proper he should do.

Mr. HARRISON. It is positively denied.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to correct one statement of the gentleman. Mr. Barclay resigned of his own voluntary accord; and I think I am authorized to say that the Clerk of the House never had any disposition to remove him.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. HALE. I cannot yield further. It was well understood at the time why Mr. Barclay resigned. I wish to do no injustice to our Clerk who has these subordinate officers in charge. The general system of removals showed that nobody would be spared. Mr. Barclay was intimately associated with certain gentlemen at the Clerk's desk whom he wished to remain if he remained and so stated his desire, as I understand, to Mr. Adams, the Clerk. He felt that assurances had been given to him in authoritative quarters that these gentlemen should be retained, and when they were all removed both the desire to remain was gone and also any confidence as to his own much further retention. The way is not important. The journal clerk went out under the system followed here.

The new journal clerk who had been put in by this "reform" House was not a great success. He had borne a good reputation, I learn, before he came into office, but before many weeks it was found that, important and delicate as were his duties, he having in charge the Journal of the House which records our legislation, he had put himself in communication with claims and claim agents throughout the country and proposed to make profit of his position by getting control of certain claims which were before this House and which depended upon the passage of certain legislation. So my friends on the other side were not able to keep him.

Mr. HARRISON. And he was from a State bordering upon that of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. He was from a State that had a strong and belligerent democracy, which claimed him as their representative and sent him here to fill an important office.

The following memorandum has been given to me as to the assistant journal clerk whom our reforming friends put into Mr. Clayton's place:

Flanagan, assistant journal clerk, legislated out June 30, was tried by court-martial, of which Governor Hayes was president, in 1864, for resisting draft and encouraging desertion, as editor of an Ohio paper, found guilty, sent to Fort Delaware; which decision was affirmed by General Hooker; and when the war closed he was serving out his sentence.

Here are some of the other officers who in a few weeks were proven unfit. I notice them because of the claim that bad men are to be put out of office and good men put in:

The clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Doorkeeper of the House.

There were other lesser offices, but I give no time to them.

The clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means was the now rather notorious James P. Hambleton. The place is very important. The clerk possesses all the secrets of this most important committee; secrets sometimes worth hundreds of thousands of dollars to desperate men interested upon the subjects considered in the committee, which reverses and re-arranges our tariff laws and all revenue laws at its pleasure. Mr. Hambleton was, I think, forced upon the chairman of the committee by other influence. He had been a lobbyist here for some years, and, it was charged, had been a blackmailer on northern merchants before the war. But a well-proved act of his showing pronounced sympathy with the most lamentable and tragic act in our history, the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, aroused the newspaper press and particularly the New York Tribune, and my friend from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] the chairman of the committee, removed him, and removed him, I have no doubt, willingly on learning all the facts. To show something of the character of the parties I will have read the following from the New York Tribune:

TURN BACK THE HANDS.—MR. HAMBLETON DEMANDS PROOFS.—A LETTER FROM THE DEMOCRATIC CLERK OF THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

To the editor of the Tribune:

SIR: Judging from your article of this date, you seem determined not to receive any statement or explanation as satisfactory. It sometimes happens that "a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still." In reply to your first onslaught I authorized your chief correspondent in this city to say that I never had a child or anything else named "John Wilkes Booth." That dispatch appeared in the Tribune as my authorized statement, and the Tribune also, in the same issue, made editorially (in minion type) a quasi retraction. Since that date the Tribune reiterates the charge, but presents no proofs. I now say for the last time that the allegation is false and malicious, and if the Tribune has or can get any proof that I, or any member of my family, ever named a child John Wilkes Booth, we say give it to the public without delay. Who are your witnesses and what are they? It is an easy matter for an editor—especially one who fought four years to save the Union—in his retiracy—glowing with patriotic ardor, to indite gushing philippics over the grave of a dead infant. But it is another thing to produce facts that sustain such a course. This crusade of the anti-democratic press against the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means is not only unfounded in truth, but it is partisan and malicious, and is the smallest and most contemptible episode in the history of American politics. The Tribune has been imposed upon by the envious and the malignant; its patriotic indignation has been lashed into a rage at the sight of a Quaker gun—nothing more, nothing less.

The Tribune may also be gratified to know that the clerkship of the Committee of Ways and Means is a matter of small consideration to its present incumbent. The clerk was appointed on the sole recommendation of prominent democrats who had served long and faithfully on this committee, and while the chairman is not responsible for my appointment yet my resignation has always been subject to his will and pleasure. Will the Tribune suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means some suitable gentleman for his clerk, after learning that he has a family and what he has named his children? No mistakes should be made. In conclusion, we ask the Tribune if there is anything in either of the new amendments of the Constitution, the reconstruction acts, acts of Congress, proclamations, or military orders that prohibits a man from naming a child anything he chooses? "We are in our father's house," and will never knowingly violate any law or anything done in pursuance thereof. We shall never invade, under any pretext, the domestic circle or the graves of innocents.

JAMES P. HAMBLETON,
Clerk of Committee of Ways and Means.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1876.

P. S.—If there is any additional statement you desire to make, please prepare it, and inclose it to your regular Washington correspondent, that I may comply, if possible, with your patriotic demands.

J. P. H.

MR. HAMBLETON ACCOMMODATED.

[From the Washington Patriot, Monday, July 8, 1872.]

DIED.

HAMBLETON.—At the Exchange Hotel, Washington, D. C., on the morning of July 3, 1872, at 10 minutes past seven, of inflammation of the brain, John W. B. Hambleton, aged 6 years, 3 months, and 17 days, youngest son of James P. and Martha L. Hambleton, of Atlanta, Ga.

The case of Doorkeeper Fitzhugh is so well known that I need not give it much time. He was the "bigger man" than Grant. He had been brought here before the democratic caucus because he had been either doorkeeper or sergeant-at-arms of the confederate house of representatives during the war, and that was not a claim to be disregarded. That was a claim with my friends on the other side so overtowering that it was not asked, "Is he honest?" it was not asked, "Can he spell?" it was not asked, "Can he write?" it was not asked, "Is he fitted by attainments and experience for this important place?" But because of his "war record," I suppose, he distanced all competitors in the caucus.

Mr. HARRISON. As soon as we found he was unfitted for the place, we dismissed him.

Mr. HALE. Yes; he was turned out. My friend should not be uneasy.

Mr. FRYE. Cannot the gentleman from Illinois be kept quiet?

Mr. HALE. But I must come to weightier matters. The House was confronted with the condition of the country. The majority had the country before it, in whatever condition it was, in whatever condition of depression were all the industries of the country, with all needed reforms to be set on foot. The South claimed that the whole republican policy there was wrong, that grievous errors and sins and crimes were the accompaniments of that policy, and that a drastic change was demanded. Here was an opening for some broad plan of legislation that the House at least might send to the country. But on the day that the House assembled we witnessed the faculty and the power of the democracy to grapple with a great subject; for it was deliberately proposed here upon the question of swearing in a member of this House to open what is one of the wisest things in the record of the republican party, the adjustment of the Louisiana difficulty—the Wheeler compromise—which had given to New Orleans and the State of Louisiana a peace which she had not known for years. I am glad to say that my almost always wise friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was not in accord with the movement and opposed it. But it was urged by almost all the leaders of his party that this beneficent measure of settlement should be thrown open, and it was voted down only by the solid strength of this side of the House, with the careful and moderate men, few in number, on the other side under the lead of Mr. HOLMAN. So disastrous was that experiment, so pronounced was the defeat, that from that day to this there has been no plan nor suggestion as to southern measures reported from any committee that I have ever heard of.

Other questions confronted us. The question of finance was upon every man's mind, and almost upon every man's tongue.

American commerce, Mr. Speaker, it was claimed upon that side, languished, as it undoubtedly does languish, largely from causes that are world-wide, and not influenced by legislation in this Hall. But it was claimed there that it languished because it suffocated in the grasp of an incompetent party; and the country looked to see what measure would be attempted by the dominant party in this House upon that great interest. The questions, too, of currency—its uses, its medium, its kind, its limitation—were all before the House when it assembled.

The House left all of these questions. It trod them under foot. It ignored them as of little account or confessed its incompetency by refusing to deal with them, and embarked in a wild crusade of investigation. Now here with a party in power during four presidential terms there was an opportunity undoubtedly for some good to be done. It was by no means new ground. No republican Congress had for the last ten years failed to investigate when real evils appeared and to censure and punish both friend and foe alike. But there was yet some opportunity for improvement, and when the crusade was started the country looked for some good out of the effort.

But, Mr. Speaker, while the House sent thirty-three committees into investigating duties, which monopolized their time and drove out all other subjects, yet the method and manner was such that from the beginning the whole movement was paralyzed. Then first was adopted as the almost unvarying policy—I believe the Committee on Ways and Means was the only exception at first—what had only been in rare cases ever attempted before, the sitting of these committees in secret; investigations conducted with closed doors. Parties who were investigated found, months after secret investigation had been set afoot, for the first time that they were under accusation. The minority members of the different committees had the padlock of secrecy put upon them, because of a false notion of the honor due to the committee by them as members.

Secret meetings of the members of the majority upon the committees were frequently held, and one result of all this was that when any facts were brought out that affected any prominent member of the party of the majority in the House the investigation was suppressed. No committee cared to follow up the claim of the Kentucky Railroad which had been forced through one of the Departments when it was learned that a leading democratic aspirant for the Presidency was implicated. When it found that John Roach had contributed money to the election of a democratic member upon this floor no attention was called to it. When Contractor Swift told the committee that his largest contribution had been in aid of democratic elections the committee felt that they had heard enough. And Mr. Commissioner Davenport opened up the condition of the elections in New York City under democratic rule so effectually that another committee, like the California hunter, drew off from the trail because "it was getting altogether too fresh." But whenever any slur could be put upon the hitherto fair reputation of a prominent republican the committees were eager and anxious to bring it forth.

Let me give an instance or two of these investigations and of the manner in which the democratic party conducted them. It has been the party that heretofore has set up loud claims of devotion to the individual and private rights of the citizen. One of the first things that one of the committees of this House did under the general authority given it to investigate everything was to send to the paper-mills where a mass of telegrams from the telegraph offices had been sent and to secure them for the use of the committee. Why, Mr. Speaker, one cause of the success of the electric telegraph has been the fidelity of its employés to the citizen who commits his most secret communications to the companies. This confidence is a thing that ramifies all business and social life. But the investigating committees of this House broke through all that, seized the dispatches, and spent their time searching for private messages that had been brought from the vats of the paper-makers.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the secrets, captured the information there gained, these committees had no more right to, as a matter of property, than they have to a gentleman's purse. They gained them in no better way than if they had stolen into a gentleman's house and had hidden behind his door or under his bed, and had listened to all the confidences and secrecies of his household. Let me give an instance of the craze that followed this hunting up of private records. A Cabinet minister, whose wife was at the seaside, received a dispatch something like this: "Arrived safely; baby well. You must decide about the cook." To the committee this was a vastly mysterious dispatch, and the Cabinet minister received from the chairman of the investigating committee a curt note, copying the dispatch and calling upon him to furnish the cipher for its interpretation. Think of the gross maladministration [laughter] concealed under this dispatch, and how the chairman of the committee must have racked his brain to gather its true and hidden meaning.

Can any craze go further than this? Why, sir, the famous absurdity of Sergeant Buzz-Fuzz—"Mutton Chops and Tomato Sauce"—is common sense compared with this committee investigating a Department of the Government.

But we have gone on far enough to ascertain that one result followed from all this. It was a thing that my friends on the other side hated to look in the face at first, hated to provide for in appropriation bills. But it soon became evident that the bills for all this had to be paid. The city of Washington was full of men who had been summoned here as witnesses from every corner in the land, some of whom wanted to testify and return to their homes, while others preferred to wait while their fee-bills rolled up. The Sergeant-at-Arms had sent his messengers out in all directions. The Government Printing Office had from the beginning a surfeit of matter thrust upon it for printing. The committees had to be given clerks and their salaries had to be raised. This very day, on a report from the Committee on Accounts, the salary of the clerk of one of these committes was raised.

Now, I wonder if gentlemen know, with all their claim of economy, how they have illustrated it in this House, where they have had full swing. I had the figures made up for me four days ago, and I found that there were then thirty-three clerks of committees of this House under pay, while never in the time of republican administration were there ever more than twenty-nine. And since that list was made up for me two more have been added.

The democratic party has been, and is now, running the most expensive session of Congress that the American Republic has ever seen. I have here a list of a few of the items of expense in some of the committees, only including fees, mileage, and per diem pay of witnesses. It is only a small part of the investigating bills:

Ways and Means	$307 60
Pacific Railroad	132 90
Commerce	259 16
Post-Office and Post-Roads	2,381 21
District of Columbia	1,472 90
Judiciary	4,174 28
Indian Affairs	5,801 50
Military Affairs	290 10
Naval Affairs	5,602 17
Foreign Affairs	669 87
Invalid Pensions	81 70
Public Buildings and Grounds	286 10
Printing	928 74
Expenditures:
State Department	325 47
Treasury Department	2,081 07
War Department	8,203 74
Navy Department	535 98
Post-Office Department	936 60
Interior Department	4,509 58
Public Buildings	45 86
Department of Justice	1,788 74
Reform in Civil Service	2,650 05
Rules	10 00
Select committees:
Texas Frontier	1,410 72
Freedman's Bank	1,027 20
Real-Estate Pool	1,377 39
Whisky Frauds	3,261 15
Federal Offices in Louisiana	9,000 00
Charges against Judge Wylie	218 95
Charges against Clerk Adams	16 00
Impeachment of Belknap	316 90
Total	60,104 66

It does not include any of the largest items of these expenditures; it does not include anything for printing the testimony. It includes nothing for stenographers, clerks, stationery. It undoubtedly does not cover one-tenth part of the additional expenditures imposed on the country by the action of this House.

Why, sir, ordinarily we employ but two stenographers to report for our committees We have paid this session (I counted them up the other day) seventeen. The appropriation bill for the sundry civil expenses of the Government has several pages decorated with items to pay for services upon these committees. I venture to say, and I measure my words, that the additional expenses of this House over and above the ordinary expenses of years immediately preceding, when they are all in for the entire session, will aggregate in the neighborhood of $1,000,000. A very large item of this is of course the printing, the cost of which cannot now be told.

Had great results been reached all this money might be well afforded. But setting aside the result of the War Department investigation where republicans contributed to the end as freely as democrats, the outcome of the investigations is a mass of partisan reports to be used for campaign purposes, and while no money of the Government is shown to have been stolen by officials, it is proved that the defalcations and losses are smaller than at any period in our history.

The democratic party claims, and that is about all that is left to it out of this session, that it has reduced the general expenditures of the Government. Now that is, if true, a claim that should be admitted, and our friends on the other side should be given due credit. I wish that I had more time to give than I have now; but I cannot pass it by without noticing it, although my hour is waning.

Now, what does that claim amount to in truth? Reckoning from the last year's appropriations, the reductions made in the appropriation bills of this session, when it shall have drawn its long length to an end, will perhaps amount to not far from $25,000,000. To do this the consular system has been put in peril, the Navy and the Army have been put upon short rations, laborers upon Government works have been cut off, and small salaries have been reduced. In a few days almost a thousand helpless men and women in Washington will be turned upon the streets.

Now the Committee on Appropriations and my friend the chairman of that committee [Mr. RANDALL] will claim that I have admitted that the democratic party in this House has reduced the people's burdens by the amount of $25,000,000. Sir, I do no such thing. I start with this as my cardinal proposition; no man can tell what credit should be given to this House of Representatives until the closing day of its term on the 4th day of March, 1877. It is no new thing that the good which has been done in the first session of a Congress has been undone in its second session.

The American people will wait before this House is given credit for a reduction of $25,000,000 in expenditures until it sees the waning, dying days of this Congress; so first, as entering into this discussion of the actual amount of appropriations, are all the subjects of appropriation that have been postponed. There have been some reductions, some advisable, desirable reductions, which I am glad that I have helped to make. But when it is found how much of this $25,000,000 is simply a postponement of needed and necessary expenditures, then some correct rule can be adopted in awarding credit to this House.

But there is another matter that will have to be considered; not in this session, but in the next, in order to determine the question of what this House shall have credit for. I refer to the immense mass of southern claims, private and public, that are lodged in the committee-rooms of this House, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said the other day, to be launched upon this House after the elections.

My friend from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] a member, along with myself, of the Committee on Appropriations, brought out in the early part of the session, in a colloquy upon this floor, what was intended upon that side of the House. It covered the Southern Pacific Railroad and the levees of the Mississippi; and he only fought shy, on monition from wiser members of his party, when I taxed him with complicity in the scheme for having the cotton tax refunded out of the Treasury.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me a single word?

Mr. HALE. I cannot yield now, because I have so little time. The gentleman will have ample opportunity for reply.

Mr. SINGLETON. I only want to say——

Mr. HALE. I cannot yield. I will put into my speech the colloquy with the gentleman from Mississippi as it appears in the RECORD, so that the gentleman shall not be misquoted:

[From the Congressional Record, February 4, 1876.]

Mr. SINGLETON. * * * Now, sir, let us be done with this. I came here as your brother; I came here as your friend; I came here with the purpose of promoting the interests of my own people and yours. I shall strive in all my acts to build up the ruined South. I want you before this Congress adjourns to assist me in two or three schemes directed to that end, which I believe you will do, because your own interests imperatively demand such a course. I want to build up the Mississippi levees and reclaim its alluvial soil, which will prove a more fruitful source of wealth to the United States than the Black Hills of the Territories or the mines of California, because it is from this inexhaustible soil of the delta of the Mississippi River that we can raise 7,000,000 bales of cotton a year if properly protected from overflow. We expect to ask a small sum for this work that will develop this alluvial basin and enable us to purchase from you the goods we formerly purchased and contribute largely to the expenses of the Government.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman state what the other schemes are that people desire?

Mr. SINGLETON. I will. I am not afraid to tell it anywhere. Another one is a Pacific railroad.

Mr. HALE. The Southern Pacific Railroad?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes; and then again I want the jetty system carried out at New Orleans which promises to admit vessels of the largest tonnage up to the wharves in that city. And if we can get these things accomplished you will find the South blossoming like the rose. You will find sources of wealth to you and the whole country that you never dreamed of.

Mr. HALE. Is not the refunding of the cotton tax another object which the gentleman desires?

Mr. SINGLETON. Well, I do not propose to discuss that now. When the proposition comes before the House I will give my views upon it.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the democratic party do not propose to help the South by building a Pacific railroad. The republican party may do so if they feel disposed; but, so far as we are concerned, we do not intend to indulge in any subsidies, the republican example to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HALE. I wanted the gentleman to state as a representative of the southern democracy what the democratic party, of which it constitutes a large portion, expect to carry before Congress adjourns. I thank him for the candor with which he has answered my question and the monition he has given the country.

Mr. SINGLETON. I stated that I had three schemes in view.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Maine by what authority he says that the gentleman from Mississippi is the representative of the southern democracy here?

Mr. HALE. I did it because it was not an assumption on the part of the gentleman from Mississippi, for he is not an assuming man, but he claims to state for the southern people as their representative, speaking distinctly for them, complaining of the republican party, that they required certain "schemes," and I use his words, that the South wished to accomplish before Congress adjourns. I wished to know what they were, and I thank the gentleman again for the monition he has given to the country, and especially does the gentleman from Mississippi represent the southern people, because he has been selected as one of their representatives on the Money Committee of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a carefully compiled list of southern claims now suspended in the committees of this House. They cover every imaginable variety of subjects from a claim for the price of a single mule up to the destruction of iron manufactories that were engaged in furnishing materials of war for the rebel armies. They come from every southern State and almost every county of every southern State. There is no member from the South, so far as I know, who has not introduced such claims here; and the important point is that all these bills are introduced because the member introducing them, whether he believes them right or wrong, is pushed and driven by his constituents.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on this subject.

Mr. HALE. I must decline to yield. Mr. Speaker, when the day comes that it will be safe to vote for these bills, the same influence that has driven these members will drive them to vote for their passage. It is an inevitable law which will dominate that side of the House, and after a little while, when the public mind shall have become gradually familiarized with the concession, as in the old times it did with certain exactions of the South, the northern democracy will become acquiescent and, provided the party gains power, will consent to the passage of these bills. They aggregate about $160,000,000 of those that are already here. Does anybody believe that the South has not an interest in these claims being paid? Does anybody believe that if it has control of the Government through the democratic party it will allow its members to rest day or night on this floor until these bills are passed?

Mr. LAWRENCE. And many of these are simply test claims, which if allowed will be followed by others to a vast amount.

Mr. HALE. Of course, as my friend from Ohio suggests, many of these are simply representative claims, and if one passes, it involves the payment of twenty or fifty times as much more, which will be covered by the same principle. These are only the courier, the advance-guard, the feeler, the skirmisher that is sent out to feel the line, and find whether it can be broken. Five hundred millions of dollars, Mr. Speaker, will not meet all these claims when we begin to pay them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Five hundred million dollars would not cover the total amount of these claims, without reference to the claims for emancipated slaves.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, he who lives long enough—provided always that the democratic party gets control of all the branches of the Government—will see what I here predict come to pass. If anybody doubts, let him wait and see for himself.

I cannot give a full list of their claims, because it would occupy whole pages of the RECORD. Here are some of them:

One of them, introduced in the Senate by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Virginia, appropriates $199,228.24 to pay certain "loyal" citizens of Loudoun County, Virginia, two hundred and six in number, "in consideration of their property destroyed by fire by the military authority of the United States in conformity with an order of Major-General Sheridan, dated November 27, 1864." This is the famous order in which Sheridan, after directing General Merritt to operate with his division of cavalry against the guerrillas in a certain district of country, says:

"This section has been the hot-bed of lawless bands who have from time to time depredated upon small parties on the line of army communication, on safeguards left at houses, and on troops. Their real object is plunder and highway robbery. To clear the country of these parties that are bringing destruction upon the innocent as well as their guilty supporters by their cowardly acts, you will consume and destroy all forage and subsistence, burn all barns and mills and their contents, and drive off all stock. This order must be literally executed, bearing in mind, however, that no dwellings are to be burned and that no personal violence be offered the citizens. The ultimate result of the guerrilla system of warfare is the total destruction of all private rights in the country occupied by such parties. This destruction may as well commence at once, and the responsibility of it must rest upon the authorities at Richmond, who have acknowledged the legitimacy of guerrilla bands."

By Mr. FAULKNER, of West Virginia: A bill to pay Abram H. Herr $21,067.51 for the use of land and buildings on the island of Virginius, in the Shenandoah River at Harper's Ferry, by the Quartermaster's Department, from February 26, 1862, to February 1, 1866.

By the same member: A bill to pay Wildey Lodge, I. O. O. F., of Charlestown, West Virginia, $3,547.50 for the destruction of buildings, furniture, and regalia by fire.

By the same member: A bill to pay the German Evangelical church of Martinsburgh, West Virginia, $2,500 for the destruction of the building and furniture by fire "through the carelessness of the military forces of the United States."

By the same member: A bill to pay Abijah Daily, of Grant County, West Virginia, $2,453.87, for losses in property sustained by him during the war.

By Mr. REAGAN, of Texas: A bill to pay J. A. Warren, of Tyler County, Texas, $3,150 for eight mules and three horses taken from him by order of General Laila.

By Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri: A bill to pay Thomas Plant, of Booneville, Missouri, $902 for boots, shoes, leather, and tools taken from his shop by United States troops.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE, of Tennessee: A bill to pay John E. Tulloss $12,982.04 for the burning of his buildings and destruction of property near Franklin, Tennessee, [a battle-field] by United States troops.

By Senator JOHNSTON, of Virginia: A bill to pay Peters & Reed $15,170.89, balances due them for labor and material furnished by them as contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in 1860. (This bill was passed by the House last session, but was not reached in season for consideration by the Senate.)

By Mr. HUNTON, of Virginia: A bill to pay James Green, of Alexandria, $37,750. (No consideration mentioned.)

By the same member: A bill directing the auditing and payment of the claim of R. B. Hackey for carrying mails in 1861. (Amount not stated.)

By Mr. WHITTHORNE, of Tennessee: A bill to pay the officers and men of the First Regiment and of the Ninth Battalion of Tennessee Cavalry, Confederate States army, for their horses which, by the terms of surrender to General Sherman in North Carolina, they were allowed to retain, but were taken from them on their way home, at Strawberry Plains, Tennessee, by General Stoneman.

By the same member: A bill to pay $42,271.34 to certain mail contractors in Tennessee for services up to June 8, 1861. [A claim long pending.] The second section of this bill contains the following sweeping provision: "That all laws conflicting with the payment of these claims, and which payment is hereby directed to be made, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

By Mr. HOUSE, of Tennessee: A bill to pay James M. Hinton, of Davidson County, Tennessee, $2,508 for "board, and so forth" of certain colored men who were taken from his custody when sheriff and employed on the fortifications of the Federal Army near Nashville, in 1862.

By Mr. ATKINS, of Tennessee: A bill to pay $13,000 to Bethel College, Tennessee, for occupation of and injury done to the college buildings and property by Federal troops.

It is noticeable that in only two out of the twenty-five cases is it even claimed that the parties interested were loyal citizens during the war.

Next comes an exceedingly important class of bills—those relating to cotton claims—of which five have been introduced. First is the old bill to refund the taxes on raw cotton, involving an appropriation of $68,072,388.79.

Four bills have been introduced—one by Senator MERRIMON, of North Carolina, two by Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, and one by Mr. HANCOCK, of Texas—restoring to the pension-rolls all persons whose names were stricken therefrom for disloyalty, under the act of February 4, 1862. One of Mr. VANCE's bills goes much further, and repeals not only the act of February 4, 1862, but the statute prohibiting the payment of claims of disloyal persons [section 3480, Revised Statutes] "and all other laws of similar character and purport." In the same bills occurs the remarkable phrase, "the war between the States, generally called the rebellion." If it was simply a war "between the States," by what rule of law or logic can the United States be held liable to pay such claims as VANCE's bill proposes to admit; to repeal the statute prohibiting certain payments to disloyal persons; to restore to the 1812 pension roll the names of persons stricken off for disloyalty; and for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in insurrectionary States? The most important among the more recent measures proposed is a bill introduced by JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER to repeal the section of the Revised Statutes which prohibits the appointment to any position in the Army of persons who have served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the confederate government or of any of the States in insurrection.

I select these as my eye runs hurriedly down the long list. It is a fearful account that these gentlemen mean that we shall settle some day.

In looking over the record of this session, I discover many things in which the party in power here has departed from its old traditions and principles. It stood for years as the advocate of the rights of the citizen, as the defender of the powers of the courts, the sanctity of the writ of habeas corpus. But this winter, with power unbridled and uncontrolled, the writ of habeas corpus has been cast into contempt and the adjudication of a high court has been disputed and sought to be nullified.

Mr. Hallet Kilbourn, of whom I know nothing except that he is an American citizen, came into conflict with one of the investigating committees upon some question as to disclosing names and producing private books and papers. He was committed for contempt by the order of this House, and resorted, as any citizen may do, to the intervention of the courts. The House disputed every step and employed counsel to represent it. Both upon the return and upon the final question of discharge under the writ of habeas corpus which had been invoked the petitioner was sustained and released. It had been a fair trial and the House had been beaten. But Mr. Kilbourn, having established the strength of the process and having no desire to withhold proper testimony, then communicated to the House his willingness to testify, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] sought to bring him before the proper committee with the result shown by this extract from the report of proceedings in the House of Representatives, May 2, 1876:

HALLET KILBOURN.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Real-Estate Pool be directed to accept the offer of Hallet Kilbourn to appear before that committee to answer any inquiries relating to such real-estate pool and to furnish such information to said committee as the books in his possession may contain, and the said committee are directed to examine said Hallet Kilbourn and his books."

Mr. RANDALL. I move that that resolution be laid on the table; that is the right way to treat it.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I did not yield the floor for the purpose of the introduction of anything for action. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] did not certainly understand that I yielded the floor when about to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill, to allow him to have the yeas and nays on a proposition like this.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. The point of order comes certainly too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana did not make his objection in time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi certainly understood that I yielded the floor simply for the introduction of measures for reference, and not for action.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I understood that I had the floor to offer the resolution. I did offer it; and a motion has been made to lay it on the table, and on that question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. The right way to treat it is to treat it with contempt.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of the roll.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I want to make an inquiry of the Chair. Can this resolution come before this body without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that unanimous consent was given, because no one objected when he put the question, and the Chair put the question distinctly to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objected. I heard him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I tried to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman, although he was waiting for objections.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion; and there were—yeas 138, nays 84, not voting 68; as follows:

* * * * * * *

Mr. Speaker, I might cite instance after instance where the dominant party here has sought to override rights heretofore respected and unquestioned. It has conducted its investigations in secret, and has ordered the head of a Department to communicate all facts known to him, without regard to the importance of secrecy in detective operations against knaves and thieves. It has demanded the custody of departmental papers, sometimes if given up to be put in charge of discharged incompetent employés who had been adopted by the committees as clerks or messengers. In its demands upon Cabinet ministers and their subordinates it has been exacting, imperious, and not infrequently rude and insolent. I commend to its consideration the letter of President Jackson to Henry S. Foote, formerly chairman of the committee to investigate general charges of abuse against the executive department as applicable to the present methods of democratic inquiries. The following sentences will indicate its character:

The heads of Departments may answer such requests as they please, provided they do not withhold their own time and that of the officers under their direction from public business to the injury thereof to that business. I shall direct them to devote themselves to their duties in preference to any illegal and unconstitutional call for information, no matter from what source it may come, and however anxious they may be to meet it. For myself, I shall repel all such attempts as an invasion of the principles of justice as well as of the Constitution, and I shall esteem it my sacred duty to the people of the United States to resist them as I would the establishment of a Spanish inquisition. If, after all the severe accusations contained in various speeches of yourself and your associates, you are unwilling of your own accord to bring specific charges, then I request your committee to call yourself and your associates and every other member of Congress who made general charge of corruption to testify before God and the country whether you or they knew of any specific corruption or abuse of trust in the Executive Departments, and, if so, what it was. If you are able to point to any case where there is the slightest reason to suspect corruption and abuse of trust, no obstacle which I can remove shall be interposed to prevent the fullest scrutiny by all legal means. The offices of all the Departments will be opened to you, and every facility furnished for this purpose. I shall, on the one hand, cause every possible facility consistent with law and justice to be given to the investigation of specific tangible charges; and, on the other, shall repudiate all attempts to invade the just rights of the Executive Departments and of the individuals composing the same. If, after all your clamor, you will make no specific charges, or bring no proof of such as are made, you and your associates must be regarded by the good people of the United States as the authors of unfounded calumnies, and the public servants you have assailed will, in the estimation of all honorable men, stand fully acquitted.

If I had more time, Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to go into the account of the repeated assaults made upon the national credit in the seven different attempts, under the lead of prominent democrats upon this floor, to repeal or nullify the policy of an early resumption of specie payments, to which this Administration is committed. They culminated on Saturday last in a bill which repeals the date fixed for resumption by the act of January, 1875; and so much time had already been consumed in doing nothing for eight long months that to this important measure but two hours of debate was allowed, and it was then pushed through under the lash of the previous question.

In the mean time all the material interests of the country are left neglected. A tariff bill reducing taxation has been reported, but the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means lets it sleep in the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Bristow's recommendation for refunding the national debt, by which at least $17,000,000 yearly in interest paid can be saved, is passed by unheeded. An Indian war of such magnitude as has not been seen for a generation breaks out at the time when the House of Representatives is reducing the Army and crippling the whole Indian service. The amendment to the Constitution offered by my former colleague, [Mr. Blaine,] relating to sectarian schools, remained until in the last week it was brought up and passed without debate, no interchange of views being allowed, because it had been determined that no expression of hostility should be permitted from the democratic side of the House.

The last days of this session, Mr. Speaker, are upon us. Your party has had its day in court. For nearly nine months the American people have looked upon this body as it has drifted and hopelessly struggled on with elements in it which, while useless for any present good, have sounded a constant alarm of future dangers.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. COX obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to my colleague, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) authorizing the appointment of commissioners to ascertain on what terms a mutually beneficial treaty of commerce with Great Britian on behalf of the Dominion of Canada can be arranged was made a special order for the third Tuesday in May last after the morning hour and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with regular appropriation bills.

Mr. CONGER. Before any privilege is gained in reference to this matter, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. WARD. The debate on the consideration of the resolution began on the 18th of May last, and since that time has been suspended by appropriation bills and other important measures. The near approach of the end of the session, the absence of many members who desire to participate in the discussion, and the indisposition to take up at this stage of the session a question of such great importance, I am induced to ask that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until the second Tuesday in December next, and made a special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I object to it as a continuing special order from day to day. I have no objection to it being assigned for one particular day.

Mr. WARD. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is now a special order, and I wish merely to fix a definite time when it is to be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to fixing a definite time, but I do object to making it a continuing special order from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. WARD. But it is now a special order from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No new rights would be acquired by the gentleman from New York under this motion; for, as he has already stated, it is now a continuing special order from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. Being desirous of defeating every possible measure looking to this end, I wish to give it no new life and no new place.

Mr. WARD. It gets no new life, but I propose merely to designate a certain day next session, so that all may be advised when it is to come up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It merely fixes the day when the proposition is to be called up.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to a certain day being fixed for taking it up, but I do object to making it a continuing order from that day.

Mr. WARD. Do I understand the gentleman from Michigan to insist on his objection?

Mr. CONGER. I do. The time is past for renewing the special order, and the gentleman has no remedy except by consent.

Mr. WARD. I can let it stand as it is and it will come up as the special order, to continue from day to day until disposed of. My only object is that gentlemen who wish to participate in the debate may know exactly when the bill is to be called up for action. As objection is insisted upon, I will let it stand as it is. I have only desired to oblige those gentlemen who wished to be heard on the question.

Mr. COX. I do not yield to any discussion.

Mr. WARD. Does the gentleman still insist on his objection?

Mr. CONGER. I do.

Mr. WARD. Then I will let the order stand as it is. It is now a special order from day to day until disposed of; and I give notice I shall call it up at the proper time.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. HALE to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President on the sundry civil bill was referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I could not in five minutes, as I hoped, reply to such a magnificent and hefty speech as that just made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] [Laughter.] In the history of our Government, from its beginning down, have we ever seen such a collection of particular and minute things which make up so little in the aggregate? [Laughter.] The gentleman did not refer to the whales, but to the minnows. [Laughter.] Why did he not refer to the unloading of General Grant and his administration and to the various frauds connected with the Executive Departments? That was not in his line; but he charged upon this House that it had actually, in some small instances, reformed itself. Did he not charge that one committee with the aid of its chairman, my distinguished friend from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] had dismissed its clerk, and that the Committee on Rules had dismissed two men, one a journal clerk and the other a doorkeeper, for certain improprieties? No thievery was charged on these men, and no thievery proved, and no one believed that they were thieves.

ORGANIZATION OF COMMITTEES.

If the worst that can be said of this House and its organization is that the committees were made badly and sectionally against the North by our absent, lamented, and distinguished Speaker, then the opposition is most unhappy. I cannot compare our incomparable Speaker and the committees made by him with Mr. Ex-Speaker Blaine, of Maine, and his committees. But I will say that in the last Congress, out of thirty-seven chairmanships, only seven were given to the South and those very inconsequential; so that now if the South has a fair share of chairmen, it is but a compensation for the past.

Mr. DURHAM. Just one moment. Out of forty-four only seven were given to the South.

Mr. COX. I am corrected. Out of forty-four only seven were given to the South by the Speaker from Maine, [Mr. Blaine.] Of course my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] would not or did not look that up. But mere chairmanships of committees are not important, for I have been a chairman myself. [Laughter.] The point is, how are committees made as to majorities and business. That is the point. From it is seen the patriotic or partisan animus.

The fact is that my friend's theory about the making up of committees in this Congress by Mr. Speaker KERR is not borne out by the facts. You must look not to the chairman, but to the majority of a committee, to find the essential elements and voice of a committee which direct both the action of the committee and to a great extent that of the House.

But I arose, sir, principally for the purpose of calling attention to the unsectional and fair constitution of the committees of this Congress, so as to repel the aspersions of the gentleman from Maine. And how are they?

The Committee of Elections have a majority from the North; the Committee of Ways and Means have also a majority of one from the North; the Committee on Appropriations have seven from the North to four from the South. I wish the House would notice that by the North I mean above Mason and Dixon's line, and how badly the gentleman from Maine has interpreted the unsectional action of Mr. Speaker KERR. The Committee on Banking and Currency have nine from the North to two from the South; the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, which was mentioned by the gentleman [Mr. HALE] in a peculiar way, have seven from the North to four from the South; the Committee of Claims have seven from the North to four from the South; and, by the way, most of these war claims, of which they have jurisdiction and to which sinister reference was made, are owned by northern men; four-fifths of them.

A MEMBER. All of them loyal men.

Mr. COX. Yes, speculators who bought them up; and, gentlemen on the other side, you know it. [Laughter.] I do not know a man from New England who has not a little speculative turn. [Laughter.] The Committee on Commerce have seven from the North to four from the South. My friend from Maine is interested in commerce and shipping, and the committee on that subject have seven from the North and four from the South. He cannot complain of this arrangement. We have not revived shipping yet, because we have not passed our reform tariff bill to take the tax off of certain articles which enter into a ship. But some day or other, when Governor Tilden is President, we will revive shipping in Maine and elsewhere, in spite of the exacting and destructive policies of the republican party.

I am going over the committees in their order. Upon the Committee on the Public Lands there are nine North to two South. On the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads they are six North to five South. On the Committee for the District of Columbia they are eight to three. On the important Committee on the Judiciary they are eight to three. On the Committee on War Claims, let it be remembered that there are seven North to four South. On the Committee on Public Expenditures they are six to five. On the Committee on Private Land Claims they are five to four.

Here let me pause on the next. It is the Committee on Manufactures. Well, what do they do? Have they ever met or reported? What are they constituted for? The Speaker of our House has actually given a majority of one to the South on that committee! No, I beg pardon; he has made them even, five to five. That is the only lead I have struck as yet where there is not a majority of northern men. Why should not the North, which has predominance in population and interests, have a predominant voice on the committees?

Upon the Committee on Agriculture there are six North to five South; and yet the fruits of the soil, cotton, grain, &c., are not all North. Upon the Committee on Indian Affairs they are as seven to five. Upon the Committee on Military Affairs there are seven to four. Upon the Committee on the Militia, six to five; upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, seven to four; upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs they are eight to three; upon the Committee on the Territories they are nine to three; upon the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions they are seven to four; upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions there are six North to five South; upon the Committee on Railways and Canals they are six to five; upon the Committee on Mines and Mining they are eight to three.

The next is the Committee on Education and Labor. Now, if I had been the Speaker of this House I think I would have given a majority to the South on that committee; and would not my friend from Maine have done so? Why? Because we are trying to educate the "wards of the nation," by the help of the Peabody fund and public lands. We have bills to donate Federal property for a noble, educational, and humanitarian purpose. My friend from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] has reported such a bill. Well, sir, that committee is the first I have met, upon which there is a majority of southern men. They are five North to six South! Is this any wonderful goodness in our Speaker! The distinguished ex-governor of Virginia, born in the North, is the chairman of the committee. Who can complain of his designation as chairman? He has reported from that committee a measure designed to promote the education of the colored children of the nation. He has placed it on the basis of illiteracy, and in spite of northern prejudices. I think you cannot complain of the constitution of that committee, on the ground that it is sectionally southern and African. It ought to be southern; and so it is made.

Upon the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States there are nine North to two South. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures are seven to three. The Committee on Patents are six to five. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, seven to four. The North still predominates.

COST AND UTILITY OF INVESTIGATIONS.

Upon the Committee of Accounts they are four North to one South. And what a splendid Committee of Accounts we have in this House! [Laughter.] How the chairman of that committee will carry out economies when he becomes governor of the State of Indiana! [Laughter.] I challenge my friend from Maine when he goes to Indiana to stump for Governor Hayes to take up and scrutinize the accounts of this Congress under the auspices and vigilance of our chairman of accounts. He says that they will amount to a million dollars. He will find that under the management of our blue-jean governor they have been well expended, just and fair. When the gentleman complains that we have been expensive this session he must remember the great expense that has been incurred in investigations. He says $1,000,000. He must remember who caused the investigations. It is a mere guess as to the amount, however. Why, sir, suppose the amount true; it would pay us if we spent five millions. We need it as an example to future Houses and future officers in the conduct of the public business. We need to spend much as a preventive of fraud. Shall we not examine into and develop fraud because it costs money? Why, my friend from Tennessee, the chairman of the Naval Committee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] while making an examination about naval affairs, struck an account of $23,000 with Donald McKay, in Boston, which has been refunded to the Treasury because of this very committee of investigation finding out the mistake. The investigation paid for itself and more. Altogether, I believe, there have been thus far only $116,000 charged against investigations. If the truth were known, sir, that amount has already been paid up in full by results, and ten times over. Besides, I am informed that the Printing Committee discovered one item of over a thousand dollars due from one firm and caused its collection, and thus more than paying all expenses of that peculiar investigation. So that directly, not to say indirectly, the discovery of wrongs is useful even in a pecuniary sense.

Mr. Speaker, I was simply going over the list of committees to show the proportion of northern to southern men upon them. I desire thus to repel the attack upon Mr. Speaker KERR, who formed them.

The next is the Committee on Mileage, on which there are three northern men to one from the South; Joint Committee on Printing, two to one; Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, four to one; Joint Committee on the Library, two to one; Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, four to one; Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, seven to two; Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, three to two; Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, four to one; Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, two to three. I hardly see how that happened. Perhaps the Speaker thought he had been leaning too much in favor of the North and wildly changed the proportion here! The criticism the gentleman from Maine intended has on this little committee missed its mark. The Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department has four to one; Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, six to one; Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, six to three. Yet how useful have we made all these heretofore useless committees on expenditures. They became active instruments of honesty. There was a reason for it. But does it detract from the utility because northern members predominate? The truth is, our honored Speaker only thought of honest men, and not of sections, in forming his committees.

The next is the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. Here there are eight North to three South. God knows there is a great necessity for such a committee, as well for a reform in the civil service—not in this House and its constitution so much as all through the country, from Alaska to Georgia, from Galveston to Penobscot, or whatever part of the world the gentleman from Maine may live in. [Laughter.] Now the Committee on Mississippi Levees are four North to seven South. This, Mr. Speaker, is the third committee where there is a majority of southern men. If the gentleman from Maine himself were Speaker would he not give a majority of that committee to the South? No? Then I take him to be less fair than I always thought him to be. Why should not southern men have the Mississippi levees in their own charge for report and legislation? They were so given in the appointment of the committee by Mr. Speaker KERR; four northern men to seven southern men. Is it not their peculiar interest? They were appointed to take care of their interests just as the western men are placed on certain committees to care for territories and lands. The Committee on Rules are three to the North—four including Mr. Speaker KERR, ex officio a member. There is nobody on that committee except northern men. The Committee on the Centennial Celebration are eight to three; Committee on the Texas Frontier Troubles, three to two. There is a majority from the North even on a committee about Texas affairs and its troublous border.

FREEDMEN AND THEIR ROBBERS.

Do you desire further rehearsal? The next is the Committee on the Freedman's Bank. Now I favor giving to the Freedman's Bank and its rascals a committee with a majority from the South. That is the fourth committee where the South have a prevailing majority; the members being two northern to five southern men. Why should it not be so? Who robbed the freedmen? Was it northern men? Was it New England men? They might have had their hand in it, [Laughter] but those robbed are the laboring people South whose representatives, white and black, are here. It was right that the affairs of the Freedman's Bank should be looked into by southern men. So the chairman is Mr. DOUGLAS, of Virginia; and there are associated with him Mr. BRADFORD of Alabama, Mr. RIDDLE of Tennessee, Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi, Mr. BLISS of New York, and Mr. RAINEY of South Carolina. The latter is a good, noble, kindly colored gentleman. How could this committee have been made better? and especially may I not say so in view of the fact that there was an entire unanimity in the committee upon the subject of their report and upon the necessity of punishing the despoilers of the simple freedmen?

Then there is the Committee on Real-Estate Pool and Jay Cooke Indebtedness; the members of that committee stand two North to three South. Mr. GLOVER, of Missouri, is chairman. Is it so terrible to have him as chairman? I believe he was connected with some similar committee in a previous Congress. This is the fourth among forty-odd committees where the South predominates. Besides Mr. GLOVER, there are, Mr. LEWIS of Alabama, Mr. PRATT of Iowa, Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania, and Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Now no one can object to the personnel of a committee of investigation like this; nor because they are composed of three southern and two northern members. So it seems, sir, that out of some forty committees four or five have a majority of members from the South! Is not this horribly sectional?

WHISKY AND ITS CROOKEDNESS.

Then there is the Committee on Whisky Trials in Saint Louis. Has my friend from Maine ever read the history of these whisky trials? What a trial it is to go through such crookedness! Have you read Bluford Wilson's testimony? Do you know where it strikes? It is worse than Jersey lightning when it strikes. [Laughter.] Would you have that committee made up entirely of northern men? Well, here you have it! Here are the names: Mr. KNOTT of Kentucky, Mr. PHELPS of Connecticut, Mr. GLOVER of Missouri, Mr. COCHRANE of Pennsylvania, Mr. MACMAHON of Ohio, Mr. MCCRARY of Iowa, and Mr. PLAISTED of Maine. On the minority of the committee is perhaps the best lawyer on your side of the House, Mr. MCCRARY. How can you complain of that as sectional? Your complaint, if any, ought to be in another direction.

Then we come to the Committee on Federal Offices in Louisiana. I think I helped to appoint that committee as Speaker pro tempore. It might be thought that on that committee there should be a majority of southern members. But no, the proportion of northern to southern members on that committee is six to three, and upon it is the distinguished, pertinacious, and irascible person from Michigan, Mr. CONGER. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the words of the gentleman be taken down. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I will ask that the gentleman himself may be taken down. [Laughter.] I said nothing but what was honorable to him.

Mr. CONGER. I think it would take the whole force of the democratic party to do it.

Mr. COX. The democratic party will not exert itself in that direction very much. [Laughter.] Then there is the committee on charges against Judge Wylie which I appointed. It has five northern members and two southern members. Last, there is the committee on charges against the Clerk of the House, with four northern members and one southern member. So that of all these several committees, except four or five, the majority of their members have been chosen from the North.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. With the greatest delight.

Mr. HALE. In making up this majority the gentleman of course includes the republican members, who are almost entirely from the North.

Mr. COX. Did not the gentleman know that when I was going over the committees?

Mr. HALE. How is it with the gentleman's political friends? Do not the members from the South constitute the majority of the democratic members on most of the committees?

Mr. COX. I think perhaps the majority of the members on the democratic side of the House are from the South, and perhaps happily for the country, in its sectional emergency.

Mr. HALE. Happily for the country?

A MEMBER. The democratic majority has the greater number from the North.

Mr. COX. That may be so. But is it anything against a man that he comes from the South, if he is a good and honest committee-man and investigator?

Mr. HALE. My point was that the high places in this House were given to these gentlemen from the South.

IS THE SOUTH IN THE UNION?

Mr. COX. I have an idea that the South is inside of the Union now. I have an idea that they intend to stay. I have an idea that they should be treated fairly. If there is to be any criticism at all made upon this list of committees, it is that our Speaker has leaned rather against the South in making up the body of the committees, and in favor of the North. Yes, it is so; do not shake your head; there is nothing in it, unless I make a mistake. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] made an elaborate and, as I have already said, a "hefty" speech on this subject, and there is no other way to answer it except by giving these simple facts.

NOW LET US CARRY THE WAR INTO AFRICA.

The Cincinnati platform says:

The national administration merits commendation for its honorable work in the management of our domestic and foreign affairs, and President Grant deserves the continued and hearty gratitude of the American people for his patriotism and immense services in war and in peace.

If that is the case, why did the distinguished ex-colleague of my friend from Maine, Mr. Blaine, speak in the way he did about such a good man as General Grant and his associates as rogues? Why did your party at Cincinnati unload him? Why are you all the time unloading? You unloaded a candidate for governor in Indiana the other day. What for? What had he done? Does no one answer? Why did you unload Ex-Secretary Bristow?

Mr. HALE. I suppose the republican party in Indiana followed the precedent of the democratic party, which had unloaded their judicial ticket.

Mr. ROBINSON. We unloaded one, and you unloaded four. Your men stole $67,000, and your party admitted it, and unloaded them. We unloaded one, and are now 10,000 votes ahead.

Mr. COX. You see we never defend our rascals; you defend yours when they are prosecuted.

Mr. ROBINSON. You do not know how to defend them.

Mr. COX. Do not interrupt me again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has the floor.

Mr. COX. Certainly I have. I do not want to get up any feeling on the part of the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Maine. The speech of the latter was not worth answering. It was too small, too microscopic in its fault-finding with this House. Yet I felt bound to do so in defense of our Speaker, who is ill and absent. I would not do so if he were here, and in health to defend himself on the floor from this attack. I feel bound to justify him in this House for the unsectional course he pursued in making up the committees of the House and in the general justice of his life and character.

Mr. HALE. I made no personal reflection on the Speaker. I only claimed that he was impelled by his party.

Mr. COX. Well, now, sit down and you will feel better after that remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman feel any better for drawing it out?

Mr. COX. Now, you know you would not allow any interruption yourself; but I allowed you to come in whenever you pleased, because it does not hurt any one. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, and in answer to the remarkable speech which we have heard, and which may be called an incarnate ineptitude, [laughter,] I say that this House cannot be reproached this session with any culpability. It is not amenable to attack for anything except the indiscretion and impropriety of some two or three of its appointees. These we promptly removed.

PUBLIC PRINTER DEFENDED.

Do you not remember that upon a resolution introduced by myself the Committee on Printing made an inquiry into the conduct of the Government Printing Office? That committee convicted your Congressional Printer; and he was discharged. Who re-appointed him? President Grant, whom you indorse in your platform. Do you indorse Mr. Clapp's administration as Printer? You were very prompt to get up a while ago. Do you indorse the appointment of Mr. Clapp as Printer to the House and Senate?

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman want an answer? He seems to invite one.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. According to the information I have received from members of the minority who took part in that investigation, I understand that it was conducted entirely in an unfair, partisan manner, and that there was really nothing in the facts which warranted the removal of Mr. Clapp.

Mr. COX. Did not the Senate and the House, by a legislative act, agree that he ought to go out?

Mr. HALE. The House did.

Mr. COX. And the Senate concurred by its conferees. You cannot deny it.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Senate acceded to the position taken by the House upon that report of the committee that conducted the printing investigation?

Mr. COX. I did not say that. I say that on the sundry civil bill both Houses agreed that Mr. Clapp should go out.

Mr. HALE. The Senate agreed that this office should be filled by presidential appointment; and I believe it should. I voted for that principle in the committee of conference, as I would again; and the President has re-appointed the same man.

Mr. COX. You approve of that appointment, do you? Do you indorse the appointment of Mr. Clapp?

Mr. HALE. Certainly I do.

Mr. COX. You do?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Well, that is the last feather on the camel's back. You are not the man to have made the speech you did. I might read upon you the report of the Committee on Printing and convince you that you indorse that which is very, very wrong. You ought to know better, if you have read the reports.

Mr. HALE. What does the minority report hold?

Mr. COX. O, well, we have had all that thoroughly discussed. The Senate and the House acted on it. The President has re-appointed your man; and now you indorse the Executive in putting this printing business again in his charge after the exposures made in this House.

Mr. BALLOU. The gentleman from New York has asked why Mr. Clapp was re-appointed.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield further.

Mr. BALLOU. I say that there is not a particle of evidence from the beginning of that examination to the end to show that the Public Printer was not an honest, faithful officer.

Mr. COX. How often must I try to speak without being interrupted? I have not interrupted any gentleman on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I would like to say one word, if the gentleman from New York will allow me.

Mr. COX. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. If the evidence of Mr. Clapp, the Congressional Printer, and that of one man from New York, Mr. Garner, be taken side by side they will be found to substantiate the very material charge made in the report of the majority of the Committee on Printing. To establish the majority of those charges nothing more is necessary than the testimony of Mr. Clapp himself, and that of the man in New York, from whom he made his purchases. I need not refer to the recent editorial comments of the New York Times and other leading newspapers of the country, East as well as West, and the Chronicle, of this city.

Mr. BALLOU. I wish to say there is no foundation for the statement just made by the gentleman from Ohio; there is no evidence to sustain it.

Mr. COX. I have been in this House sixteen years and have never had a chance to close a debate until this session. I have never had a chance to speak without interruption, though I scarcely ever interrupt anybody.

DISMISSAL OF COMMISSIONER PRATT AND HIS SUCCESSOR.

What I want next to say is this: Mr. Pratt was dismissed as Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was he not? At least indirectly? Am I right?

A MEMBER. He resigned.

A MEMBER. Do not interrupt him.

Mr. COX. Why don't you come forward, if you want to? [Laughter.] Who was put in his place? A General Boum. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. No, Raum, of Illinois.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Raum, of Illinois, was put in his place. What is he known for? For sending a dispatch about the whisky trials. That is all I can recollect about him, except that he was in one of our Congresses, which was not very creditable. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has been here sixteen years and ought to remember his colleagues.

Mr. COX. Can I not have my chance on the floor without interruption?

Mr. CONGER. He has been with the gentleman on this floor and he ought to remember him.

Mr. COX. I was not in that Congress and do not know anything about him. All I know of him is the fact that he did congratulate the men who were engaged in crooked matters in Saint Louis. Do you approve of putting him in and turning such a man as Judge Pratt out? Do you suppose the people of Indiana who know Judge Pratt approve of that? Everybody in Indiana who knows Judge Pratt, respects him as an honest man. I have known him myself to act in relations of private trust. He is known as the honest man. Almost singular in that State, and in that respect, is he thus known. But you could not stand him in that very remarkable Department. [Laughter.] Why?

GENERAL RAUM AND THE CROOKED DISPATCH.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if he knows anything in the world in the character or reputation of Mr. Raum that is not that of a high-minded, honorable, and honest man?

Mr. COX. I have said that all I know of him in the world is a printed dispatch in relation to these whisky trials which he sent as a congratulation.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The gentleman must remember that he was a gallant officer in the Union Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York ought to remember that he served in Congress with us.

Mr. COX. He may have been a good member of Congress, though I think I never served with him. But I have known good members of Congress turn out afterward to be very bad men. [Laughter.] I do not say he was not a good member of Congress, but I do say that all I know about him is the congratulations to the crooked people at Saint Louis. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. He was in the Union Army.

Mr. COX. He may have been a good soldier. I do not say anything against the soldier. What I say is that Judge Pratt was somehow turned out and another gentleman put in his place, and all I know of the man put in his place is that he sent this congratulatory telegraphic dispatch. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me in that connection and for this reason——

Mr. COX. To vindicate anything personal, I will.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all; but General Raum is from my State.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; I know that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I merely wish to say this: He is well known in my State, and there is not a man in Illinois who has a better reputation as an honest man and an able man than General Raum.

Mr. COX. But is it not so of Judge Pratt, of Indiana?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand so.

Mr. COX. Then why is one put out and the other put in? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not speaking of that matter. I am only speaking as a citizen of Illinois and as a Representative of Illinois, and defending General Raum against the imputation the gentleman makes against his character.

Mr. COX. I did not make any imputation, sir; I know nothing of him, except so far as that dispatch is concerned.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I have nothing to say.

Mr. COX. Of course you have nothing to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have only defended him.

AN UNUSUAL ARRANGEMENT FOR INTERPELLATIONS.

Mr. COX. Don't you shake your finger at me that way. [Laughter.] I will get scared if you do. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has the floor and will proceed without interruption.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will agree to put his hands in his pockets, he can go on. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. COX. My friend must speak, if at all, by following my request and condition, and putting his hands in his pocket. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have both my hands in my pockets now. [Laughter.] And I only want to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. COX. I will yield for one remark only.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to say this: I did not seek to interrupt the gentleman to make any point or to attempt to make any point, if I were capable of doing so. I do not often interrupt gentlemen on the floor of this House; but when the gentleman makes a remark by innuendo——

THE ARRANGEMENT BROKEN.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has his hand out of his pocket and is shaking his finger at me again. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has the floor and must not be interrupted. The Chair will not permit it any longer.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, if the gentleman thinks that is very courteous or smart——

Mr. COX. I claim the floor after that remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman ought not to cut me off that way, although he has the right to do it.

Mr. COX. When you abuse my courtesy I want you to be quietly seated while I proceed with my remarks.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Very well, if you decline to yield further——

Mr. COX. I have yielded to you more than I ever did to any man for the same amount of frivolous idea.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Thank you.

WHY GOVERNOR JEWELL WENT OUT.

Mr. COX. Now, again, I want to know why Governor Jewell of Connecticut was compelled to resign. What was that for? Because he said the country would not stand these strange removals and this curious conduct; nothing else. And yet the gentleman from Illinois and others defend the administration of General Grant. Not one of them dare to go back upon the resolution of indorsement of General Grant at Cincinnati. Not one of the whole of that side of the House has yet been heard to take back one word of that platform eulogy touching General Grant——

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, rose.

Mr. COX. And his services in peace as well as in war. A gentleman over there shakes his head. He does not believe in the Administration?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I do. I do not take back one word.

THE ADMINISTRATION INDORSED.

Mr. COX. Then you come within my category. Not a man on that side has failed to defend the Administration. Not one. That was my remark. You all stand by it. And thereby you stand by the removal of Pratt; you stand by the removal of the collector at Philadelphia who bore the same relation as Bristow and Wilson, and the appointment of another in his place who bore a different relation. You stand by the accepted resignation and acquittal of Belknap. You stand by the enforced resignation of Bristow. You stand by the removal of Jewell. You stand by the removal of Bluford Wilson; of Yaryan, [laughter;] of all that class of men who were trying to punish the guilty and uphold the laws. Is there any one to challenge this remark? You have favored to-day the retention of General Babcock in office, as well as in your platform, by the indorsement of the Administration. You have to-day on the floor showed yourselves in favor of the retention of the Public Printer, Mr. Clapp, who has been recommended for indictment. All through this beautiful civil-service business, from one end of it to the other, you have manfully stood up for the Cincinnati platform indorsing the Administration. I honor you for it. Why should you not? General Grant is your representative man. Babcock and Belknap are your representative men. Bristow is not your representative man, or he would not have been discarded here and at Cincinnati.

When you say it has cost a million dollars for investigation this session you thereby give that amount of credit to the democratic party and to this side of the House for undertaking with all the energy of Hercules to clean out the Augean stables.

Now, sir, why is it when we are closing up the session you filibuster, as on yesterday, again and again, to prevent a full and prompt report of these investigations? Why is it that, failing to stop these reports, you try to make up to-day for your gross delinquencies as public servants by trivial excuses and small assaults on the constitution and conduct of this body? Why does the gentleman from Maine make that sort of a speech which Mirabeau once designated when he described hasty will-making—"Ab irato, ab imbecilli, a tergo, a deliramte."

Mr. HOLMAN. Give us the translation.

Mr. COX. A speech angry, imbecile, fearful, and crazy. With that classic remark I conclude.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker——

Many members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being demanded, the question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. WIGGINTON: The petition of the several clerks of the committees of the House of Representatives, for an equalization of the pay of committee clerks, to the Committee of Accounts.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 9, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Alexander Moffit, Theodore F. Wilson, James M. Thompson, and 22 other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the appointment of a joint committee of three, one from the Senate and two from the House, to continue and finish the investigation of the charges made against the management of the Government Hospital for the Insane, the same having been partially considered and some proofs taken; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WILLIAM H. FRENCH, JR.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3856) for the relief of William H. French, jr., United States Army, late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota, have had the same under consideration and instruct me to report it without amendment. There are several papers from the Department upon the subject. The bill is not one appropriating any money, but simply is to settle the accounts of this man. His accounts have been waiting at the Treasury for a long time to be settled, and it would be very agreeable to me to have the Senate take up the bill and pass it now. It is a matter taking no money out of the Treasury, but simply settles an account.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It is an authority to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to adjust and settle the property accounts of William H. French, jr., late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota Territory; and if it shall be made clearly to appear that John A. Morrow, who was a contractor for furnishing supplies of beef-cattle to the Indian agencies, has delivered to Henry F. Livingston, agent at Crow Creek, beef-cattle in lieu of 422,100 pounds, which he delivered to William H. French, agent, on 9th November, 1870, at Crow Creek, and for which Morrow afterward got receipts from Livingston, and collected from the Government on both, then the accounting officer shall be authorized to give French credit in his settlement accordingly.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there a report in this case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. The facts are these: French, the agent, was about going out of his department. The man Morrow delivered four hundred and twenty-one cattle, and French gave him a memorandum of the fact merely. Morrow collected from the Department the value of the cattle on that memorandum. Livingston came in immediately after French, and the cattle were delivered to Livingston. Livingston gave Morrow another receipt. Morrow collected on both receipts. Afterward Morrow agreed with the Department to deliver a second lot of 421,000 pounds of beef-cattle on the foot. The Department accepted the offer; the cattle were delivered and, as the papers show, received by Livingston and reported to the Bureau. The second lot was delivered as the first lot, but French in the mean time had been charged on his memorandum and is still charged in the Treasury Department. All his other accounts have been settled, as the second lot had been delivered in fulfillment of the receipts, and the account completed. This bill simply authorizes the Treasury Department to give French credit for the charge against him on the first receipt or memorandum.

Mr. SARGENT. It involves no expenditure, I understand?

Mr. OGLESBY. Not a dollar.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That John H. Russell have leave to withdraw the papers in the matter of his claim against the United States for the destruction of the steamboat J. H. Russell while, as alleged, in the military service of the United States.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate proceed now under the Anthony rule to consider the unobjected cases on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be resumed at the point where its consideration was last suspended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first business on the Calendar is the resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire what legislation is necessary to regulate the immigration into the United States of persons from foreign countries and to prevent the introduction of pauperism and immorality into the ports of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is not in his seat, I suggest that that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

MOSES MARSHALL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 795) to enable Moses Marshall to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for improvement in knitting-machines; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It gives leave to Moses Marshall, of Lowell, Massachusetts, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent granted to him for an improvement in knitting-machines, dated the 15th day of March, 1853, for the term of seven years from and after the date of the extension by the Commissioner of Patents; the application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the original term of the patent; and upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents is to consider and determine the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law and as if the original term of the patent had not expired; but no person is to be held liable for the infringement of the lettters-patent, if extended, for making use of the invention since the expiration of the original term of the letters-patent and prior to the date of the extension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question upon the passage of the bill, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask that the vote be taken again. This is a very meritorious case, one that was agreed upon unanimously by the committee. It has been reported by two committees of the Senate unanimously.

The bill was passed.

SHELDON S. HARTSHORN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 796) for the relief of the heirs of Sheldon S. Hartshorn; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to hear and determine the petition or application of the heirs of Sheldon S. Hartshorn for an extension of letters-patent for an improvement in buckles, No. 13218, for the term of seven years from and after the 10th of July, 1876, when the letters-patent expired; and upon due notice to the public, according to the practice of the Patent Office in cases of extension, the Commissioner shall have full power and authority to hear and determine the same; and after such hearing, if the Commissioner shall decide that the petition or application ought to be granted, he is authorized and empowered to extend the letters-patent for seven years from and after the 10th of July, 1876, to the heirs of Shelton S. Hartshorn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. WITHERS. I should like to hear the circumstances of this case. Here are two or three bills extending patents, which I am on principle opposed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is a meritorious case.

Mr. CONKLING. Do the whole committee say that it is a meritorious case?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Yes; the committee were unanimous in the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist upon the report being read?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes; or a statement by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The report is very short; let it be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Patents, May 2:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Sheldon S. Hartshorn for extension of patent, report:

The petitioners, six in number, are the children of Hartshorn, the inventor. The invention was for an improved buckle, which has been valuable to the public, as it has reduced the price from $1.25 to thirty cents per gross, besides furnishing a much superior article. Very little was realized by the inventor during the first term of the patent, owing to his want of means to promote the business. He died, leaving very little property, and the children received only $500 each for their interest in this and two other patents. All that the inventor and his children have ever received for the whole term of this patent will not exceed $3,500. In view of the benefits received by the public by having a much superior article for one-fourth the former cost, the committee are of opinion that a fair remuneration has not been received for the invention, and recommend the passage of a bill authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to hear said case, and to decide upon the same according to the practice of the Patent Office in cases of extension, due notice having been given to the public, as in other cases of extension.

Mr. BOGY. I will not consume the time of the Senate in saying anything in opposition to the extension of this patent; I will satisfy myself by calling for the yeas and nays. I am opposed to the extension of patents as a general proposition. There may now and then be a case where it is a matter of absolute right; but as a general proposition, I am entirely opposed to the extension of patents. The reasons given in this report are the stereotyped reasons given in every case, that for the want of means or from some other cause the inventor has not been sufficiently remunerated. I do know the facts to be, and we feel it in my section of the country perhaps more than any other section, where we are annoyed with an endless multiplicity of patents for everything. The farmer can use no implement of husbandry but what it is patented. We can have no machinery introduced upon any of our steamboats, from the boiler to the upper-deck, but what is patented. There is an annoyance in that way, and it is attended also with enormous expense and cost. I do know that the farming interest of my section of the country is borne down by patents applicable to agricultural implements.

For these reasons, stated briefly, I am opposed to the extension of this patent, as I am opposed to the extension of patents as a general proposition, saying at the same time that there may now and then be a case where an extension is a matter of justice. I will not consume any time. I shall be satisfied with calling for the yeas and nays and having my vote recorded in opposition to this extension.

Mr. CONKLING. I sympathize with everything my friend says; so do the Senate, and I think the Committee on Patents governs itself accordingly for it reports only exceptional cases. I rose, however, to ask the Senator not to call at this moment for the yeas and nays. He will understand why I make that suggestion. We want to get along with the Calendar if we can; and in the interest of the Calendar, I ask him not to insist on the yeas and nays, for if it turns out that the Senate finds itself without a quorum we defeat the morning hour for this purpose. I am told this is a matter about a suspender-buckle which a very credible man explained to me who told me the facts in regard to it. Taking the facts as stated, I hardly think the Senator would consider this a case which should not fall within the exception to the rule.

Mr. BOGY. I am not disposed to resist the application made by the Senator from New York. I have explained my view and the view I believe of every Senator from my section of the country. I therefore will not insist upon the yeas and nays for the reason suggested by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will state that the views expressed by the Senator from Missouri are the views of every member of the committee; but they found that this was a case which was an exception.

Mr. WITHERS. So far as I understand the reading of the report, the only exceptional ground on which this application is based is that sufficient remuneration has not been paid to the patentee. It seems to me that the patent having been once extended and ample facilities and every opportunity given to the patentee to realize a profit from it, if it is used as extensively as is indicated, the patentee must have realized a considerable profit from it, unless he assigned his interest in the patent away. I know that that is a very ordinary way of procedure in such cases. The patentee parts with his patent, some company gets it and makes a large amount of money out of it, and then about the time the patent expires and it becomes necessary that it should be extended again, an arrangement is made with the original patentee to come forward and state that he has only received a small sum of money, not sufficient to remunerate him for the time and labor expended in getting up the patent. He is the ostensible applicant, and if the patent is extended the same company that has previously enjoyed the monopoly of the business takes it again and makes money out of it. I am opposed myself to this kind of thing. I believe that legislation ought not to be as liberal as it has been in that direction, and therefore I cannot regard this as an exceptional case to what I regard as a good rule.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Committee on Patents as now constituted certainly would not recommend the passage of a bill in any such case as the Senator from Virginia supposes. This is not such a case.

Mr. WITHERS. I am perfectly aware that the Committee on Patents would not knowingly do it, but it seems to me it is almost impossible to know whether such an arrangement exists or not.

Mr. WADLEIGH. There has been no case before the committee where they have not specially investigated that very thing, and applications have been refused again and again on the ground that the public had paid enough. In this case there has been no amount of any consequence realized from this invention, which is a valuable one to American manufacturers, and which has enabled our manufacturers to outsell those of foreign countries in their own market. There is no reason why in this case there should not be this encouragement and this compensation given to these poor children.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask whether the patentee has sold or parted with his patent?

Mr. WADLEIGH. He has not. The committee certainly would not have recommended the passage of this bill in that case.

Mr. WITHERS. If it is used so extensively it seems to me he ought to have realized considerable profit.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is only recently that it has come into such use. There has been no case reported by this committee where there were not special circumstances which justified the passage of the bill. I will agree to every word the Senator from Virginia has said and that the Senator from Missouri has said. With every word of theirs the committee fully agree, and they have acted upon those principles.

Mr. COCKRELL. I voted against the bill which has just passed to enable Moses Marshall to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for an improvement in knitting-machines, and I shall certainly vote against this, and I vote against this not in consequence of any wrong-doing on the part of the committee; I vote against this extension and against this bill on the report of the committee just as the report has been made and read here to the Senate. Taking every word they have said in the report, I think it makes no case whatever authorizing Congress to extend this patent-right. It is just precisely the case which every patentee can make and will make before the Committee on Patents.

The parties have received $3,500 for this patent-right for suspender-buckles, the distinguished Senator from New York said, I believe; and the committee say they do not think this enough pay for that patent-right for buckles. It has simply come to a question of remuneration. If a patentee in his first seventeen years now, or fourteen then, does not make a fortune out of his patent-right, Congress extends it. It just simply is a question whether he makes much money or makes little out of his patent right. I think there is no occasion in the world for passing this bill and granting the relief prayed for here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

LANDS IN KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calender was the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon.

Mr. CONKLING. That will lead to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not a short case; of course it involves long debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

PROOFS IN HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2041) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator having that bill in charge has no objection to its going over.

Mr. KELLY. No; this is a House bill that I desire to have passed.

Mr. CONKLING. Will it not lead to debate?

Mr. KELLY. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I reserve the right to object if it shall lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think that bill cannot be understood in all its bearings without debate. I must therefore object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KELLY. I submit that it is too late to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York reserved the right to object.

Mr. KELLY. But not for the Senator from Massachusetts; only for himself. I will say that this is a very important bill. It was prepared because the Legislature of Iowa instructed its Senators and Representatives to urge it. It is a very important bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist on his objection. This is a bill simply authorizing homestead settlers to go before the judge of the proper court and make their proof and transmit it to the registers and receivers, instead of traveling, as they are obliged to do, two or three or four hundred miles to make this proof before the receiver. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. So I understand; but I think the Senate cannot pass upon the bill without some debate. I do not know that I shall be opposed to the bill; and yet I fear that I shall be.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the Senator would be opposed to it if he understood it.

Mr. HARVEY. The bill was carefully considered in the Committee on Public Lands and I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that nothing is in the bill but what the Senator from Iowa states. I am satisfied all the people of the States and Territories where there are public lands desire its passage.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will withdraw the objection and let the bill be considered.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 11, of section 1, after the word "State," to insert the words "or Territory;" in line 13, after the word "made" to strike out "at" and insert "before the register or receiver of;" so as to make the section read:

That the proof of residence, occupation, or cultivation, the affidavit of non-alienation, and the oath of allegiance required to be made by section 2291 of the Revised Statutes may be made before the judge, or, in his absence, before the clerk, of any court of record of the county and State, or district and Territory, in which the lands are situated; and if said lands are situated in any unorganized county, such proof may be made in a similar manner in any adjacent county in said State or Territory; and the proof, affidavit, and oath, when so made and duly subscribed, shall have the same force and effect as if made before the register or receiver of the proper land district; and the same shall be transmitted by such judge, or the clerk of his court, to the register and the receiver, with the fee and charges allowed by law to him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 3, after the word "register," to strike out the words "with his official seal attached;" so as to make the section read:

That said proof, affidavits, and oaths shall be properly filed in the land office by the register; and copies thereof certified to by the register shall be evidence of their contents in the courts of any State or of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY. I move a further amendment to be added to the first section:

And the register and receiver shall be entitled to the same fees for examining and approving said testimony as are now allowed by law for the same service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KELLY, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the proof required in homestead entries."

OTOE AND MISSOURIA INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the House amendments be concurred in by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The House amendments are in section 3, line 3, after the word "offer," to insert:

One hundred and twenty thousand acres from the western side of.

In section 4, line 3, after the words "per annum," to strike out the following words:

Except such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, may deem necessary to be immediately expended in removing said Indians to the Indian Territory, procuring a reservation for their use, and providing thereon homes and means of support.

And in lieu therefor to insert:

Which income shall be expended for the benefit of said tribes under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Add to the bill:

SEC. 7. That whenever the Sacs and Foxes of the Missouri tribe of Indians shall, in open council, in the usual manner, express their consent thereto, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and hereby is, authorized, in like manner and upon the same terms prescribed in the preceding sections of this act, to cause to be offered for sale a portion of their reservation lying in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, not exceeding in quantity ten sections of land, to be taken from the western portion thereof; and the proceeds arising therefrom shall be used for the benefit of said tribes, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire for what purpose is this bill taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the purpose of concurring in the amendments of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. We are proceeding under the order of the Senate with the Calendar.

Mr. PADDOCK. This is a conference report.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon, a conference report is not a matter of privilege in the Senate. I shall not object to it if it will take no time; but I do insist on the regular order being observed.

Mr. PADDOCK. This will take no time.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well. I reserve my right to object to it if it does take time.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to state the effect of this agreement.

Mr. PADDOCK. All the difference there is between the bill passed by the Senate and the bill as amended by the House is this: the Senate bill provided for the sale of the entire Otoe reservation, embracing about one hundred and sixty thousand acres. The Quakers who have charge of that reservation and the Indians upon it advised the House not to grant the right to sell the whole reservation, but to reserve 40,000 acres, upon which the improvements of the Indians are, in order that the Indians might remain there and not be removed. It was the wish of the Quakers and of the Indian Office that the bill should be passed in its present form, and so I think it best to accede to their wish.

Mr. ALLISON. I have only to say that we ought not to accede to their request. This Indian reservation ought to be sold and these Indians removed to the Indian Territory, as the Senate bill provides.

Mr. PADDOCK. If it was practicable to pass the bill in that form and to accomplish the result that my friend speaks of and that he desires, I should infinitely prefer that it should be done; but the whole question is left at any rate to the Indians to determine in open council whether they will accept the proposition at all, and the influence I speak of being always exercised to the end that I have spoken of, which is the end the House has in view, I think it would result in absolute failure. I hope my friend will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not insist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the bill.

The amendments were concurred in.

GEORGE E. PAYNE.

Mr. CONKLING. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 809) referring the claim of George E. Payne to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill. I have not asked the attention of the Senate to the consideration of any business out of the regular order. I have waited patiently to get the opportunity to bring this case before the Senate. It is now here, and no better time to consider it can be offered than the present moment. It is the result of a ten years' examination and solicitation on the part of this claimant to get his right before Congress and before the law, and I trust the Senator will not interpose a technical objection to its consideration.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have some knowledge of this claim, having had occasion to investigate it several years ago; but I will withdraw the objection and allow it to be considered, and if the Senate agree to pass it, very well.

The bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its terms the claim of George E. Payne, for the wrongful seizure and detention of his sugar plantation and other property by military orders of the United States in 1862, with his petition and all the papers relating thereto, are referred to the Court of Claims, and the court is authorized and empowered to adjudge and determine, after hearing all evidence, what amount of damages, if any, are legally due to the claimant by reason of the seizure and detention of his property, and to render judgment therefor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is there any report with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let it be read.

Mr. WEST. The reading of the report, the Senator is aware, will take half an hour.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very likely it may. It is a claim made by a man who was in Louisiana during the war who was involved in the rebellion, who claimed for mules and slaves that were taken by General BANKS'S army, I think, and for one I am perfectly well satisfied that he is not entitled to any remuneration under that claim and that it ought not to be referred to any tribunal. If I have made any mistake, it is in allowing it to be considered.

Mr. WEST. The Senator from Massachusetts is scarcely correct in saying that this is a claim for slaves, because the Senator knows and he should know that no such claim could receive under the Constitution any consideration by a committee of this body.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I say the claim was for slaves and mules.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not at all. I recollect very well the claim made by Mr. Payne was for slaves and mules taken away before the emancipation of the slaves. I am not in error about that. It was before the Committee on Claims years ago in that form.

Mr. WEST. If Mr. Payne ever made a claim for slaves, certainly that claim is not before the Senate now for consideration. Here is a claim passed upon by the Committee on Claims of this body, reported by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] and undoubtedly meeting the sanction and the unanimous sanction of that committee. The character of the claim is this: The claimant's plantation was taken possession of by the United States Government in the year 1862 and was run by the Government; the profits derived from it and all the property upon it sequestered for the use of the Government; and subsequently this claimant, in making his claim to the Treasury, was allowed a certain amount, but not the full amount that he claimed. Now he wishes to submit whatever he has a right to go to the Court of Claims, and this is simply a bill to allow him, as has been allowed in other cases over and over again in favor of loyal people, to take his case to the Court of Claims, and of course, if it is necessary, to the Supreme Court of the United States to be adjudicated on. Cannot this Congress trust its courts, cannot this Congress trust its Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States to do justice between a claimant and the United States? When this man has been debarred by your statutes from any other recourse, shut out from the Court of Claims by your own statutes, shut out from any recourse upon the officers making the aggression and the trespass on his property by your own statutes, and he appeals to your own courts for a justification of his rights, is he to be shut out on any technical pretext that at some time or other somebody else or perhaps himself made a claim for slaves?

This man has been before Congress, to my certain knowledge, for ten years. He is testified to by the highest and most unquestioned authority, both in respect to his integrity and to his loyalty. Three times this case has been before various Congresses. Three times has it been submitted and twice has it been partially and once completely acted upon by the Committee on Claims. Can you do any wrong in submitting to your own arbitration whether he has any right or not and whether the Government of the United States should pay him for the wrongs that have been done him? I think not. I think to reject this case now as it stands is to virtually acknowledge that you have no confidence in your courts even up to the supremest tribunal of the land.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this is not a claim for slaves. Certainly a claim of that kind would have received no consideration at the hands of the Committee on Claims. There is nothing in the papers from beginning to end, whether in the memorial or in any of the papers filed from the Department, and I have examined them all, that makes any kind of reference to slaves or a claim for slaves. Nothing of that kind. The claim received the careful consideration of the Committee on Claims and the report made, I may be permitted to say, received the unanimous approval of that committee. It is a very lengthy story and one that cannot be told in the morning hour.

The sum and substance of the whole thing, however, is that in 1862 Mr. Payne's plantation, lying in the State of Louisiana, was seized under military order and turned over to the officers of the Government, first to the agents of the Treasury Department, then to the Freedmen's Bureau, part of the time it was in the possession of the quartermaster's agents, and so on and so forth. His property was held and managed by these several agents of different Departments of the Government for several years, they receiving all the proceeds of the plantation, a part of which was put into the Treasury of the United States and part of that paid into the Treasury has been paid to Mr. Payne. Some six thousand and odd dollars, as shown from the records of the Treasury Department received by that Department as part of the proceeds of the plantation, has never yet been paid to Mr. Payne and is in the Treasury of the United States to-day. That is one question.

This bill, reported by the committee, proposed to submit the whole question to the Court of Claims in order that that court may investigate the matter and if they find under the law and under the facts that anything is due Mr. Payne, to award it to him.

As was stated by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] this certainly can work no injustice to the Government. We ought to be willing to trust our courts, and it does seem to me, if any case ought to be submitted to the consideration of that tribunal, this is one. Mr. Payne comes here with a very high character, indorsed by our present Secretary of State in the following language in a letter I find among the papers, written not recently:

NEW YORK, April 27, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: Permit me to introduce George E. Payne, esq., of Louisiana, a gentleman whom I have known for nearly twenty years and for whom I have ever entertained high respect. He is a gentleman of character and entitled to confidence.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. W. H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

Numerous other testimonies of equally high character are among papers, from the State of New York, from San Francisco, where Mr. Payne lived for a number of years, and also from the State of Louisiana. It appears from the testimony on file that Mr. Payne was a loyal man in the fullest sense of the term during the war; that when an order was issued directing that all bells, for instance plantation bells, should be sent to New Orleans to be run into rebel cannon-balls, Mr. Payne declined to conform to the order and suffered persecution in various ways from the confederate authorities. I will state also that this plantation was, as I claim after a full investigation of the whole case, not liable to seizure at all; and that is one question to be submitted to the court. He was temporarily absent from his plantation at the time of its seizure for the purpose of paying a debt of over $26,000 that he was then owing to a northern creditor, and that, too, in the direct face of the confederate act of congress prohibiting all that kind of business. It was to me one of the very highest evidences of the mind of this man upon the great questions then agitating the country. That he was a loyal man there can be no doubt. He did pay this debt amounting to very many thousand dollars, while the war was going on, and as I say in the face of the confederate act of congress prohibiting it.

Mr. HOWE. Has this claim been before the claims commission?

Mr. MITCHELL. It has not. It cannot go there. It is one they have no jurisdiction over.

Mr. HOWE. What is the fact in the case that bars it from that commission?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not a claim for quartermaster stores and does not come within any clause of their jurisdiction. As I said, it would be a very long story to go into the facts of this case, to argue them, or even to present them fully to the Senate. I have stated in brief the general character of the case; and as I hope a vote will be had before the morning hour is over, and that that vote will be in accordance with the recommendation of the committee to submit it to the Court of Claims, I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate further at this time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose this is a long story; indeed, I know it is——

Mr. MORRILL. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WEST. It cannot be objected to now; it is up.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This bill, to say nothing of the merits of the claim, is drawn in such a manner that I think the court will take for granted various things which ought to be proved, especially the question of loyalty under the circumstances which then existed. When this claim was presented years ago, I recollect very distinctly that Mr. Payne set forth that in 1862 his slaves and mules were driven away from his plantation by the Army of the United States, and although, perhaps, he did not make a claim for the slaves, he set up that as one fact in the history of the case. About that there is no mistake.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was probably true.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Now then the record shows a fact or two to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. At the time the order was issued, November 9, 1862, under which Mr. Payne's property was taken by the military authorities of the country, Major Joseph M. Bell was provost judge and president of the board to which by order of the commanding general all questions of loyalty were referred. I happened to know Mr. Joseph M. Bell. He is not now living. He was the son of the Hon. Joseph Bell, of New Hampshire, and he was of his age then already an eminent lawyer although a young man, and of the highest promise, I may say, of any practitioner at the Suffolk bar in the State of Massachusetts. He went into the Army and died in consequence of injuries that he received there. But his opinions and judgments are entitled to the highest consideration by the Senate. If the Senate will listen to the order, it will be seen that Mr. Payne had ample opportunity at the time these transactions occurred in the vicinity where he resided when he could command the testimony of witnesses and when the Government could command the testimony of witnesses to have the question of his loyalty fully investigated, and if it were so investigated and it turned out in the judgment of this court that he was loyal, by the terms of the order of sequestration his property would have been restored to him; and that it was not done is evidence of one of two things, either that he did not make application to this court or that making application his request was denied.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me, the papers show that he did make some two or three different applications.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That I know.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the record further shows that that board never reported at all on the question one way or the other.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Major Joseph M. Bell was provost judge and made president of this board. The order is:

[General Order No. 91.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, November 9, 1862.

The commanding general being informed, and believing, that the district west of the Mississippi River, lately taken possession of by the United States troops, is most largely occupied by persons disloyal to the United States, and whose property has become liable to confiscation under the acts of Congress and the proclamation of the President, and that sales and transfers of said property are being made for the purpose of depriving the Government of the same, has determined, in order to secure the rights of all persons as well as those of the Government, and for the purpose of enabling the crops now growing to be taken care of and secured, and the unemployed laborers to be set at work and provision made for the payment of their labor—

To order as follows:

1. * * *
2. * * *
3. * * *

4. Every loyal citizen or neutral foreigner who shall be found in actual possession and ownership of any property in said district, not having acquired the same by any title since the 18th day of September last—

And Mr. Payne had not acquired title to his property "since the 18th day of September last," as I very well recollect—may have his property returned or delivered to him without sale, upon establishing his condition to the judgment of the commission,

That one fact is to my mind conclusive proof that Mr. Payne himself was conscious at that time that he could not establish his loyalty and bring himself within the equitable and legal provisions of this order, or else that making the effort he failed, and if he failed in making that effort, he failed because the judgment of Judge Bell was against him; and I know of no lawyer within my acquaintance upon whose judgment I should rely with more confidence that he would be governed by principles of law and guided by rules of equity in a case of this sort.

Mr. MITCHELL. The honorable Senator will agree with me that the Treasury Department as a rule is very careful on the question of loyalty, and I would offset what the Senator has stated by this fact, that on the 6th day of July, 1865, the Treasury Department paid Mr. Payne $17,010.83, money received from his plantation, and kept back other moneys that were afterward received, some $6,000, not on a question of loyalty, but on an entirely different question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not going to indorse the Treasury Department about it; I am indorsing Mr. Bell; and I am asking the Senate to consider whether, on this simple statement of facts, there is not found reason for believing with a degree of certainty that amounts for our purposes to a conclusion, that Mr. Payne at the time these proceedings were going on did not establish his loyaly by witnesses who could have been taken from the vicinage where he lived; and whether we ought now, after thirteen years and after he had an opportunity to establish his loyalty in a proper tribunal and failed, to send him with this broad bill into the Court of Claims to recover whatever they may think he is legally entitled to without any regard to what he did in the State of Louisiana when these transactions occurred?

I have not had time to look at this report. I see that it is very favorable to Mr. Payne; but it is not in the main in accord with the impressions I received when I investigated the subject. I do not recollect whether there was a report made to the Senate at that time or not. There was a report prepared, but I do not know that it was ever passed upon by a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WEST. Let us vote. There will be no further debate. The Senator from Massachusetts, I think, will yield to take a vote on this bill.

Mr. HOWE. I want to know upon what ground it was that the Treasury paid this claimant a part of the moneys which had been received from his estate and declined to pay the balance?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state, as I stated before, that this plantation was in the hands of different Departments of the Government at different times. At one time, for instance, it was in the hands of the Quartermaster's Department, and they received certain moneys; at another time it was in the hands of the special agents of the Treasury Department; at another time in the hands of the Freedmen's Bureau. Seventeen thousand and odd dollars, if I remember, was the amount paid in by one Department at one time. The amount that has not been refunded was paid in by a different agent of the Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Was that the whole of his claim, $17,000?

Mr. BOUTWELL. O, no. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, the $17,000 was paid as the net result of crops when the plantation was worked by some of the Government agents years afterward. He could not get his plantation returned to him, and it was worked by Government agents and the proceeds paid into the Treasury, and that money was re-imbursed to him; but he claims $30,000 for example for the value of the growing crops in 1862 when the Army swept them off.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am now ready to answer the question of the Senator from Wisconsin more distinctly. The $17,010.83 item arises from the following statement of account which I will read from the report:

Another statement, of date July 17, 1864, gives as total sales of same amount of sugar and molasses, evidently the same, with this different result: gross sales, $36,929.46; gross expenses of sales, $3,108.97; net proceeds of products from the Payne plantation, ——. This last statement, however adds the enormous sum of $16,809.66 "as expenses of working the plantation," and showing a net profit to the Government of $17,010.83.

That amount was paid to Mr. Payne. That was money paid in through the special agents of the Treasury Department. There was another account with the Quartermaster's Department of the War Department:

It further appears that on settlement of accounts by the sequestration commission with the Quartermaster's Department the sum of $14,286.70 is reported by that commission as the amount of the gross sales of the crop taken by Woodward—

He was special agent—and the net amount placed to the credit of claimant's plantation March 31, 1863, was $6,688.13, and which was received by the Quartermaster's Department and by it used in its operations for and on account of the Government, and no part of which the claimant has ever received.

Now, I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin, because it comes back to my recollection——

Mr. HOWE. That was not received into the Treasury at all?

Mr. MITCHELL. That was not paid into the Treasury, but is in possession of the War Department, and the reason that amount was not paid was because the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army in an opinion delivered by him decided that inasmuch as this plantation was sequestered or seized by virtue of a military order of the general commanding the department, therefore, and for no other reason if I recollect aright, the Government was entitled to the use of the plantation and to all the money that might arise from that use, and upon that ground the Secretary of War declined to make any restitution. I understand that opinion of the Judge-Advocate-General to be in direct conflict with several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator has answered the question that I asked. I thought it very peculiar that the Treasury should have paid a part of the money in its vaults and refused to pay another part.

Mr. MITCHELL. It did not pay what another Department held.

Mr. HOWE. What another Department of the Government had had and used. I remember this case. It was before the committee for a good many years when I was a member of the committee. I never examined it very thoroughly.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator desires me to do so.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to suggest, with the permission of my friend, that while I am not prepared to say whether I shall vote against or for this bill I hardly think we are proceeding under the agreement made by the Senate that we would only take up those bills to which there was no objection. This bill seems to be one to which there is objection.

Mr. HOWE. I was not a party to the agreement nor a party to taking it up, and I do not want to be a party to the violation of it. I was only going to state, as the claimant seems to be here——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will allow the Chair to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the ruling of the Chair, that if there is no objection at the time a bill is called up, when the Chair puts the question whether there is an objection or not, an objection cannot lie after that time. But if the Senate desire, for the purpose of economizing time, that an objection shall lie at each stage during the whole progress of the case, the Chair will so rule, and will now submit it to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. We are operating under another rule, and I do not want a different rule applied to this case. The rule has been interpreted by the Chair that unless objection is raised when a bill is taken up for consideration no objection can be made at a subsequent stage of the consideration of the bill. I ask that that rule be applied to this case.

Mr. SARGENT. I know that was the ruling of the Chair yesterday, but it was the pioneer ruling in that direction. Senators will remember that ever since we have adopted the Anthony rule it has been held that an objection would prevent the further consideration of a bill in exactly the same way that where a Senator is proceeding by unanimous consent an objection made by a single Senator stops him. Although the Senate unanimously allow a Senator to go on he is arrested by a single objection, and we have applied the very principle of that to the interpretation of the Anthony rule, and for a great many reasons. It is an exceptional rule. The new ruling entirely abolishes the effect of the rule. In the absence of the Anthony rule, when we went to the Calendar, bills were taken up, and considered, and debated at length, if necessary. Under the Anthony rule it was held that those bills were to be considered which did not lead to debate; in other words, those bills which were not objectionable. Debate is objection, the objection is stated by debating the question and making delay. In other words, it was held that such bills should be taken up as should not lead to delay. I believe I am taking up the time of my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator is taking up the time of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I am taking it up for a useful purpose, if I am not incommoding my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all.

Mr. SARGENT. I have less solicitude with reference to the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from California and to the Senate that he is advised by the Secretary that an objection, in order to lie, must be raised at the time the bill is presented, and when objection is called for and no objection is made it will not lie after the matter has once been admitted, just as the Chair has ruled.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; we shall have to invent another Anthony rule; for my recollection is, and I speak with some confidence on this point, that up to yesterday it has always been held that an objection would lie at any stage of a bill considered under the Anthony rule. I myself have frequently objected after the debate commenced. If the Senate is satisfied to have the Anthony rule whittled away and to have no provision against long debates which are sprung in this way upon the Senate, that is to say, without the Senate knowing that such a debate is going to occur, without the power of the Senate to stop it, then I of course can stand it as well as any Senator. A bill comparatively harmless is read, containing ten lines perhaps. Nobody supposes that it will lead to debate; nobody has any particular hostility to it; and no one objects; but it is found in two or three minutes that a debate is springing up on that unimportant bill that will probably run the whole day. Has the Senate no power to arrest it? The Anthony rule was intended to arrest such a debate.

Mr. WEST. Does the Senator take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SARGENT. I am discussing it as other Senators have done. I do not know that it would be worth while to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair if the minds of Senators are all made up. I think it might be well to hold to the rule as we have heretofore done. Now, in order to terminate an almost hopeless debate, if I do not incommode my friend from Wisconsin, I desire to call for the regular order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will suggest to the Senator from California that it seems to me the rule as he states it amounts to the passage of a bill only by unanimous consent, for if any one is opposed to a bill he can defeat its passage by an objection.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; and that is the Anthony rule; it applies to bills to which there is no objection. What is meant by a bill to which there is no objection? That there shall be no objection at any stage to the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No objection to taking it up.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; no objection to the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I think I will contribute one fact which will have some influence on the judgment of my friend from California on this point, and that is that when the Chair propounded to the Senate the question whether there was any objection to proceeding to the consideration of this bill, it was announced by a friend here on my right that it would lead to debate, and he at first objected, but as he was quite as ready for the debate at this time as he cared to be, he withdrew his objection, and there was no other Senator to interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. SARGENT. Let me make a suggestion to my friend. It very frequently happens that a debate is conversational among Senators, a little knot of four or five among themselves which the other Senators cannot hear, but the moment we observe that it is leading to a debate we desire to object; and it was in order to facilitate business in such cases that the operation of the Anthony rule is effective.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WEST. There can be no objection to that, but I should like to have the ruling of the Chair now upon this point. Under our rule of procedure this case will come up to-morrow as unfinished business, and will the objection of any Senator carry it over again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There cannot be unfinished business within the morning hour. This bill has been considered during the morning hour.

Mr. WEST. Will the question then be on proceeding to the consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will have to be taken up.

Mr. WEST. And will an objection carry it over?

Mr. CONKLING. That question can be settled when it arises.

Mr. GORDON. Is there any objection to reading the Anthony rule? I should like to have it read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

JOHN R. HARRINGTON.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask every Senator who is on the floor—and I see there are several, and some Senators who are waiting for the floor—to give me, after I make a request, unanimous consent to do a thing. I have objected to no bill; I have moved for a long time to take up no bill. There is a little bill on the Calendar which has passed this body several times, and which has passed the House several times, the party interested in which is a man entirely blind. He has been here at other sessions with somebody to lead him. He is here at this session with a friend to lead him about and to inquire betimes of me why it is that his bill, to which nobody objects, cannot at some time be taken up. It stands here on the Calendar, page 23, order of business No. 586, an act for the relief of John R. Harrington, reported by Mr. WADLEIGH from the Committee on Patents, without amendment. It concerns a matter about carpets, and after I repeat, each House heretofore has acted upon it, I think nobody will object to it. If the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM]—I am sure I shall not appeal to him in vain—who is about to take the floor, will allow the bill to be read, if nobody objects to it, I will ask to put it on its passage. If anybody wants to debate it or it takes a moment, I will hide my diminished head and sit down with that confusion which will then belong to me.

Mr. HOWE. What is it?

Mr. CONKLING. It is a little bill. My friend has been attending to other business here. It is on page 23 of the Calendar, order of business No. 586, House bill No. 3392, for the relief of John R. Harrington, reported August 1, 1876, by Mr. WADLEIGH from the Committee on Patents without amendment, Report No. 508. Does the Senator want any other information?

Mr. HOWE. In addition to that, I have learned one other particular, and that is that Mr. Harrington is blind and is led about.

Mr. CONKLING. That does not appear on the record.

Mr. HOWE. But it appears by the very succinct and touching statement of the Senator from New York. Will the Senator be just good enough to tell us what Mr. Harrington wants us to do?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Harrington wants the honorable Senator from Wisconsin to make no objection, and when the proper time comes to vote "ay" on a little bill which is to allow him to go to the Patent Office and have a little matter straightened touching an invention he thinks he has about the manufacture of carpets, or words to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us have the bill read.

Mr. HOWE. With that clear statement of the case, if the Senator from New York will be good enough to let me have twenty-four hours to think of it, I will tell Mr. Harrington whether I will object or not.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will hear the bill read he may want thirty-six hours, and therefore I ask to have it read for information. Twenty-four hours may not be enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. HOWE. Subject to objection.

Mr. CONKLING. Of course.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3392) for the relief of John R. Harrington. It gives him leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent granted April 1, 1856, as re-issued December 11, 1866, for improvements in carpet-lining, for the term of seven years; and upon the application so filed, the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to consider and determine it in the same manner and upon giving the same notice as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law; but such application to the Commissioner of Patents is to be made within ninety days; and no person shall be held liable for the infringement of the patent, if extended, for making use of this invention since the expiration of the original term of the patent, and prior to the date of extension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITION.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of William O. Newman, of Metcalfe County, Kentucky, praying payment of certain claims against the Government for supplies and stores furnished the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate, on which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PATTERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] but when he is through I will take the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina yields to the Senator from Minnesota for a specific purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

WM. WINDOM,
W. B. ALLISON,
T. F. BAYARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. R. MORRISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I will make a very brief explanation of the position of this bill. On the 7th day of July last, the third or fourth committee of conference was appointed. Since that time the committee have been in session, night and day, almost constantly, and have earnestly endeavored to reach a conclusion which should bring the two Houses together. They have failed to do so. It is proper for me to say, however, that I am satisfied the committee can substantially agree on all of the provisions of the bill except that relating to the compensation of Senators and Members of Congress and of the President of the United States. In reaching such agreement the committee on the part of the Senate will be compelled to yield on some points much further than their judgment approves. Believing, however, that on appropriations which are discretionary it is the duty of each House to yield as far as possible in order to meet the views of the other, the committee of the Senate feel that they can reach an agreement.

With reference to the two points about which at present there is the greatest difficulty, namely, that of the compensation of Senators and Members of Congress and of the President, I desire to say that the committee, if they shall be re-appointed, desire to be instructed by the Senate. I think the same is true of the committee on the part of the House of Representatives. Or, if not formally instructed, they wish the question put in such form as shall test the sense of the Senate upon the points in controversy.

We have exhausted all the ingenuity we could command in our endeavors to compromise. With reference to the salaries of members of Congress and Senators we have proposed to strike from the bill all provisions relating to compensation, in order that by eliminating from it all questions of an individual character appropriations indispensable to the maintenance of the public service might not be further delayed.

With reference to the President's salary we have offered to agree to an appropriation to the 4th of March, and to leave the question open for future action. I wish to state, because I do not desire to avoid responsibility on this point, precisely what my own position is on both of these questions. I wish to say also, on behalf of the Senate committee, that we have not brought this question here because we desire to shirk any responsibility. I think I can say for both my colleagues on this conference that they are ready here and now to express their views with reference to it, and I believe that mine fully coincides with theirs.

I am opposed to a reduction of the salaries of Members and Senators because I believe they are not too high. I am opposed to yielding to the demand of the House upon that question for another reason. The law has fixed those salaries. The demand made upon us during a long and weary month has been that we shall abdicate our constitutional rights and duties as a co-ordinate branch of the national Legislature. The condition thus far has been constantly and persistently presented to us that we must agree to changes in existing laws which we do not approve as the consideration for securing the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government.

Therefore, even if my judgment were not thoroughly convinced that the salaries are fair and reasonable, I would not under coercion yield what I believe to be the constitutional rights of the Senate as a co-ordinate branch of this Government. But I do not put it wholly upon that ground. I do not wish to evade any responsibility by even stating that point; I stand squarely upon the ground that should I vote to reduce congressional salaries it would be an act of sheer demagogism of which I will not be guilty. Believing that the salary is not one dollar too high to-day, I am ready to go home and answer to my constituents for my vote. I would quite as leave carry a five-hundred-dollar bill around the State and promise to donate it to the people in consideration of a re-election as to reduce salaries $500 when they and I know there is no other motive for doing it than to purchase a little cheap popularity. The one thing which an honest people hate above all others is an attempt to deceive. The things they most approve are honesty and courage.

There is another reason which influences me somewhat in this matter. The salaries of Members and Senators have already been reduced. In 1874 they were reduced from $7,500 to $5,000, and it was expressly stated in that act that the salaries of members of Congress should be fixed at $5,000. I am not willing to disturb that settlement. The people passed upon that question. They disapproved of the act raising the salaries to $7,500, more, I think, on account of the manner in which it was done than on account of the increased compensation. I never yet have heard from any part of the country one word of complaint of the final adjustment at $5,000. For one, I regard that as final, and do not wish to disturb it. Whether there be others who would like to cut off $500 now, and when the election shall have passed come back here and insist upon a re-adjustment by raising it to $7,500 again, I do not know. It is, however, a somewhat remarkable fact that those who are now apparently most anxious to re-open the question, which everybody considers settled, were among the most active promoters of the scheme to raise salaries three years ago. Believing the salary as now fixed to be about right, I will not re-open the question, for I do not wish to see repeated the performance of three years ago.

But again, we have actually reduced our salaries below $5,000. I think it is safe to say that salaries which prior to the increase were $5,000 are not now more than $4,500. At that time we had the franking privilege. The act increasing the salaries repealed it; but the act repealing the increase did not re-instate the franking privilege. It is not too much to say that taking into account postage on correspondence and public documents the increased expense of our postage will not fall short of $500.

The question with reference to the salary of the President of the United States is somewhat different from that of members of Congress. It was not reduced when all the others were. I do not believe it is higher than the President of the United States should receive. But I will not argue that question. I have heretofore put myself upon the record against the reduction of the President's salary, and see no reason for changing that vote. Both Houses having passed a bill to reduce the salary of the President and having sent it to him as required by the Constitution for his approval, and he having vetoed it as he had a perfect right to do, it does not seem to be a proper thing to attempt to coerce him by inserting it in an appropriation bill, and thereby compel him to approve the reduction or veto a measure indispensable to the maintenance of the public service. It is simply an effort to do by a majority vote that which the Constitution says shall require two-thirds. It is an attempt to deprive a co-ordinate branch of the Government to do that which he has informed us does not meet the approval of his judgment. If the measure ought to pass at all it ought to pass by the means provided in the Constitution. If it cannot be passed by the constitutional method it should not pass at all. The veto message has been sent to Congress and no action yet taken. If we have the power to pass it by a two-thirds vote, let it be taken up and acted upon, but while insisting upon our own constitutional rights let us not invade the rights of the President. I think he was right in vetoing the bill reducing the salary of his successors, and he would certainly be justified in vetoing an appropriation bill if it contain this objectionable feature.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist upon its disagreeing votes and ask another committee of conference. I will not now go into the details of the bill nor attempt to state the changes which have been made in the committee of conference. It will be time enough to do that when the final agreement shall be reached. I will only say that if the Senate shall further insist upon its amendments and the present committee shall be re-appointed they will regard it as an expression of the sense of the Senate that we insist upon our disagreeing votes upon the two points which I have named.

Mr. WEST. The Senator had better include that in his motion.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, to include that in my motion, for I think that would make a trammeled conference; but we will regard it as an expression of the sense of the Senate upon that subject. Unless some Senator desires further information as to the details of what we have done I will not take the time of the Senate further.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, a month ago I was assigned by the Senate to a place upon this conference committee, and I can well confirm the statement of the honorable Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, that that month has been a period of constant, unremitting, patient labor upon the part of the members of this conference in order to bring the matters in issue between them to just results.

I was not unmindful, and perhaps it would be well for me to remind the Senate, that this is the first session in fifteen years in which the conference committees of the two Houses have met with their respective majorities differing as to their party affiliation. It is a fact that should be noted, because we all know the practical influence which such a state of things exerts. The country recognizes it, and every practical man will also recognize it. I fully did, and I think I could appeal, if it were necessary, to my colleagues on this committee to bear witness to the fact that I have sought to elevate the consideration of all the questions involved to the high plane of the good of the country, without reference to mere personal or party results. Such has been my intention; such, I believe, has been my course of action, and I contribute my judgment to the Senate in favor of the proposition made by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] after these four weeks of long, careful, and laborious investigation. I must, however, differ with him in this respect: that I do not understand and have not understood the attitude of the House of Representatives to be that of unconditional insistence of the Senate's yielding to their views at the cost of totally withholding appropriations. Sir, the very agreements that we have made, the mutual concessions which fill this report, will show that the Senator is in error in supposing that the House of Representatives has attempted to stand upon any such ground, which in my opinion would be untenable. It has been, however, the proposition to bring forward, according to our invariable custom of legislation in the last sixteen years, measures in the appropriation bills which ought to be treated according to their respective merits, and so we have endeavored to treat them, and in that spirit have made accommodations and concessions mutually, until, upon this great bill to provide money for the expenses of the Government, there stand but two points upon which the conferees have been unwilling to sign one and the same report of agreement. Those two points are the proposed reduction of the compensation of the President of the United States and the proposed reduction of the compensation of Senators and of Members of Congress. Let us dispose of each in its order.

It was perfectly competent and regular that a bill should be introduced to reduce the compensation of the President of the United States after the expiration of the term of the present incumbent, the Constitution forbidding the reduction of his pay during his term after it had been once fixed by law. That bill came before this body. On that I voted and voted in the negative, believing that the pay was not in excess and that it should not be reduced. For that I have given my reasons three years ago. I did not care to repeat them at the time the bill was last before the Senate. They will stand upon the record to be judged according to their proper weight and merit.

But, sir, the bill passed the Senate; it also passed the House; it went to the President. He vetoed it. There can be no question of two things: that it was his constitutional right and duty to consider the measure according to his conscience; and there can be no doubt, if I may be pardoned for making reference to the fact, that he did so with entire disinterestedness, as the proposed reduction applied not to him but to a successor not yet chosen. That bill stands to-day in the Senate with the power of this body, should the proposition command the approval of two-thirds, to pass it, and, with a like concurrent majority of the House, to make it law despite the interposition of the executive veto. The two Houses can make that a law under the terms of the Constitution despite the withholding of the President's assent. That assent has been withheld under his constitutional power, and I never will consent to invade that right and duty of the executive branch any more than I should permit him to invade a right and duty of the legislative branch.

I hold, Senators, that we have no right by combining this measure, which we have ourselves elected to treat as a separate measure, which stands before the country upon our votes given according to our individual responsibility—we have no right to relegate that to association with other measures and compel the President to inconvenience the country possibly, or to seem to inconvenience it, by withholding his assent from an appropriation bill, and so by a species of moral duress to lessen his constitutional prerogatives. I never will do it. I never would do it. I have in other days criticised with denunciation parties that sought to enforce upon another President of the United State his consent and wring from him his assent to measures he disapproved by combining them in appropriation bills with the supply of moneys necessary for the support of the Government, measures to which he would have refused his assent if they had been presented separately and made a vote of two-thirds requisite for their passage. I will not do that by a President of your choice which I would not have you do by a President of my choice, and were I the President of the United States I would veto this appropriation bill if it came to me under the same terms in which the House has proposed to send it to him, having previously vetoed a separate measure to the same effect and not having changed my views as to the impolicy of the proposition.

I stand here upon a principle. I believe in the mutual independence of the branches of this Government. I believe our Government is to be maintained only by preserving that independence, and where an officer of the Government, charged with a constitutional duty, has exercised it in his own sense of responsibility before the people, I never will irregularly extort or by any indirection coerce from him a consent that it was his right under the Constitution on his oath and conscience to withhold.

Therefore it is I trust that, whatever may be the opinions of gentlemen of this body—and I know a majority have differed with me and have thought this compensation should be reduced when I thought it should not be, and, if the President assents, I should yield with the utmost composure and readiness—they will consider that there is a principle in this quite independent of their views as to the expediency of paying $25,000 or $50,000 salary to the President of the United States.

Now I pass to the question of the pay of Senators and Members of Congress. It is a simple question of money in one point of view, but it is not so in another. I hold that ours is a representative Government of the people. It is intended that that representation should not be abridged or denied by the poverty or the riches of the man who may ask or may be desired as a representative. It is not a simple question of mere compensation by weighing the faculties and services of each individual on one side as you may on a mere ministerial officer, and weighing in the other his capacity to perform them. It cannot be treated upon so narrow a basis. Consider, Senators, what would be the result of abolishing pay entirely for members of Congress. Should it come to that, there would be a short-sighted and absurd economy that experience would brush away in one short session. You would leave the choice of Representatives open to the people to be filled by but one of two classes, either the merely rich, who came here without regard to the expense, or those who came here penniless to grow rich upon legislation. One of the two classes would exist. Either would, in my opinion, be hurtful to the interest of this country.

Legislation could not safely be committed to the hands of a Congress, both Houses of which were composed solely of rich men and capitalists, nor, on the other hand, would the country feel safe in the hands of two bodies composed of needy men whose daily wants, being unsupplied, would subject them every day to sore temptation. Nor would a combination of these two classes lessen the public dangers arising from a loss of personal independence on the part of legislators.

What, then, is the reasonable ground upon which we should stand? That such a sum shall be given by way of compensation, not sufficient to induce a man to come here to obtain the money, but not small enough to prevent him from coming here should his talents and the disposition of his people render it desirable that he should enter the public service. Sir, it will be a sad day for this country when men fit and competent to legislate upon the great questions presented for our consideration shall not be able to come here because prevented by their poverty. It is the duty of the people to say that poverty shall not prevent the man of intellect and character from coming here to do his country service, and the question is broadly what amount shall be provided by general law which shall enable a man to leave his home and come here to devote his abilities to the public service? Upon that point there is some difficulty. Nay, sir, there is another element that touches us all. We are speaking upon a subject that at present affects ourselves pecuniarily. There is a sentiment of delicacy appealing to every man who has this question to decide, for he is passing in some degree upon his own interests, but nevertheless it is our duty. We must meet it manfully and frankly, and treat it in a high spirit worthy of the positions we occupy.

On this subject I can give my judgment, and I was sent here to give my judgment; I was sent here not to yield to fears of ignorant and evanescent popular displeasure against my reason and my sense of right and justice. I was sent here to do that which is best in my judgment for the interests of the country; and I here do say to the people of the United States that it is doubtful whether the compensation to-day allowed to members of Congress does not exclude men of capacity and ability who find that pecuniary reward for industry elsewhere in private pursuits which they cannot find by the most assiduous attention to the labors of Congress. I know that as our life here in Washington compels us all to maintain two establishments, the one at home and the one here—for our stay here is uncertain—we cannot fix this question from month to month or day to day, but are compelled in great degree to have two homes while we are serving in Congress. A stranger is always at a disadvantage as compared with the man who lives at home; and here in Washington are mere sojourners and strangers swept in or out by the tides of political opinion. The expenses of our living, therefore, are of a necessity increased. There are also thrown upon us, as representative men, visits, most agreeable and welcome, from our constituents and from strangers who come here on visits of business or pleasure to the seat of Government of the Union, and, therefore, there is a wider field of necessary hospitality, however plain and simple, which must be exercised by representative men in Washington, which in the seclusion of their own homes could be avoided. Therefore the expense of living is increased. I will frankly say that, without other aid than that which I obtain from the pay I draw as a member of Congress, I must either have resigned my place or have given up the associations of my family; either of which would have been to me a painful trial, and it is not necessary for me to say which I would have chosen. But in this connection let me remark in all earnestness that I hold it to be of the highest use to the people of this country that home life and home influences should surround the men who make their laws; and this is a truth that had as well be told to-day as at any other time, and which I commend to the consideration of all legislative reformers and economists. If this salary shall exclude, as I know it does often exclude, men with families to rear and educate, men who are called upon to live upon a certain scale, not of lavish indulgence, but a certain scale of liberality, who shall not be called upon to question whether they can possibly screw from their narrow salaries the money to ask their constituents to break bread with them freely in their houses, there must be something wider and broader than this or else the office will undoubtedly sink, not simply in the estimation of the people but sink in the estimation of those who hold it, and be shunned by those men who by the highest public interest should be invited to accept and hold it.

I do not believe that a man with a family of the average size, a wife and three or four children, can come to Washington to reside and remain here during the long session of Congress and live with that degree of comfort and respectability which any constituency would desire and demand of their representatives upon one dollar less than the pay now fixed by law. On the contrary, I believe there are but few Members of Congress, few Senators, who are not compelled largely to draw from their private means to meet the expenses of maintaining themselves here. This is a very restrained and moderate statement of the history of living in Washington as verified by my own experience and that of a large circle of congressional acquaintance.

It has been truly stated by the honorable Senator from Minnesota that this rate of compensation was fixed in 1866. At that time there was what was termed the "franking privilege," a privilege that I always considered to be much more that of the constituent than of the Senator and Representative who wrote his name upon the mail matter because it permitted letters to come to him freely as well as go from him freely, and as the mass of his correspondence would be of an official character, of course, the gain was to those who were represented, and not to the person who represented them. Yet, nevertheless, by the abolition of the franking privilege the cost of postage is now paid out of the private moneys of the Member or the Senator. In addition to that there are many public documents for which I, in common with every member of the two Houses, have frequent applications, and which, when we are asked to send, cost us not an immoderate rate of postage, but an amount which, in the aggregate, is quite a serious sum. I think the Senator from Minnesota was very moderate when he estimated the loss in money by the abolition of the franking privilege—that is to say, the increased cost—I will not say the loss in money, but the increased cost to the individual Senator or Representative of the abolition of the franking privilege, at at least $500 per annum. That is including the postage which he is now called upon to pay upon public documents, as well as the postage which he pays on letter correspondence. That has been diminished since 1873. I believe it was in 1873 this abolition of the franking system was made. So that, virtually, we stand to-day in 1876 with a salary although equal to what it was in 1866, yet a privilege of franking which then existed having been taken away, the office leaves at least $500 less for the use of the occupant than it did before. I mention that because it is a fact that will show the unreasonableness of a reduction in these offices greater than that which is attempted on other positions. More than that the chief advance in the salaries of executive officers has taken place since 1870. I think I am right in that, and the greatest advance took place under what was known as the Kellogg bill in 1875. So that since the fixing of the salaries of members of Congress you have had two alterations and advances in the general scale of executive salaries which has not touched congressional pay at all.

Even on the mere money basis, therefore, treating the office of Senator or Representative as a merely ministerial office to be measured by days or hours of work and the power of writing so many pages of manuscript mechanically, the reduction already has been greater than on any other and unaccompanied by any of the advances which have been made upon all or nearly all the offices within the Executive Departments during the past six years. Therefore, sir, I feel perfectly justified, nay more than justified, I feel compelled in exercising my judgment, to say that there is not the reason for the reduction of the pay of this class of officials which has been applied, or may reasonably be applied, to the executive officials, simply upon the mere criterion of money value for ministerial work, that there has been a reduction in the first class, and not only no reduction but actual advancement in the second class. But I prefer not to leave this question upon so narrow a basis. The question is a broad one. It affects deeply, in my judgment, the practicability of our form of government. We may take illustrations from other governments and cannot fail to recognize how important the question would be there. For instance, in the Parliament of Great Britain, either the Commons or Lords, there is no pay whatever. What is the result? That no poor man, that no workingman, no man of the unmoneyed class can afford to take a seat in the British Parliament. What is the result? That property controls the representation there. Let them reduce as they please their basis of suffrage from ten pounds to five pounds, from five pounds to mere lodgers, and still they have at the end that, vote as they may, they must vote for a man of independent pecuniary means, because their government supplies no means from its treasury to sustain any other class. Why, sir, is it too much to say that if you were to establish the system of compensation for members of the British House of Commons you would revolutionize the government of that country in one short year.

Therefore, taking a broader and a higher view of this question applied to our own land where the case is different, where we have no privileged classes, where property qua property has no voice, and by the structure of the Federal Government was intended to have no voice; it was intended to be the government of equal rights, it was intended to be the government in which the vote should be given freely; not only that a man should be capable of voting, but that he should be competent to be voted for. How do you make him competent to be voted for? By giving him the means to live in office when you select him for it, because it were an idle thing to say "I choose you for the place; I send you to be minister at Great Britain and give you a dollar and a half a day to live on."

This would be turning our theory and form of government to a mockery.

I have stated, Mr. President, my mind freely on the subject. The people of this country are entitled to the judgment of their representative men. If those sincere judgments be withheld from them, where shall they look for truth? How can they judge for themselves of things when we withhold our fair, clear judgments from them? We have opportunities which they have not; we have responsibilities which they have not, and it has been an endeavor to fill that responsibility to-day that has caused me to say as much as I have on this subject of congressional pay.

I trust, therefore, that these long labors, which I think I may justly call patriotic labors, on the part of this committee to endeavor to bring the minds of these two Houses into harmony that provision may be made for the supply of money adequate for the actual wants of our Government; whatever the differences of opinion as to expediency, there must be a concession upon both sides. This must be so; and perhaps there is no wisdom so great as that which teaches men moderation. The agreement so far reached by the two Houses on this appropriation bill indicates that they have not been unmindful of this truth. Therefore I hope that the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota may be approved by the Senate and that the opportunity will be given by the expression of the Senate's opinion upon these two points, having heard what your committee of conference think upon these two points, and that the House may be informed of the judgment of the Senate thus given, I trust calmly, and I know sincerely.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to know one or two things about this disagreement which have not been stated in my hearing. Shall we understand that the two committees have virtually agreed upon reductions to be made in the clerical force?

Mr. WINDOM. In answer to the Senator from New York, I will say that they have virtually agreed upon that reduction.

Mr. CONKLING. A reduction in the clerical force of the Departments of how many?

Mr. WINDOM. Not in the clerical force alone, but in all the employés of the Departments, seven hundred and sixty-five.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator has not the clerical force separated?

Mr. WINDOM. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Seven hundred and sixty-five. Has the Senator a table showing the quota of each Department in that reduction?

Mr. WINDOM. I have in the committee-room and can present it in a few moments.

Mr. CONKLING. Where does the reduction chiefly fall?

Mr. WINDOM. Chiefly upon the Treasury.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the reduction there?

Mr. WINDOM. The total reduction is estimated at four hundred and ninety-one; but in making that estimate seventy-five are added for the $60,000 that has hitherto been appropriated to be used for cases of emergency or exigency. Four hundred and nineteen would be the actual reduction estimated without taking into account the $60,000.

Mr. CONKLING. Sixty thousand dollars has heretofore been reposed on the Secretary as a fund that he might use to employ temporary clerks. It is proposed to continue that $60,000 now just as it was before.

Mr. WINDOM. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. And continuing that, saying nothing about that, what is to be the reduction in the Treasury Department?

Mr. WINDOM. Four hundred and nineteen employés, I believe.

Mr. CONKLING. Four hundred and nineteen, giving the $60,000 besides.

Mr. WINDOM. No; four hundred and ninety-one would be the estimate if the $60,000 were not allowed; but the conference committee propose to allow the $60,000; so that the real reduction is four hundred and nineteen.

Mr. CONKLING. The $60,000 was allowed before, and is for temporary or occasional service—that continues; but how many persons it employés is always beforehand uncertain; that depends upon contingencies. I ask for the actual reduction. The $60,000 is not disturbed. Now, apart from that, saying nothing about that, what is the reduction?

Mr. WINDOM. Four hundred and nineteen, I think. The paper will be here in a moment, and I will give it to the Senator, showing it exactly. That is very near it.

Mr. CONKLING. I inferred from another statement that the actual reduction was four hundred and ninety-one, and that the $60,000 was allowed to continue as it had been heretofore for whatever it might supply.

Mr. WINDOM. Four hundred and nineteen, leaving out of account the $60,000 altogether. I have the table now.

Mr. CONKLING. The managers on the part of the Senate having virtually agreed to this reduction, shall I understand that they mean to advise the Senate that the Treasury Department can get along, can manage, with this reduction of four hundred and nineteen or four hundred and ninety-one, depending upon which way you state it in reference to the $60,000 for temporary service?

Mr. WINDOM. The managers on the part of the Senate believe that the Treasury can get along or they would not have agreed to it; but they believe, as stated by Mr. Morrill, that it will be very embarrassing if not disastrous.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the question for two or three reasons, one of which is this: It is clear to me that if the Treasury Department can get on—get on in any business-like sense with a reduction of four hundred and ninety-one in its force, it could clearly get on very well with the reduction of only a part of that force. I know the Treasury Department is a great establishment; but I know also that four hundred and ninety-one persons, most of them skilled persons, withdrawn from even a large establishment, is a great subtraction from its force and equipment. Therefore, I repeat that if it be true that the Treasury Department can proceed even economically, even inconveniently, when four hundred and ninety-one persons of its skilled force have been withdrawn, it must be true that that Department could proceed very well and could have proceeded very well with a considerable part of that four hundred and nineteen or four hundred and ninety-one withdrawn.

Now, when we remember the ability with which we are assured the Treasury Department has been of late administered, when we remember the high reformatory aim of that administration, when we remember the assurance which all must have that the Treasury Department has recently been administered with skill, with an eye single to economy, with an earnest effort for retrenchment, with a persistent and able endeavor in that direction, it is very difficult to accept as fact the statement that four hundred and ninety-one persons can summarily be withdrawn from the working force that mans and operates that Department, and not utterly cripple it. I have no right to ask any Senator, for it would give some Senator trouble that I ought to take myself; but I should like to ask what the percentage of this reduction would be, and the percentage we should have if we saw the total of the force heretofore employed in the Department. My honorable friend from Minnesota, familiar with the subject perhaps can give it, but we must all see that it is a very large percentage. What is the total?

Mr. WINDOM. About twenty-five hundred.

Mr. CONKLING. The reduction there is about one-fifth of the entire force. I am told by the honorable Senator that twenty-five hundred is the total of the force as it has been. Here is a reduction of four hundred and ninety-one. For convenience I will add nine and make it a round five hundred, that is one-fifth exactly. It is proposed to withdraw from the Treasury Department one man in every five, and one woman in every five of those who have heretofore been employed to carry on its business in the city of Washington in one building. Consider such a thing in reference to a bank or a great commercial house in Chicago or New York; consider it in reference to the retail establishment of the late Mr. A. T. Stewart, an immense bazar employing I know not how many, but a large number of salesmen, clerks, and others.

Mr. MORRILL. About one thousand.

Mr. CONKLING. About one thousand, my honorable friend says, in the up-town establishment at Tenth street. Suppose we were told that after Mr. Stewart disappeared from his business, it turned out on investigation by six gentlemen, whether Senators or others, that one man and one woman in every five in that establishment, two hundred in all, could be withdrawn, withdrawn with impunity—I do not stop to inquire with what exact convenience—and still the establishment proceed, still execute its functions, still sustain itself, still perform its daily routine of transactions and details with any degree of success which any three members of this body would pronounce fit to be accepted by those concerned, would it not be an extraordinary statement? Would it not compel every listener either to disbelieve it, or to conclude that the establishment had previously been conducted with a surplus force, with prodigal and unnecessary equipment, with, if not literally one-fifth of all its expenses unnecessary, at least virtually and substantially one-fifth?

Mr. President, such a statement is evidence to my mind of one of two things. It is evidence that a reduction of four hundred and ninety-one will not only cripple the operations of the Treasury Department but so essentially, so perniciously, so inadvisedly, cripple the operations of the Treasury Department, that managers on the part of the Senate ought to agree to it; or else if the statement be believed it proves that the Treasury Department as it stands now, the Treasury Department as it stood last winter, the Treasury Department as it stood any time within the last year has been not only by law permitted to employ and pay for needless service, but that in fact there have been put into the Treasury Department and kept in the Treasury Department, and are now in the Treasury Department in this city several hundred employés whose services are not and have not been necessary and whose appointment and continuance cannot be justified. I do not assert how this is; I pronounce no opinion upon it; but I say that it cannot be true that we can properly and excusably vote such a reduction, if it be true that the force thus to be reduced has been properly or justifiably maintained. It is proposed, as I understand,—and if I am wrong I will thank one of the members of the committee to correct me,—to make the whole reduction presently.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see the chairman, and in his absence I will say that it is proposed to reduce one-third of it on the 10th of September, one-third of it on the 10th of October, and the remaining one-third on the 10th of November.

Mr. CONKLING. When I said "presently" I might have been more accurate. It is intended to take three months to do it. It is to be done in one-quarter of the fiscal year. I do not mean that they are all to be sent out on the same day, but I mean that it is a thing which is to occur as an entirety and the last of the dismissed are to go within the next three months. This may not be a time or a place to interpose in behalf of those who are thus to suffer. We all know the suffering which will be inflicted on those thus suddenly turned out; but if their services are unnecessary, the Congress of the United States is not a benevolent institution; Senators are not almoners to provide for the wants of others.

There is connected with it, however, another consideration more immediately in point. If this reduction be indeed feasible, and if during the last year, as place after place became vacant, (and in a large establishment like this vacancies always occur,) those vacancies had not been filled, had the force been allowed by degrees and by natural process to drop down to the proposed point, it would not only have saved us the contemplation of so grievous and afflictive a measure but would have reconciled somewhat the improbabilities and inconsistencies before us. But the statement shows us not only that by law all these places existed which are now to be treated as supernumerary places, places which can be vacated without serious detriment to the public service, but that in fact they were kept full. That I understand to be the meaning of it, and the Senator from Iowa nods his head, to indicate that I am right. So that now a given force having been maintained up to the 9th day of August, or the 8th, whenever this statement was made, the information given us is that we may properly so legislate that four hundred and ninety-one persons shall all be dismissed within the next three months. I will inquire of the Senator from Iowa, who seems to be intelligent on this subject, is there anything he knows which has reduced the work to be done, the business to be transacted in the Treasury Department, and made it less now than it was three months or six months or nine months ago?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know of any material change in the work of the Treasury Department within the last nine months.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator knows of no material change in that respect?

Mr. ALLISON. I know of no material change.

Mr. CONKLING. The statement then proceeds on the idea that, either necessarily or unnecessarily, this working force has been maintained up to this time, that the same necessity exists for it now which existed any time within a year, and that we are to turn around and say that four hundred and ninety-one of these people are supernumeraries, and lag "superfluous * * * on the stage."

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from New York and other Senators must be aware that within less than a year the printing of fractional currency has entirely ceased; and as that currency was counted in three different Bureaus in the Treasury Department there can be a large reduction in that way. It is well known that the counting of fractional currency took place in the Secretary's office, in the Treasurer's office, and in the Register's office; and if that currency is not to be counted at all, and it is not now or hereafter, there can be a large reduction. So when the old currency comes in it is then counted three times over. Of course some little of that old currency is still coming in, but comparatively very little; so that there can a large reduction take place.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very glad the Senator from New Hampshire calls attention to this, for perhaps it will aid us to see how much we know and in how many respects we are mistaken. The counting out of fractional currency ceased about six months ago.

Mr. CRAGIN. Five months.

Mr. CONKLING. As I always want to agree, I will take five months in place of six—the fact, be the time a month more or less, is equally instructive. The fractional currency is counted three times; it is counted out and it is counted in. The only reduction that has taken place so far, is in omitting to count out the fractional currency, and the counting out ceased it is said five months ago. If this fact makes a difference, the difference occurred five months ago, not now. If the Senator is right in his understanding, for the last five months there has been maintained unreduced a force which he says was rendered necessary in part by counting fractional currency and that counting ceased five months ago. What other counting of fractional currency is there? There is the counting in of fractional currency, and that goes on still, and that is to continue hereafter.

Mr. CRAGIN. On inquiry I find that the silver bill, so called, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue subsidiary coin, was passed in April. It was at that time the printing of fractional currency ceased.

Mr. CONKLING. That is four months ago. The Senator forgets that when fractional currency does not go out silver goes out.

Mr. CRAGIN. But it does not require a force of two or three hundred employés in the Treasury to count it.

Mr. CONKLING. No, it does not require a force of two hundred or three hundred to count it. It does require force enough, however, to keep the accounts and make the transactions; and my point is that the business of counting out fractional currency having ceased months ago, it does not seem to me a very good reason for reducing the force when and not until this bill shall take effect, nor does it explain why the force has been kept up during these months past.

Mr. CRAGIN. There has been a reduction already.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very glad to hear that the force has not all been kept—that there has been a reduction. The difficulty is that this statement is a present statement and it is based upon the present force, the force that is there to-day, and the statement is of what reduction is to take place on that present force. That is what we are talking about. I say if four hundred and ninety-one men can be withdrawn from that Department, and it still go safely on, it is perfectly manifest that the number there now, and the number that has been in the Treasury Department for weeks and months all the time is a number to be justified only by showing that there was some business or labor in the Treasury Department continuing, not up to six months or four months ago, but up to this day, which hereafter need not be done. When you show that, and not till you show that, you show every business man in his own business sense exactly how he could dispense with part of his force. If he had been building two railroads and one of them was completed, we see how he could dismiss the men that manned the finished job, and with the residue go on with the other. But if the falling off in the requirement of the Department was six months ago or four months ago and the force has been continued up to this day, I submit, according to any business principles or arithmetic, that a reduction now cannot be so explained.

Now I should like to ask another question of the honorable Senator from Minnesota. In this proposed reduction, as I understand, the subtreasury and its force and salaries is reduced. Am I right in that?

Mr. WINDOM. I think not.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator would look at the subtreasury in the city of New York; and I will say to him while he is looking that I am told that although the compensation for men conducting the subtreasury in the city of New York is cut down, the same officers in the city of Philadelphia and elsewhere have not been disturbed.

Mr. WINDOM. The reduction of seven hundred and sixty-five does not touch the New York office nor the subtreasury.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the Senator quite sure of that?

Mr. WINDOM. I am quite sure.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa because I have been very much misinformed, not by Senators but by others, if this is so as to salaries or compensation. I have understood for some days that this projet of reduction did cut down the subtreasurer's establishment in the city of New York in respect of salary. Take for example the coin teller.

Mr. ALLISON. It cuts down the salaries in a few instances, but not the number.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I inquire whether the salary of the coin teller in Philadelphia is cut down?

Mr. ALLISON. I will ascertain in a moment.

Mr. WINDOM. I know there were some slight reductions of the New York officers. They were higher than the Philadelphia officers.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes; put so by law and for reasons.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no proposed change in the Philadelphia office. There are proposed changes in the New York office, but none in Philadelphia or any of the other subtreasuries except New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I have this to say about it: The compensation of these men in the city of New York was fixed in reference to them and their duties, not in reference to other men and other duties. The salary of the coin-teller, for example, in New York was graduated and fixed by the facts in that case. Of course, among those facts were the enormous amounts of money, the almost fabulous sums which in the course of a year pass through that office, the responsibilities for which bonds are given, the various other elements entering into the modes of estimating salaries. The same thing was done in the case of Philadelphia and those salaries were fixed upon the same principles, and fixed as they ought to be. Now I understand that this projet of agreement cuts down the compensation of these officers in New York, passes over the same officers in Philadelphia whose salaries although at a different amount were for different service and fixed at a different sum because of the merits of the case, leaving them to stand untouched.

Perhaps I ought not to detain the Senate upon a matter of this sort; but it is a circumstance which fell under my observation and I call attention to it, and I think it might be well in dealing with this bill, particularly in standing by the idea that Senators ought to receive $5,000 a year nominally at least because it is right in fact, to consider whether these officers in the city of New York ought to receive one salary or another because it is right in fact, and not level it down in order that salaries somewhere else may stand untouched.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the Senate insist on its disagreeing vote and ask another committee of conference.

Mr. WINDOM. I am very reluctant to detain the Senate a moment longer, but the statements of the honorable Senator from New York I think require a brief answer.

The committee of conference on the part of the Senate in agreeing to this reduction of force do not by any means assent—at least a majority of them do not—to the inferences which the Senator from New York would draw. They do not believe that the sweeping reduction which has been agreed to is justified by the business of the Departments. I will state to the Senate why the number seven hundred and sixty-five was suggested. The House bill as it came to us reduced the employés of the various Departments one thousand and twelve. The Senate reduced them three hundred and eighteen on its own motion, upon the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The committee of conference, after very much labor on this question and many trials and tribulations, finally suggested as a compromise a division of the difference, provided, upon a reference of the question to the Departments, it could be ascertained that that number could by any possibility be dispensed with. That is as to all the Departments. I will send to the Secretary two letters which I ask to have read on that subject. But before they are read I will state that in submitting this proposition to the Secretary of the Treasury and requesting him to confer with other heads of the Executive Departments on the subject, the committee on the part of the Senate suggested it rather for the purpose of obtaining information than otherwise. The letter addressed by myself as chairman of the Senate managers will explain the proposition as submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and his answer will show the opinion of the heads of the Executive Departments as to the effect of this reduction.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, July 22, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am requested by the committees of conference on the legislative bill to ask that you will, in connection with the other heads of Departments, consider the proposition to reduce the number of employés in said Department seven hundred and sixty-five, and that you will suggest to said committees how said reduction can be made with least detriment to the service. It is desirable that the diminution of expense should be as nearly as possible in proportion to the reduction in number of employés. Please advise me at your earliest convenience whether this is practicable, and make such suggestions as you may deem important in the premises.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WM. WINDOM,
Chairman Senate Conferees.

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 28, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Your note of the 22d instant on behalf of the committees of conference on the legislative bill, in regard to the reduction of the number of employes in the Executive Departments of the Government seven hundred and sixty-five was duly received.

The proposition submitted for the consideration of the Executive Departments is understood to be that of a reduction of the civil list for those Departments by the number of seven hundred and sixty-five on the basis of the Senate bill, which was forty-nine hundred and ninety-one; but, as no account is taken of the temporary force usually provided for by an appropriation to be used at the discretion of the Secretary, equal to an additional force of seventy-five employés or clerks, the proposition really is for the reduction of eight hundred and forty instead of the number mentioned, unless the usual appropriation should be made for temporary clerks, which is not understood to be included in the proposition submitted.

If the heads of Departments are to regard the proposed reduction as the legislative ultimatum, it remains only to make such reduction with reference to the efficiency of the service, in which case the accompanying tables furnish the distribution of the civil force in these Departments believed to be most advantageous to the service therein.

That there should be no misapprehension as to the views of the heads of Departments in relation to the matter of reduction proposed, it is proper to say that it is believed such reduction will essentially cripple the public service to a greater or less extent in most of these Departments, and that a reduction so large as that necessitated in the Treasury Department, to wit, four hundred and ninety-one, would be little less than disastrous.

Very respectfully,

LOT M. MORRILL,
Secretary Treasury.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations United States Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. It will be seen that this very large reduction is not made with the assent and concurrence of the heads of Departments; but Mr. Secretary Morrill, for himself and representing them, as I understand, states that, regarding this number as the legislative ultimatum, they proceed to adjust the force upon that basis, and he concludes his letter by stating that the proposed "reduction will essentially cripple the public service to a greater or less extent in most of these Departments, and that a reduction so large as that necessitated in the Treasury Department, to wit, four hundred and ninety-one, would be little less than disastrous."

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask one question there?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator and do his associates rest their agreement to that reduction upon the idea that it will be little less than disastrous?

Mr. WINDOM. I believe that it will very seriously embarrass the Department. I do not know that I would be willing to use quite so strong terms as to say "disastrous," for in the manner in which it has been made there will be but a short time between the final dismissal of this force and the next session of Congress. And further, the $60,000 which we have allowed for temporary clerks in case of emergency will to some extent relieve or prevent the embarrassments that would otherwise be inevitable. I do believe, however, that in some Bureaus the reduction will cause serious delays, and greatly impair the efficiency of the service. The Adjutant-General's Office, the Surgeon-General's Office, the Pension Bureau, and some others will be crippled and embarrassed, and the public interests will suffer. I may be asked, "Then, why do you agree to it?" I will answer. This is one of the questions on which I understand the House has precisely the same right to its judgment as the Senate has. The House in the exercise of its discretion said that twelve hundred and twelve employés should be dismissed. The Senate in the exercise of its best judgment said three hundred and eighteen. If the House chose to insist that they would not appropriate for more than one-half the clerical force actually required, I know no power in the Senate to compel them to appropriate. They must act upon their own responsibility and we upon ours. Both are responsible to the people. So far as that class of questions is concerned we must accept what they are willing to appropriate. They must take the responsibility of crippling and embarrassing the civil service of the country. That being in our judgment the position of the question, the Senate managers thought that for the present it was judicious to accept the proposition to divide the difference by two, making the reduction one-half the difference between the two Houses.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of the Senator if the basis of the committee does not relieve this statement of the Secretary to the extent of $60,000?

Mr. WINDOM. It does. It makes the reduction four hundred and nineteen in the Treasury Department and seven hundred and sixty-five in all. The Secretary of the Treasury, it will be observed, says that if the $60,000 be not appropriated the reduction will be equal to eight hundred and forty. The reduction is to take place one-third on the 10th day of September, one-third on the 10th of October, and one-third on the 10th of November, so that if it shall be found that so large a reduction is likely to prove disastrous to the service Congress will be in session within two or three weeks after the final dismissal and can supply the deficiency. These were the arguments which induced the committee to agree to this proposition. We by no means agreed that this force has been as surperabundant as the remarks of the Senator from New York would indicate.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations when examining this bill before it was reported to the Senate took great care to ascertain how great a reduction could be safely made. Thorough investigations were made in all the Departments to ascertain how many could be reduced without detriment to the service. In the Treasury Department, for instance, Mr. Secretary Bristow caused an investigation to be made of every Bureau, and reported to the committee certain reductions upon which the Committee on Appropriations and the Senate acted. The Secretary of War made a similar investigation; and I happen to know that in that a commission, consisting of three of the most experienced men in the Department, was appointed, who spent twenty days in examining the War Department, going to every Bureau and desk in it, for the purpose of ascertaining the largest possible reduction that could safely be effected. Similar investigations extended throughout the other Departments, and upon reports made to them from those Departments the Senate Committee on Appropriations recommended a reduction of three hundred and eighteen, to which the Senate agreed. Applying to all the Departments the severest rules of judicious retrenchment, they were unable to make a larger reduction. I believe that all above that is an unsafe reduction, and to that extent is a crippling of the service; but I do not know any power we have, or that anybody else has, to compel either House to appropriate more money for such purpose than its own judgment or even its inclination may approve.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I intended to have withdrawn my motion in order to offer another. I ask leave to reconsider the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote just taken? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINDOM. If in order, I move that the bill be recommitted to the present committee of conference, and that the vote shall be understood to be a test vote upon the two questions I have mentioned, namely, the salary of the President and the compensation of members of Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations if the same end exactly is not accomplished by his original motion? It is the understanding of the Senate. There is no dissent on either side of the Chamber to the action of the Senate in still further insisting and appointing the same conferees. They certainly will be appointed again, and this action is a sanction of their course. It seems to me that it would be better to agree to the original motion than to raise a doubtful parliamentary question by recommitting the report to a committee which is dissolved.

Mr. WINDOM. It is not dissolved.

Mr. SARGENT. It is dissolved by this report. It seems to me the conferees may consider themselves as receiving the sanction of the Senate by the original motion.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that his present motion would require precisely such a vote in the House as he calls on the Senate to make. The House would be called upon to recommit the report to this same committee. Let the House act independently and the Senate independently.

Mr. SARGENT. I think we had better not recommit it.

Mr. DAWES. Not a Senator indicated a desire for a different course.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Minnesota; but as it happens to be inconsistent with the vote which I have frequently given upon a question involved, I desire to make an explanation of my vote. In reference to the salary of the President of the United States, I originally opposed the increase from $25,000 to $50,000, and I voted for the bill, which is now before the Senate with the veto message of the President, decreasing the salary of the next incumbent of the presidential office to $25,000. I shall vote for a separate independent proposition of that kind again to make a reduction of $25,000; but I do not believe that it is proper to put such a provision upon an appropriation bill. Therefore in voting for the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, I do not wish to be understood at all as favoring, as an abstract question, the increase which was made to the salary of the President. I vote for this proposition because, while we have a bill before us reducing the salary of the President, which it is in our power to take up and pass over his veto, I do not think it is proper to put a provision of that kind upon an appropriation bill. Whenever the proposition is made to take up the measure which has been vetoed, I will vote to pass it over the veto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota insist upon his motion?

Mr. WINDOM. There seems to be some objection to the second motion which I made, and with the consent of the Senate I will withdraw it and renew the first motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and the motion is withdrawn. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the Senate insist upon its disagreement and ask for a further committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BAYARD were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the resolution of the Senate to print extra copies of the report of the special committee to investigate the late election in Mississippi, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. HENRY B. BANNING, of Ohio, and Mr. STEPHEN A. HURLBUT, of Illinois, members of the commission on the part of the House on the subject of the reform and re-organization of the Army.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3964) granting a pension to Annie Gibson Yates; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) authorizing the Secretary of State to publish a history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions by the United States during the present century.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1038) for the relief of George E. Hasie, late inspector of cigars and snuff in and for the second internal-revenue collection district in the State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Senate bill No. 1021, allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships, has been returned from the House with an amendment. The House amends the bill as passed by the Senate in a very important particular, and I do not think the Senate ought to agree to the amendment. To state what the amendment is will, I think, be sufficient to make the Senate agree to non-concur. The bill is very short, and I will read it with the permission of the Senate:

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept from the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, for service in transporting the mails of the United States between San Francisco and China, the steamships City of Sidney, City of New York, and City of San Francisco, the same being new iron American-built ships of more than three thousand tons register; said iron steamships to be substituted for any wooden side-wheel steamers now lawfully doing service under the act of Congress of February 17, 1865: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as creating, reviving, or recognizing any claim now pending or as a basis of any claim which may hereafter be preferred against the United States by said steamship company, growing out of any law or contract whatever, except such as may lawfully exist under the law of February 17, 1865, above referred to.

The law of February 17, 1865, is a law making the contract with them, and agreeing to pay them a certain amount for carrying the mails, but by striking out "excepting the law of February 7, 1865, above referred to," as the House has done, the result is to deprive the Pacific Mail Steamship Company of the right of demanding pay for the service of carrying the mail. It expressly says that no claim shall be recognized, not even the claim arising under the law of February 17, 1865, which I am sure the House could not have intended to do. I hope the Senate will at once non-concur.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Now I move that the Senate ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. KEY were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 2d instant:

Resolved, That 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the late massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, yesterday when I yielded the floor I was referring to the parties implicated in the recent murders at Hamburgh, South Carolina. I was speaking of the character that these parties bore in the community in which they live. I have no desire to misrepresent any person connected with this transaction. What I have said about these parties is I believe true. My object in stating this to the Senate and to the country is to controvert the idea that is spread abroad whenever reports of outrages come up from the South. Senators on this floor, newspapers and public men, all join in deploring these outrages. They all say they regret them; but at the same time we hear from all of them, or nearly all, some kind of an excuse. They say that the negroes were insolent, that the negroes were turbulent, that they were the cause of these riots, and that the authors of these crimes were low, reckless, and irresponsible men in the community. My object in speaking of the character of the parties implicated in these transactions is to show that that is not true. These murders have been committed. Whether the parties mentioned in the reports of the coroner's inquest are the parties really guilty, I do not know. They are charged with it upon the oaths of citizens of South Carolina; and if they are the guilty parties, I have this to say, that they are persons who are recognized in their communities as gentlemen and the best people in their community. I want to hold the real parties responsible for these outrages. I do not want the responsibility shifted onto people who are not responsible and who have no position in society. That is all I ask. I think it fair, and no man can complain of it. I know no man in South Carolina will object to that. It is all very well for Senators to talk about the authors of these crimes in the South being "spewed up" by the war, and all that sort of thing; but Senators know better than that; newspaper men know better than that; public men know better than that.

DEMOCRATIC EXCUSES FOR THE RIOT.

I want to read from an article the Charleston News and Courier in regard to this outrage. This paper deplores these outrages. It goes further than that; it denounces them. Let me read to you the object of their denunciation. This is the Charleston News and Courier of July 13, only five days after the occurrence:

The northern newspapers, even those most friendly to the South, are loud in their denunciation of the Hamburgh slaughter. They regard it as doing good work for Hayes and Wheeler, and predict that a few more outbreaks of the same sort will insure the defeat of Tilden. Is it not horrible that a band of regulators should have the power to destroy, by their inexcusable violence, the prospects of the party which, if successful, will restore constitutional rule to the whole people?

There is the reason given for denouncing these outrages. There is nothing in that paper of regret for the death of these poor people, but they put it upon the ground that it will hurt the election of Mr. Tilden. Why do they put it on that ground? Because they know that the North will never consent to the election of Mr. Tilden unless Mr. Tilden's friends in the South will quit killing negroes and radicals. They know as well as we know that that sort of thing will not do any longer. They know the people of the North are getting tired of this violence, and they say to their bad men, "Halt." I wish their bad men would listen to that advice. If the election of Mr. Tilden will soften the hearts of the southern democratic leaders; if it will stop the murders of colored people and radicals in the South, stop these murders for opinion's sake, I do not know but that I will be willing to say that I would consent to his election. Human life is more important than the question of who shall be elected President of the United States. What I plead for is for these poor people in the South who have no protection, these poor people who are being murdered because they are republicans, and murdered, too, by democrats in every instance.

I have read the opinion of one newspaper. Here is the opinion of another democratic newspaper, the Journal of Commerce, which takes the opposite ground, and I am sorry for it:

The village of Hamburgh, South Carolina, opposite to Augusta, Georgia, is beyond its police jurisdiction, and has latterly become the nest and harbor of negro marauders, incendiaries, and cut-throats. The turbulent, malignant, and criminally intent, here dwelling within easy reach of the Georgia line, in full accord with their own local authorities, civil and military, armed with rifles and organized, have felt strong in the ability to annoy, injure, and endanger the white people of Aiken and Edgefield Counties.

The coroner was willing (I have no doubt) to call any person before the inquest the parties implicated in this trial asked, and there is not one word of evidence in this coroner's inquest that goes to sustain that charge. Why does that paper make such a charge? Simply because it represents a certain sentiment; simply because it speaks for that class of southern people who look upon outrages of this kind with, I will not say consent, but with quite too much kindness.

It is not long since another militia company of negroes in Edgefield, under Tennent, was disarmed by the State authorities and United States troops for drilling nightly with the intention to attack the whites.

The truth about that story is simply this, that a difficulty occurred two years ago in regard to a militia company in Edgefield County. The difficulty commenced at the Pine House, and the result of investigation proved that a white man was the aggressor. After months of excitement, in which both races were concerned and liable to a bloody collision at any time, the difficulty was settled by the arms being taken from the militia company by the State authorities for the sake of peace after three or four persons had been killed.

For some years now the population of Hamburg have been practicing a system of insulting and outraging the people of the neighboring counties. On the 5th of July it seems their militia company stopped the buggy of Messrs. R. Butler and H. Getzen in the public road, abused them, and threatened to make them prisoners for the night.

All the papers join in testifying to the fact that this militia company were parading in the streets of Hamburgh on the 5th of July, as they had a right to do. The street is about one hundred and forty feet wide, and this militia company was marching four abreast. These two young men came along in a buggy and they ordered the militia company to give way and let them pass, and because they refused to do it they had some harsh words, but for the sake of peace the militia company opened column and let these two young men ride through in their buggy. What right had they to order the milita company to do that? But the captain of the company for the sake of peace and to avoid a disturbance, to prevent the charge being made that the militia, the colored militia, were obstructing the highway, opened column and let these two young bloods pass through. I ask Senators to suppose that there was a volunteer company, a military organization of this District, marching up Pennsylvania avenue; would any Senator upon this floor, would the President of the Senate, have any right to stop that company and demand that they should open column and let him pass through? Is there any man in the Senate or any man in Washington who would ask such an unreasonable thing? Yet because these two young men were refused the right to go on the highway where they pleased, they stopped the company and got up this disturbance, but finally were permitted to pass through. That should have been the end of it. There it should have stopped. The militia company had yielded more than was reasonable. These two young men obtained more than any citizen had a right to ask.

For this wrong these men sought redress before Prince Rivers, of Hamburgh, trial justice and major-general of militia, a negro. The case was set for the 9th, and meantime the negro militia swore they would submit to no punishment from the officer of the law, and were loud and threatening in their views. They threatened to lynch Messrs. R. Butler and H. Getzen if they were not convicted.

Now, I ask Senators in all candor, where was the wrong to these two young men? If there was any wrong in it, the wrong was to the militia company and not to these two young men.

Convicted of what? There is no evidence of that kind.

Information of these threats reached the neighborhood of these men, and their friends and neighbors mounted their horses and went to Hamburgh at the time appointed to defend and protect them from violence, and to support the law and its officers in the prosecution of justice.

Great God! justice! I ask what justice did these young men want? Who had been outraged? Their friends resorted to Hamburgh. Yes, I understand all about this friend business. They did not go there like they would go to church. They came there mounted, with their rifles, their revolvers, and their shot-guns. Friends on an errand of friendship do not generally go with that kind of equipments. They went there to get up a row; they went there to get up a fight. That was the object.

Doc Adams, the captain of the company, when summoned for trial, attempted to bully the court—

The evidence shows he was not near the court—and when served with an arrest, defied the officer of the law and assembled his company in the street, armed and supplied with ball-cartridges, to make good his defiance. He and his militia command now occupied the attitude of outlaws or rioters toward the trial justice, and of mutineers toward the major-general of militia. Five efforts were made to bring them to their senses and to induce them to give up the arms they were using to violate "the awful majesty of the law," and to let the people of the county have peace. But all efforts failed. They intended to fight.

Who intended to fight? Nobody was talking about fighting except these people who came in there.

They occupied the second story of a brick building in which they were wont to drill, set up a yell, and opened fire on the friends of R. Butler and H. Getzen from the windows with their Springfield rifles. Soon after they had opened fire they killed, by a shot from the window, Mr. Merriweather, an estimable young man.

When ruffianism is rampant and lynching is threatened white men who seek legal redress, by a band of organized negroes, with the best weapons in their hands, and when the officers of the law are defied and white men are shot dead, the blood of white friends will get up, even in meek and down-trodden Carolina. And when those engaged in this high-handed and criminal business are overpowered, it is not likely they will be treated as prisoners of honorable warfare and according to the laws of nations.

That is the other democratic account of this transaction. That account is written and published in a paper that represents the true sentiment of the white democracy of South Carolina. There is not a line to condemn the murder, not one line of sympathy for the poor men who were murdered, but denunciation and misrepresentation all through to excuse the perpetrators of this crime. I read this to show to the Senate and to the country that a newspaper published in South Carolina and spreading all over the State will dare to utter such sentiments, and no one will rebuke it. When newspapers by such explanations, by such excuses, by such palliation will justify a murder and outrage of this kind, is it any wonder that they so frequently occur?

THE MILITIA ORGANIZATION OF A STATE.

Mr. President, one word before I get on to the cause of all this trouble. It is said that this militia company is not a legal organization. The evidence before the coroner's inquest shows that the militia company was regularly organized and recognized by the colonel of the regiment and the major-general of the military division. In addition to that, the evidence shows that the military company was organized under the act of incorporation. They were a regularly, legally constituted body of militia. They had the right to parade on the 4th of July or any other time that they saw proper. It has been said upon this floor that all the militia of South Carolina are colored people. That is true, but it is not the fault of the colored people and it is not the fault of the State government. The white democrats of South Carolina refused to come in under the militia law to organize companies and make themselves responsible to the State officers. No person quarrels with them about it. In order to gratify their military taste they have military organizations of their own. They are organized under incorporation acts. They go to the clerk of the court and get an act of incorporation on the payment of a small fee of two dollars or two dollars and a half, and they organize companies. They call themselves "rifle clubs" and "saber clubs." We have them in every county in South Carolina and in some counties we have several. They are not an illegal organization. There is nothing in the law to forbid it and nobody objects to it. By common consent they are allowed to exist, owing to the peculiar state of feeling which we have in the State between the races. By common consent, by consent of the State officers, by consent of all parties, these military organizations, because of the refusal of the white people to go into an organization with the colored people, are allowed to exist. They arm themselves and equip themselves at their own expense. I am informed by one of the members of the House that there are two of these rifle clubs in Charleston and one in Chester which have been armed with State arms; and I take it for granted that the statement is correct. It may be said that white people are refused arms from the State. I do not think that ever the State authorities have refused to give arms to a white company if they were willing to come in under the State military law. I have never heard it charged, and I think I am safe in making the statement that that has never been done.

That disposes of the militia question. But with regard to these rifle clubs I desire to say that they were organized some two or three years ago, and during all that time and up to this time they have conducted themselves with order and decorum. I have never heard any complaint of their behavior. I have never heard any threat made by any person representing the rifle clubs, who was authorized to speak for them. I will say that to their credit. I know that there is an impression among the colored people that these rifle clubs are gotten up with a view to their injury. When they were first organized they created a very considerable alarm among the colored people, and to-day there is a feeling of uneasiness among the colored people that these rifle clubs might at some time be used to their personal injury. I do not say that that impression is correct. I know some three or four officers of these rifle clubs. I know the captains of two of them in the city of Columbia, and they are both very excellent citizens and clever gentlemen. I do not think that either of those gentlemen would be a party to a wrong upon the colored people in their capacity as officers of a military company. What may happen in the future I do not know. I am speaking of the behavior of those companies in the past.

I should like to read some of this testimony taken before the trial justice, but there is so much of it and it is so long that I forbear.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the Senator willing to have it go into the RECORD without actually reading it?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose if the Senator wants to read it as part of his remarks no Senator will insist upon actually hearing it read. If it does not inconvenience the Senator at all, I suggest that nobody will object to putting it in the RECORD, if that is his purpose, without reading it all here. He will judge of that himself, I suppose.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not care to have it read.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I suggest that it had better be printed in the RECORD than to hear it read. Is it in print?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is in print.

Mr. CONKLING. I think there will be no objection to its being put into the RECORD rather than having it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CHRISTIANCY in the chair.) The Chair hears no objection, and the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

THE REAL CAUSES OF THE TROUBLE.

Mr. PATTERSON. Now, Mr. President, I have given both sides of this question, and tried to do justice to all parties. I want both sides to be heard. I now come to what I think is the real cause of these difficulties. That there is a false sentiment existing among the democratic party in the South in regard to the colored man no one will deny. They are determined he shall not hold office and rule. Right here I want to say a word in regard to the southern people. I have no malice toward the southern white people. I went among them a stranger, and I say to the Senate and to the country that so far as my personal relations with that people are concerned they have always treated me kindly and respectfully, and I have nothing for them but the kindest feeling in the world. I will defend them as faithfully and as promptly against a false imputation as if I had been born among them; but there is a class of people in the South that I do quarrel with. I have no quarrel with the great body of the southern people. The great body of the southern people are brave and generous and want to do what is right, and if the democratic leaders would let them alone they would do what is right. If it had not been for the democratic leaders in 1860 the people of the South would never have gone into secession and rebellion. It is a fact that is recorded in history, and the man is a fool who rises in his place, in the Senate or elsewhere, and attempts to deny that the South was dragged out of the Union in 1860 by their leaders, and that their leaders were all democrats. State after State was dragged out. When the people got a chance to vote they voted down secession, but through the manipulation of these leaders the States were dragged out. Governor Orr told me before his death that in 1860 there were not 10,000 secessionists in the State of South Carolina, and yet these few violent, bold, daring, arrogant democratic leaders dragged that State out. They forced the people out of the Union. What I complain of in the southern people is that they allowed themselves to be used by these leaders. They are intelligent; they are men; they were born under the American flag; they have as much interest in the country as those who live in Massachusetts or Pennsylvania or New York or Ohio; but I do find fault with them for allowing themselves to be used by these bold and bad and wicked rulers. Senators may argue that there is no such sentiment in the South. I am speaking particularly of South Carolina; but the case of South Carolina is the case of the whole South. South Carolina is not an exceptional State. Because she was the "first in the fray," is that any reason why the other southern States are not responsible? They were of age; they acted for themselves. The history of South Carolina, the action of South Carolina, represents the action of all of them, and the feeling of the white people of South Carolina represents the feeling of the white people of the whole South. I do not think any one will dare to deny that unless he is very reckless.

THE INFAMOUS BLACK CODE.

I hold in my hand the laws of the Legislature of South Carolina passed in the session of 1865-'66. This was after the war, and after South Carolina had passed into the hands of her old rulers. Under the Administration of President Johnson Governor Perry was appointed provisional governor and a Legislature was chosen composed of the old leaders. If they had this spirit in 1860 and during the war, this record shows that they had not forgotten it years afterwards. This record shows that they had not abandoned one iota of that spirit towards their colored fellow-citizens, because the black man then was their fellow-citizen. The black man was a free man then. It is true he had not the right to vote, but he was a free man. That Legislature met in Columbia, the State capital, and proceeded to general legislation. But among the very first acts that they passed was the act which is known all over this country and all over the world as the "black code" of South Carolina, a code that should disgrace every one of its authors, and every man who voted for it should be ashamed to show his face among an intelligent, an enlightened, and a civilized people. And yet these same people are claiming that they alone are fit to rule in South Carolina and should be put into power, and think it a great hardship that the negro will not consent to let them rule over him again and pass such laws. I will trespass upon your time in order to give the Senate an idea of this code, because I do not presume that many Senators have ever read it. So many things have happened in the last ten or fifteen years, events have crowded themselves upon us so rapidly, we have made history so fast, that a great many important events which the statesman should take notice of, ay, which the voter should take notice of, have passed from memory. This is a law to amend the criminal code:

SEC. 10. A person of color who is in the employment of a master engaged in husbandry shall not have the right to sell any corn, rice, pease, wheat, or other grain; any flour, cotton, fodder, hay, bacon, fresh meat of any kind, poultry of any kind, animal of any kind, or any other product of a farm, without having written evidence from such master or some person authorized by him, or from the district judge or a magistrate, that he has the right to sell such product.

Then it goes on to prescribe the punishment for that offense. That law is to apply to the laborer, it is to apply to the man who tills the soil, the poor man now free, the man who before the law is the equal of the proudest man in South Carolina; yet they passed a law and imposed a heavy penalty upon him if he dared to sell any product of his farm without the written consent of his master. This word "master" may sound very strange. People will argue perhaps that slavery was over, and there were no masters. As I read further in this book I will show you that by this law they provided that the employer should be known as master and the employé should be known as the servant, and yet it was not in the days of slavery; this was in the days of freedom. This was after the war, after we had what they called peace, and after the adoption of the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery; and yet this law was to apply to the man of color, (and not the white man,) the man who had fought for and helped to preserve the life of the nation.

SEC. 11. It shall be a misdemeanor for any person not authorized to write or give to a person of color a writing which professes to show evidence, &c.

If any white man should give a colored man a permission of that kind he is fined. Here is section 13, which provides—

Persons of color constitute no part of the militia of the State.

When they had the authority in the Legislature, when they ruled after the war was over, and they pretended to accept the logical results of the war, they took good care to pass laws that the colored people should not serve in the militia. When the colored people got into power in South Carolina, what did they do? Did they pass such a law as that, providing that white men should not serve in the militia? No; they passed a militia law that white men and colored men, democrats and republicans, all, could avail themselves of, if they chose. Is not that a shame that the white democratic leaders of South Carolina should make a record like that, which shows so much illiberality, when three years afterward another law is on the statute-book which says, "No, we do not pass any such illiberal laws; we negroes pass a law that civilized nations can recognize and be proud of; we will open the militia organization to all classes and all colors and to all people." This is the spirit of the legislation since reconstruction.

SEC. 14. It shall not be lawful for a person of color to be the owner, in whole or in part, of any distillery.

They were careful they should not have distilleries. I think that was a pretty good idea.

SEC. 22. No person of color shall migrate into and reside in this State unless within twenty days after his arrival within the same he shall enter into a bond, with two freeholders as sureties, to be approved by the judge of the district court or a magistrate.

That is, no man of color shall dare to go into South Carolina unless in twenty days he give bonds to be approved of by the judge of the district court. And who is he? Of course he is a democrat. Of course that was the only kind they elected in those days. That's what's the matter; they do not get them elected now.

If he failed to give bonds, as provided in the statute, he must leave the State, and if he refused he was to be whipped by order of court, and, if still refusing for fifteen days, he should be kept at hard labor (virtually sold) for five years.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that the law now?

Mr. PATTERSON. O, no; that is not the law now. The negroes do not pass such laws to apply to white people, but white people pass such laws to apply to negroes. They had not learned down there that the war was over; that was the trouble. Here is another:

Visitors or other persons shall not be invited or allowed by the servant to come or remain upon the premises of the master without his express permission.

I ask northern democratic Senators, Would you like to vote for a law of that kind to apply to the poor white man of the North? Is there a democratic Senator on this floor from the North who would dare to vote for such a law? Yet this law was passed to apply to free colored men in South Carolina by your democratic friends. If that law was in force in South Carolina, the democrats could carry the election without any trouble by as large majority as that by which they carried Alabama the other day, because the colored people, if this law was in force, could not leave the plantation; no man could go there to see them; and of course we should have democratic majorities; but it is not in force, thank God, and I do not think it will be soon.

When the servant shall depart from the service of the master without good cause he shall forfeit the wages due to him. The servant shall obey all orders of the master or his agent, and shall be honest.

That is a very good idea.

For any acts or things herein declared to be causes for the discharge of a servant or for any breach of contract or duty by him, instead of discharging the servant, the master may complain to the district judge or one of the magistrates, who shall have power, on being satisfied of the misconduct complained of, to inflict or cause to be inflicted on the servant suitable corporal punishment.

I need not explain that; everybody understands what that is. The whipping-post had not been cut down yet in South Carolina, and this by a Christian, civilized people:

The contract for service shall not be terminated by the death of the master, without the assent of the servant.

* * * * * * *

The rules and regulations prescribed for master and servant apply to persons in service as household servants, conferring the same rights and imposing the same duties. * * *

The master shall have the right to inflict upon the servant such corporal punishment as he may think proper.

He may think very severe punishment proper to inflict on these free citizens of America. Here is a section in regard to "mechanics, artisans, and shop-keepers:"

No person of color——

That does not say "no person," but

No person of color shall pursue or practice the art, trade, or business of an artisan, mechanic, or shop-keeper, or any other trade, employment, or business (besides that of husbandry or that of a servant under a contract for service or labor) on his own account and for his own benefit, or in partnership with a white person, or as agent or servant of any person, until he shall have obtained a license therefor.

Then it prescribes what he shall pay for the license.

All persons of color who have not some fixed and known place of abode and some lawful and reputable employment, &c., may be arrested as vagrants, and, by order of the district judge, be fined and hired out.

In other words sold into slavery again.

I have read these extracts to show the spirit that actuated the Legislature of 1865, a Legislature that met after the war; to show that the same spirit prevailed as during slavery: that these people were unwilling to accord to the colored man, although free, the rights that had been secured to him by the war.

Mr. President, I will not take the time of the Senate in reviewing the history of the Ku-Klux in South Carolina. It is well known that there were Ku-Klux in other States. The ku-klux organization existed in nearly every State in the South, and I will not weary the attention of the Senate by referring to it, but I will read for the information of the Senate an extract from the speech of Reverdy Johnson, who was employed by friends of the parties charged with ku-kluxing in South Carolina before the United States court to defend them. You all know who the late Reverdy Johnson was. I merely read this to get his testimony as to the facts in regard to these trials. I have heard Senators on this floor referring to the ku-klux outrages in South Carolina deplore them very much, but I have heard them deplore in much stronger terms the manner of the arrests that were made of the parties who committed those horrible outrages. If they did not express sympathy for these parties who were implicated, they certainly did not express any condemnation of these crimes. I will ask the Clerk to read this.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I have listened with unmixed horror to some of the testimony which has been brought before you. The outrages proved are shocking to humanity; they admit of neither excuse nor justification; they violate every obligation which law and nature impose upon man; they show that the parties engaged were brutes, insensible to the obligations of humanity and religion. The day will come, however, if it has not already arrived, when they will deeply lament it. Even if justice shall not overtake them, there is one tribunal from which there is no hope. It is their own judgment; that tribunal which sits in the breast of every living man; that small, still voice that thrills through the heart, the soul of the mind, and as it speaks gives happiness or torture: the voice of conscience, the voice of God. If it has not already spoken to them in tones which have startled them to the enormity of their conduct, I trust, in the mercy of heaven, that that voice will speak before they shall be called above to account for the transactions of this world. That it will so speak as to make them penitent, and that, trusting in the dispensations of heaven, whose justice is dispensed with mercy, when they shall be brought before the bar of their great tribunal, so to speak, that incomprehensible tribunal, there will be found in the fact of their penitence or in their previous lives some grounds upon which God may say, pardon.—Columbia Union, September 2.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is stronger testimony than I could give. Mr. Johnson certainly believed everything he said, or he would not have given that testimony against the very clients he was there to defend.

Mr. President, I have attempted to show that the parties implicated in the Hamburgh massacre were not low people; that they were the respectable people of that community. The history of the Ku-Klux trials shows that the parties implicated in those crimes were not low, irresponsible, and ignorant people. The testimony goes to show that the whole community, if they were not implicated as members of this organization, countenanced it. I remember an instance that occurred in Judge Bond's court. A young man was called up for sentence. He had been indicted and pleaded guilty. He was a fine looking young fellow, twenty-one or twenty-two years of age. Judge Bond called him up and asked him his name and where he lived. He said he lived in Spartanburgh. He asked him if he had been a member of the order of the Ku-Klux. He said he had been. He asked him why he joined. He said, "They said they would kill me if I did not join." "Who would kill you?" "My neighbors." "Why would they do it?" asked the judge. "Why," said he, "they said they all belonged to it and every man in the community must join." This transpired in court. The judge asked him if he had been on any raids. He said yes, he had been on one or two raids where there had been one or two negroes hung. He asked if he did not think it was wrong to hang negroes without trial and without any cause. "Why, no," he said; "they said it was not wrong; no harm in killing negroes if they were radicals." That young man believed that; he believed it religiously. The judge said now, "Why did you not tell your father when they threatened to kill you if you did not join the organization?" "Why," said he, "he belonged." He asked him if there was any county officer or township officer at hand. He said "O, yes, there were." "Why did you not tell them?" "Why," said he, "they belonged." He asked him if they had any churches in that township—Limestone Township. "O, yes." He asked him did he ever go to church. He did. He asked him if they had any elders in the church, any ruling men in the church. "Yes." "Why did you not go and tell these elders that these neighbors threatened to kill you if you did not join this order?" "Why," said he, "they belonged." "Well," the judge asked, "is there a preacher there?" "Yes." "Why did you not go and tell the preacher?" "Why," he said, "the preacher belonged too; for he was there at a meeting of the order the last night I was."

I only give this as an instance to show the condition of society, to show how these outrages and these crimes are participated in. That young man was honest; that young man was in earnest. The whole secret of this thing, the whole cause of this spirit is because of the education that the democratic leaders in the South have instilled into the minds of the people. That is the cause of this trouble. The young men in Edgefield and Aiken and from Augusta, Georgia, who were engaged in the Hamburgh riot have been taught from their infancy that slavery was right, that secession was right, and that rebellion was the remedy. They have been taught to believe that negroes had no rights that white men were bound to respect, and they associate the white radical with the negro, whether he is a native or a northern man. They believe that. They have been taught to believe that the killing of negroes because they will not vote the democratic ticket or because they insist upon voting the republican ticket or because they will hold office is not wrong. Let any Senator go from this place to-day to Edgefield County and ask if the gentlemen charged in this return of the coroner's jury have lost caste in Edgefield or Aiken County or in Augusta, Georgia, for their participation in these crimes and the answer will be "no." Not one of them loses caste. The neighbors respect him as much as before these outrages. That is a fact that no man will deny. It shows a vitiated public sentiment, and it is all traceable to, and the parties responsible for it are, the democratic leaders of the South.

I do not say this in any unkindness toward the people of the South. I say the people of the South should inform themselves; they should resist such counsel from their democratic leaders. If they are bound by the chains of such a prejudice, if they hold human life so cheap, if they believe that a man should be killed and murdered or knocked on the head because he seeks to vote as he pleases, I say it is their duty as American citizens to correct that impression and the sooner the better. Why, Mr. President, if Samuel J. Tilden was to go to Edgefield County to-morrow and be received by the democracy of Edgefield County, the chances are that M. C. Butler would be the chairman of the committee to receive him; he certainly would be on the committee, and he certainly would meet Mr. Tilden and meet him as his equal.

MR. TILDEN'S SYMPATHIES WITH THE WRONG.

It is well for the New York Herald to come out and say to Tilden that he must come out and denounce these outrages. Mr. Tilden did not do so. My able and distinguished and amiable friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] yesterday said that Mr. Tilden had nothing to do with such things—nothing to do with the interests, the lives, and liberties of five millions of his fellow-citizens! I say that Mr. Tilden, a man who aspires to the Presidency of the United States, should be ready to use his power and his influence and his voice at any time and at all times, before his election and after, to prevent the murder of American citizens. It is his duty; and if he had written one line in his letter of acceptance of the nomination by the democratic party for President that would have stopped these murderers, that would have stopped this violence, that would have stopped the shedding of human blood for opinion's sake in the South. It was his duty to do it, and if it lost him democratic votes he should have been man enough to have said "I do not want a democrat's vote who wants to vote for me because he thinks I sympathize with murder." Great God! Do you want to elect Samuel J. Tilden by such means? Cannot he be elected without the votes of all the murderers in the United States? Is he to be the candidate of all the murderers in the United States? I hope not. I have too much respect for him. Let Samuel J. Tilden be elected President of the United States by the votes of the honest people of the country and every man will say amen; but for the sake of the country, for the sake of the nation, for the sake of civilization, do not let it go abroad that Samuel J. Tilden cannot be elected unless he gets the votes of all the murderers in the country. I want to see Hayes and Wheeler elected; but if they must be elected by the vote of one murderer I pray God that they may be defeated. Now let the democrats join with me in that about Tilden.

THE STATE AUTHORITIES.

Mr. President, early in the discussion of this question it was said, Let the State authorities of South Carolina do their duty and bring these guilty parties to justice. The State authorities of South Carolina are trying to bring these people to justice. They have had them arrested and I want to show you what they are doing about it. The warrants were placed in the hands of the sheriff of Aiken County. These are no common fellows, I want you to understand; these are gentlemen. They are not the kind of men whom you can send the sheriff after and catch by the collar as you would a common fellow. He dare not do that. The sentiment of that community would not tolerate it. These gentlemen meet at the office of Mr. Butler—not M. C. Butler, but a namesake—and they surrender themselves to the sheriff, and make an arrangement to be at the Aiken court-house on a certain day to give bail, and the entire bar of Aiken has volunteered to defend the accused. Every lawyer in Edgefield County has volunteer to defend the accused. The democratic county convention of Edgefield met since this transaction, and they passed a resolution extending their "aid and sympathy to all the parties who may be arrested for complicity in the transaction at Hamburgh." That is a formal, solemn resolution of the democratic county convention of the County of Edgefield, in which so many of these unfortunate gentlemen reside; because they are unfortunate. I always have sympathy for any person who is guilty of such crimes. I have no love for human misery; I want to see no one of my neighbors in trouble; but this resolution extends their aid and sympathy to these people. The judge of that district is a democrat. He was elected by a republican Legislature; but as far as I have heard about him he is an honest man, a good judge, and I think he will do his duty.

In South Carolina our jury law provides that the juries shall be drawn from the taxables, not from the voters. The jury-list is made up from the list of taxables. With such a sentiment in Edgefield County, with such a sentiment in Aiken County, with the manner of making up the juries, I ask what the chance is for a conviction? These people do not care any more about going before that court, not half as much as I do about standing here and making a speech, for of all things in the world that I dislike it is that of making a speech.

Mr. CONKLING. You are doing very well and making a good speech.

PUBLIC SENTIMENT DEFEATS THE COURTS.

Mr. PATTERSON. Thank you. These people have no fears of the State courts. They know they are in accord with the sentiment of the white democrats in the whole county, they know they have got a sentiment in the whole State to surround them and to protect them. Senators may think it is very harsh for me to speak in this way of the State I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. I am not responsible for this sentiment. I am not responsible for this feeling. In all the speeches I have ever made in South Carolina I have advised the colored people to be law-abiding, to give unto others the same rights that they ask for themselves, and I have tried to inculcate upon them the same principles that govern citizens in Pennsylvania, and I have no desire except for the very best interests of the State of South Carolina. I am only speaking of facts; I am speaking of what does exist, and I do not think there is a democratic Senator on this floor who will deny the existence of this feeling. Why, Mr. President, the people of the South are not singular in this respect. They may be just now; but let us go back a few years. How many years has it been since there was the same feeling in the Northern States? Less than forty years ago Lloyd Garrison was mobbed in the streets of Boston and a rope tied around his neck and he was marched through the streets of Boston, by whom? Was it by the low people, was it by the blackguards? No, by the best people in the city of Boston, because they were in favor of slavery and they were opposed to abolition, and this man was a vile abolitionist, a pestilential fellow. Why was that done? Why was it tolerated? Why were not the parties punished? Because behind the action of that mob was the public sentiment that was depraved and vitiated just as this public sentiment of the South in regard to violations of the rights of colored people and radicals, as they are called; for we never hear the word republican there at all; we never hear anybody called republican in the South; it is radical, and radical "means nigger." That is what they say. Forty years have passed, and Boston has got rid of that sentiment. I am not a very old man, but I remember very well in Pennsylvania when an abolitionist was a despised and hated man. I know when we organized the republican party in 1855 in Pennsylvania they called us "nigger-heads" and "woolly-heads," the mildest phrase was "black republicans," and when we went out to make speeches they would throw rotten eggs at us. Who did that? The democrats in Pennsylvania.

The time was—my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] knows it—when it would have been very unsafe for an abolitionist to have gone up into the county where he lives and made a speech. He knows it and I know it. Within forty years Pennsylvania Hall was burned in Philadelphia because the abolitionists held meetings there. Public sentiment in Pennsylvania has been changed since then; more enlightened and more civilized ideas prevail there. Now I ask that the people of the South shall educate themselves. I am not here to ask the North to pass judgment upon the people of the South. I am not here to ask you to send armies down there again to inflict woes and horrors upon the people of the South because they have this spirit. I ask you to forbear, to give the people of the South an opportunity to recover from this nightmare, as you have done at the North; give the people of the South an opportunity to get educated up to the idea that the American citizen is an American citizen, and is entitled to the same rights everywhere. They will learn it. The time will come, and it will come in Georgia, and it will come in Texas, and it will come everywhere, that an American citizen will be as safe there as he is in Pennsylvania or in Massachusetts; but it has not come yet, and many, many will be the victims who must lose their lives before they learn that lesson. It is in behalf of these victims that I plead. I ask in their name, in the name of these innocent people that a party that has the power will use it to stay the hand of this violence. In the name of God and in the name of humanity, raise your hand to save the lives of these poor, innocent, and unoffending men; and when that is done this long-continuing Iliad of our woes will cease, and peace and concord will prevail throughout the land.

USE OF UNITED STATES TROOPS.

It is said the Government of the United States has been called upon for troops. I want the trials to go on in the courts. I want the State authorities to exhaust all their power. I know that in the South the presence of United States troops is offensive to our democratic friends, and I am such a good-natured man that I do not want to offend anybody. I know they do not like the presence of the blue-coats there, and why I cannot understand. I do not see what harm they do there. I say right here that since I have been in South Carolina—eight years—the United States troops have been there all that time, and I challenge any citizen of South Carolina, no matter who he is, to show the time and the place when the United States troops were used to interfere with the right of the voter, or used for any other purpose than to protect the life of the citizen, except once, and that is the only instance in South Carolina since reconstruction, and I am going to speak of that for the benefit of our democratic friends; for it is a case in point, as the lawyers would call it.

I have here the New York Sun of July 31, 1876, and that is a Tilden paper. I am going to read this. I state the fact on my own responsibility and knowledge, and I want to show that somebody else has heard of this. This is a democratic paper—the New York Sun—that flies the names of "Tilden and Hendricks." It refers to what occurred in 1871, when Mr. Wagener was the democratic candidate for mayor of Charleston:

> During the election of Mayor Wagener the negroes openly avowed their purpose of winning the election, as they had done before, by clubs and stones. The whites, though thoroughly prepared, shrank from the conflict to which they had been invited by the turbulent wretches, and called in the United States soldiers to protect them in the exercise of their suffrages. Even the soldiers at the polls could not repress the turbulence of the aggressive negroes, and it was not until several had been knocked down and one or two shot that they were quelled.

I was there and know all about it. General Wagener was a candidate for election to the mayoralty. The republicans had an honest majority in the city of Charleston of about twelve hundred at that time. They have more now, as the population has increased; but at that time they had twelve hundred. Efforts had been made on both sides. The democratic city committee of Charleston went to the commandant of the troops at the arsenal and asked him to place troops at the election polls of the city of Charleston; and that was the first time in the history of South Carolina and the only instance where troops ever were placed at the election polls, and I defy and I challenge any man to contradict that statement. The only time that ever the United States troops were present at the polls, the only time that ever they were used at the polls was at the instance and request of the democratic city committee of the city of Charleston. The result of it was that the negroes were driven away from the polls; one negro was shot by the soldiers, another was wounded so that he died, and the democrats carried the election by seven hundred or eight hundred, and of course they were happy, because they are always happy when they carry elections, it does not make any difference how. That is the only case when the troops were present at the election polls, and the democrats asked it. We hear about the United States troops being sent south; we hear about their interfering with the rights of voters. I challenge any man to show me an instance in South Carolina that there was anything like that, and all the republicans protested against it. If we cannot carry South Carolina at the coming election without troops being stationed at the polls we do not want to carry it.

MARTIAL LAW IMPRACTICABLE.

The troops are in South Carolina to suppress domestic violence if it occurs. The New York Herald says, "Why does not Governor Chamberlain march a regiment of colored militia over to Hamburgh, declare martial law, and hang these people?" Let me ask southern Senators if Governor Chamberlain dare do such a thing as march a regiment of colored troops over to Hamburgh and to declare martial law and commence hanging these people? I ask the Senator from Georgia, I ask the Senator from Florida, I ask the Senator from Texas, as good citizens, if they would advise Governor Chamberlain to do so rash a thing? How little the man knew who wrote that editorial about the condition of affairs at the South when he advised the Governor of South Carolina to march a regiment of colored soldiers into any county of the State and declare martial law and commence hanging white democrats. He would inaugurate a war of races that would involve the whole country in bloodshed, and bring shame and sorrow upon the entire nation. Every southern Senator knows that is true. It would be the act of a madman for him to attempt any such thing. It is not in his power to do it; he dare not do it; and he would be false to his duty if he were to attempt to do it, because he knows that it would inaugurate a war of races, and no man could imagine where it would end. With the militia on the one side that he dare not use, and the rifle clubs on the other side over which he has no control, his only resort is to the courts; and if they fail, all the governor can do is to call upon the President of the United States that troops shall be stationed in these counties to prevent further violence and outrage and murder; and that is all he proposes to do, and that is all, as I understand, the Constitution authorizes the President to do.

SOCIAL OSTRACISM.

Now, Mr. President, there is one subject that I want to say a word about in regard to the South. The republicans charge that there is social ostracism at the South. The democratic party down there deny that. In regard to this social question I have this to say: I never quarrel with any man because he does not invite me to his house, and I do not like any man to quarrel with me because I do not invite him to my house; but for a man to say that there is no social ostracism of radicals at the South I think is not correct. In all the years that I have lived there I have heard complaint made, made more particularly by the native republicans than by the northern men. Northern men do not care anything about it. Native republicans have told me the story of their ostracism; how their families have separated from them; how their friends have refused to unite with them. Why? Because they left the democratic party and joined the republican party; in the language that they have expressed it, "gone back on your own people." I want the southern people to get over that prejudice. Let the southern people understand that a man should exercise a freedom of opinion, and if his neighbor who was once a democrat with him chooses to become a republican, let him do it. It is not so in the North. There was a time when it was so. There was a time in the North when if a man became an abolitionist he was hooted at. In the South that time is to-day. If he becomes a republican, his neighbors distrust him, they ostracize him.

CARPET BAGGER.

Now a word about the carpet-bagger. I belong to that distinguished class of individuals. I was born in Pennsylvania, and I am proud of it. There I learned the very essential doctrine of true Christianity, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." That doctrine I carried with me to South Carolina. I have tried to practice upon it and I hope I shall continue to practice that doctrine so long as I live. But it will not do to say that there is no proscription because a man is not born in the South. I will grant that a northern man may go south, go into business, keep quiet, vote the democratic ticket, and I do not think anybody will knock him in the head; but the man who goes south, carries with him his principles, carries with him his manhood, a man who lives in a community, pays his taxes, becomes a citizen, and attempts to exercise the same rights that the man in Ohio or Pennsylvania does, is at once called a carpet-bagger and is set upon by these people, and when he goes out to address an audience of colored people and make speeches, everything he says is incendiary. I never made a speech in South Carolina that this News and Courier did not come out and say that PATTERSON was making another incendiary speech. I never said anything in South Carolina except what I am saying here, and I submit to the judgment of every candid man if I have made any unfair statement.

WHY REPUBLICANS IN THE SOUTH ARE UNABLE TO MAINTAIN THEMSELVES.

Here I want to call the attention of the North to this idea. The people of the North say, "Why do not republicans in the South maintain themselves better?" O, my northern friend, you have not studied this question as we who live in the South have. When the war closed you had in the Grand Army a million of men fighting for the idea of freedom. You had all along the line that separates loyalty from disloyalty more than a million of men fighting for what? The Union? No; it was the grand idea of American freedom that they were battling for; the Union was only an incident. It was the grand principles of the Declaration of Independence they were fighting for. To save them you had to save the Union. The war closed; the mailed hand that struck at the life of the Republic was stricken down, and you withdrew your armies; but ideas are not controlled by armies. Ideas roll on, roll on. They may be a thousand years in their journey, but roll they will and armies cannot stop them. It was the idea of American citizenship, the idea of true American freedom that you were fighting for, and you turned that battle over to the poor bondmen, and the native white and the northern man who joined in with him.

I ask the northern people if it was a fair fight. Did you not hand over to us a conflict that tried your strongest and your last energy, and yet you turn the battle for that great idea over to four million bondmen just emerged from a bondage of two hundred years and a few native white men who had the courage to come out and say, "We will accept this new gospel, we will accept the logical consequences of the war, and we will join this republican party and the few northern men who went down there." And what has been the result? That struggle has been going on day after day, year after year, in State after State; an unequal struggle. We had the old enemy to fight, an enemy that you had to fight, an enemy that met you and made you pour out all your treasure and the best blood of the North upon a thousand battle-fields. We had that enemy to meet. They had brains; they had wealth; they had experience; they had military prowess; they had numbers; they had all the property in the South; they had all these advantages in this conflict, and we had nothing except our lives.

The cry of "nigger" was sent up North and northern republicans took it up, and, to their shame be it said, they believed too much of these slanders and these lies that were sent North purposely to poison the public mind. They believed too much of them. The word "scalawag" was coined for that purpose. The cry of "carpet-bagger" was sent up from the South all over the North and a great many good people at the North were made to believe that every northern man who went South was a thief. The southern people know better than that. There are democratic thieves down there and republican thieves, and white thieves and black thieves, and native thieves and northern thieves. The thieving is not confined to the carpet-begger by a long deal. No, Mr. President, this cry of "carpet-bagger" is like the old cry of "abolitionist." Before the war the cry was "the abolitionists are trying to steal our slaves." Now the cry is "the carpet-bagger is trying to steal our money," the same spirit and uttered by the same men; it was democrat then, it is democrat now; and why is it that the people of the North do not understand this cry? South Carolina they say is a "nigger" State. I believe in the doctrine that the majority should rule. That is claimed to be democratic doctrine, and I want them to act upon it. South Carolina has thirty-six thousand colored majority in her population, as appears by the census of 1875; and yet democrats get mad there because the negroes do not elect them to office; and why should they elect them to office? They know what they were before the war. Nobody wants to repeat that history. After the war was over here is the kind of laws in this black code that they passed for the negro as soon as they got power; and yet they turn around and damn the "nigger" because he will not vote for them and put them in office. I say if the negro does that, he ought to be damned, and I tell them that on every stump in South Carolina, and I will do it again.

A FREQUENT QUESTION—SUPPOSE REPUBLICANS HAD RULED IN SOUTH CAROLINA IN 1860?

Mr. President, let me ask the people of the North this question: Suppose the negro, the scalawag, and the carpet-bagger had ruled in South Carolina in 1860? I ask is not that a pregnant question? That question gives rise to a train of thought that would occupy the mind indefinitely. It requires no imagination to point out what would have been and what has been; volumes could be written upon that idea. If the negro and the scalawag and the carpet-bagger had ruled in South Carolina in 1860, how vast would have been the change in the history of this country. Would you have had any war? Would this mountain of debt have ever been dreamed of? O, Mr. President, that is not the sad part of it. The six hundred thousand lives that were sacrificed in this war would not to-day be charged against the democratic leaders of this country. No, sir; if South Carolina had been republican in 1860 we should have had no war; the democratic politicians could not have dragged South Carolina out. The democratic politicians cannot drag South Carolina out to-day. There are quite too many of these objectionable classes there, as they call us.

THE NEW DANGER.

South Carolina was the Pandora box from which proceeded all our ills. From it proceeded all the woes the country has been suffering. It was the first to secede. The first gun that was fired at Fort Sumter involved this country in a war and roused this people to a sense of their danger. Now, as a South Carolinian, (for I claim to be that,) as a representative of South Carolina, I stand here to-day to speak of a new danger. If any man will ask me if I believe the southern people contemplate another secession, I tell him no; they do not think of such a thing; but there is a sentiment abroad in the whole South that these democratic politicians understand. No English-speaking people ever made such sacrifices in defense of an idea as the southern people did in defense of "the lost cause." They believed they were fighting for their liberty; they believed they were attempting to relieve themselves from an oppression as intolerable and unbearable as the oppression that our forefathers attempted, and did successfully relieve themselves from in the contest with Great Britain. They believed it then; they believe it to-day.

Have you ever heard a democratic Senator on this floor get up and say that he believed the lost cause was wrong? No; it is the boast of these people that they fought honestly because they believed they were right. History never deceives any person. History will repeat itself. These people in the South believe that their liberties were stricken down at Appomattox. That flag of the stars and the bars represents a principle dearer to them than life, and they sacrificed their lives freely and cheerfully in defense of that principle. They were conquered, but the spirit of liberty never has been driven out of any people. It may be stricken down, but it has never been in the history of the world forgotten by a people. They may be overcome, they may be held within the power of a stronger nation; but they never forget an idea that they once fought for, and that idea with the Southern people is that they were fighting for their liberty.

I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this point, because I say nothing here that I do not believe. I say that South Carolina was the Pandora box of all our ills; she was the first to strike; she led the southern column; she inaugurated secession and rebellion by her bold and able leaders. I say that South Carolina to-day has the whole question in her power: she is to-day the key of the situation. South Carolina is the only State in the South that the republicans have any certain prospect of carrying. South Carolina is the only State that is to-day certainly a republican State. But let this spirit of Hamburgh, let this spirit of Ku-Klux, let this spirit of violence, let this spirit of murder go on, and let South Carolina be swept into the vortex of democracy, and you have a united South, and I say to the people of the South in all kindness—my home is there, all that I have in the world is in South Carolina, my interests are their interests, the evil that overcomes them overcomes me—and I say to the people of South Carolina that when they consent to have that State swept into this vortex, they may make up their minds to prepare for a new horror. A united South just as truly means a united North in the future as it did in 1860. Unite the South and you unite the North; you array one section against the other section and it means war.

Senators may say that this idea is an air-drawn dagger, the creation of my own heated imagination. No; my friends, in behalf of the people of the South, I say no. This new horror will be visited upon the people among whom I live just as certain as God rules above. Let this thing go on, let the South unite, and you will unite the North, section against section. It means a quarrel; the rule of the stronger, and that means oppression of the weaker, and the time will come when the wise counsel and the clear head of the statesman will not solve this question. The last resort will be the only arbiter. God forbid that I should do anything in my place here in this Senate to bring about this new horror for these people. The South has suffered enough; the South has lost enough of blood and treasure; and I say to the democratic politicians of the South and the democratic politicians of the North, do not bring about this new danger.

THE SOUTH NOT ALONE RESPONSIBLE.

Now, Mr. President, the South is not alone responsible for this spirit; the democratic party of the North is responsible for it. Up to 1860 was not the democratic party of the North in accord with the democratic party in the South on the question of slavery? Did they not say that Judge Taney's decision was right in the Dred Scott case? They encouraged this spirit; they had it themselves years before. That is history. The democratic party of the North kept abreast with the democratic party in the South, and in 1860 they charged along the whole line against the column of freedom. They charged up until when? The whole line charged until the first fire, and then the left wing of the army of slavery that was in the North fell back, and the right wing of the army of slavery met the army of freedom boldly and manfully and fought it out, and their friends in the North, the left wing, sneaked off. There is not a democrat in the South to-day but has contempt for them. I have heard thousands of them say that they had contempt for the democratic party of the North, because they encouraged them to go into the rebellion, and, when the first gun was fired, they sneaked back. That is true. If the democratic party of the North had kept their pledges to the democratic party of the South, the North never could have whipped the South. They promised to do it or the South never would have gone to war, never would have gone into rebellion.

JUSTICE TO THE WAR DEMOCRATS.

Right here I want to say, in justice to the thousands and hundreds of thousands of brave and true and gallant democrats who went into the Army, that I do not include them in this left wing of the rebellion whose ranks they left to fight treason. They accepted the new gospel. I know plenty of men in Pennsylvania, democrats, who before the war said, "Before you fellows go down there to whip the South you have got to march over our dead bodies," and who when the war came, when Fort Sumter was fired on, when the integrity of the Union was in danger, went into the ranks and fought like brave and gallant men, and thousands and thousands of them lost their lives on the battle-field. I say that much to the credit of the northern democrats who went into the Union Army. I thank God for another thing, that we find very few northern democrats who went into the Union Army who are democrats to-day. There was a class of democrats all over the North during the war, the rear-guard of the confederate army, who believed everything that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] was fighting for; they believed everything that the gallant soldier from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] was fighting for; but, unlike them, they had not the courage, they had not the manhood to fight it out on the battle-field, but they staid at home sneaking and voting and declaring "this war is a failure."

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—BOURBANISM.

The democratic party is like the Bourbon party in France. They never learn anything and never have forgotten anything. They neither know how to rule nor to fight. They have always been on the side of aristocracy, caste, and oppression. For forty years they have opposed progress and fought stubbornly every advance made by the nation in the cause of human rights. The great truths of free speech, freedom of the citizen, and universal suffrage have found in this party constant, violent, and bitter opposition. And when their resistance was no longer heeded they closed a career of infamy by rebellion and an attempt to overthrow the temple of liberty they had so long polluted with their presence. They are correctly described by Tennyson:

> They are the ancients of the earth
> And in the morning of the times.

In the South they raise the cry of white man against the black man, and upon this color line appeal carry the elections, thus arraying race against race, and to prove that they, the white democrats, will not consent to let the negro rule over them even where the negroes have overwhelming majorities in number. This spirit governs and controls the white democrat, and is the true cause for the violence constantly occurring in political campaigns in the South.

Now, a word about southern democracy. Bad as it is, illiberal as they are, sometimes I do think that I should rather live among the southern democracy than among this northern democracy; one we understand and the other we do not understand, and they do not understand themselves. One is an open enemy to republican ideas, the other is as hostile, but low and cowardly. That mob that went howling through Hamburgh, South Carolina, on that night were insane. They were insane because of their education, because of their association, because of their teaching; but it was not a mob of ignorant men; it was a mob of men who claim to be intelligent, men who hold high positions in society. The cried "shoot the nigger;" and shoot him they did. That is not the only mob of men who have gone through a city at night uttering the cry of shoot and crucify. We read about another mob away back in the olden time, a mob that went howling through the streets of Jerusalem, crying, "Crucify him, crucify him." Was that mob a mob of ignorant men? No. That was a mob of the best people in Jerusalem, as the account tells us, sent out by the high priest and elders. Their cry was "crucify him." They were the gentlemen of Jerusalem. I do not know whether they were democrats or not. [Laughter.] I suppose if some democratic editor should get it into his head that that mob in Jerusalem that night that went through the streets howling "crucify him" were democrats, and that the chief priest and elders were democrats, it would shake the faith of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] because he could not possibly believe that any but the rabble could have been engaged in that dreadful work; and if Christ had been crucified by democrats of his class, it would, in his estimation, of necessity have been a proper thing to do. He would say he did not believe it. If the democrats get the idea into their heads that that story is not true, that these fellows who went through the streets were democrats, I am afraid it would shake the faith of the whole democratic party; and, with their bad politics and no religion, God only knows what would become of them. Why, Mr. President, if there had been a democratic newspaper published in Jerusalem at that time, and an election pending for president and vice-president of the province of Palestine, Dana would have done very well to have been the publisher of that paper. The very first thing the editor would have done the morning after the crucifixion would have been to run up the name of that high priest, Caiaphas, for president, and Pontius Pilate for vice-president. Why should they not run up the name of Caiaphas? Did not Caiaphas proclaim before the Sanhedrim that this new religion of this man Jesus of Nazareth was a failure; that by it no man could be saved. Now, of course, he is a fit democratic candidate for President. Did not Samuel J. Tilden, in 1864, in the democratic Sanhedrim at Chicago, as a member of the committee on resolutions, solemnly declare to the people of America and the world that the war for the Union was a failure and by it the Union could not be saved? Is not one the prototype of the other? It is the most fortunate thing for Samuel J. Tilden that this high priest Caiaphas is not alive to-day, or he would have beaten him to death for the nomination at the Saint Louis convention.

RECONSTRUCTION ACTS—RADICAL RULE.

Mr. President, I have wandered off on to national politics; but I want to talk a little more about South Carolina before I conclude. It is charged that all the woes, all the distress, all the misery, all the bankruptcy experienced by the people of South Carolina have been brought upon them by the reconstruction acts and by radical rule. Sir, I deny this charge. It is politically convenient, but historically false. The democratic party and the democratic leaders North and South are mainly, if not wholly, responsible for the disasters that have overtaken that section in the present decade. I am astounded at the mental and moral blindness to current facts that can exempt those leaders and that party from its due share of responsibility in the premises. Their demands, however, bold and unblushing as they are, are not without precedent. The guilty Macbeth whose bloody instructions drove the dagger to the heart of the gentle Banquo also denied his guilt; ay more, he made this denial face to face with the pale specter of his murdered victim who rose before him clad in the petrifying garments of the grave. He lied in the presence of death when he exclaimed:

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

Mr. President, that quaint and sterling old English writer, William Wootten, when asked to define the word "ambassador" answered, "An ambassador is an honest man sent abroad to lie for the benefit of the commonwealth." It appears now that the democratic leaders are in many instances sent away from home and democratic papers are paid that a similar service may be rendered to the democratic party. But it is due to the truth of history and to the American people that we should present the facts as they are in regard to the reconstructed States. I shrink from no responsibility which those facts rightly interpreted impose upon the republican party of this nation. To this end I invite the attention of the Senate to a brief review of the condition of the South prior to the passage of the reconstruction acts, and before the advent of the republican party to power in the Southern States; and since we may best judge of the virtue of any system, political or otherwise, by contemplating its effects in that sphere in which it has had its widest and most extreme application, I shall, therefore, cite South Carolina, the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, as the typical State of the South in exemplifying its general condition so far as affected by the recon struction acts of Congress. The fairness of this test will not be questioned by our opponents, since the proportion of colored or republican voters is larger in my own Sta te than any other State, with the exception perhaps of Mississippi.

Let South Carolina itself furnish the crucial test of the charges made against the republican party. South Carolina, where the institution of slavery crowned its rulers with its richest diadems, jeweled with the tears of eight generations of suffering bondmen, arrogantly and defiantly challenged this great Republic to armed conflict and declared open war against its just authority. She was the first in the fray, the last on the field, and may well exemplify the condition of her sister-States under a system applicable by like agencies equally to all.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Let us inquire into the condition of the people and the State before the advent of the radicals to power. It will not be claimed that the people of that State were oppressed, robbed, plundered, and beggared (to repeat language used upon this floor) by the radicals until they got into power, which was in 1868. Yet, Mr. President, all these evils had been visited upon that people before that to a degree almost beyond conception and human endurance; and I ask by whom? Will any one dare to say by the negro they so unjustly assail? Who plunged that once prosperous State into the throes of secession and rebellion and overwhelmed life and property in a common ruin? Was the negro or poor white, who composed four-fifths of the population, consulted? No, sir! The few oppressed the many and one of the fairest States of this Union, its blood, and its treasure were offered up as a sacrifice to the mad folly of a few wicked rulers. That was oppression followed by plunder, robbery, and beggary. Yet democratic Senators have no terms of censure for such as these. Had their madness involved only themselves in ruin, the history would have been sad enough, but the precious blood poured out on a thousand battle-fields, the suffering of the wounded, the waste and destruction of property, the mountain of debt, and the disgrace to the nation were the sacrifices required to atone for the great folly of a few mad men in South Carolina.

But the heart sickens in dwelling upon the picture, and I pass to the date of the provisional government for the State under Johnson's administration. Governor Perry was appointed in 1865, and was succeeded by Governor Orr, who was elected and took office that year. He held office until 1868, and during all that time the former rulers, the men who had plunged the State into secession and ruin, were in power and enjoyed the offices of honor and profit. No negro voted before 1868, and there was no radical party there before that date. The Government said to the colored people who had just emerged from a cruel bondage of two hundred years, "You are no longer slaves, but we deny you the attributes and defenses of freemen," thus making their condition worse than when enduring slavery. During the whole war they had been loyal to the Union and patiently waiting for the year of jubilee, which their faith assured them would come. He (the negro) scorned to obtain, during such a time, his liberty by servile insurrection, and, like the Sepoy, imbrue his hands in the blood of innocent women and children. Up to that time (1868) the Government gave him his liberty only; and now let us inquire how the democratic politicians requited his long years of unrewarded toil and devotion and kindness to them and their families during their years of peril. I challenge democratic Senators to point to the erection of one school-house or one church, or the passage of one act of legislation for their improvement or benefit by the politicians now restored to power through the magnanimity of a generous Government.

In passing here I may add that we can point in sorrow to the fact that school-houses were burned by these men that were erected through the contributions of northern people. And they went further than that. The school-master and the school-mistress were driven from their homes, maltreated, and in some instances murdered because they came down there to spread intelligence and teach the people this new gospel; they came there to enlighten the people of South Carolina as the people of Massachusetts were enlightened forty years ago and get out of their minds this old prejudice.

The Legislature of that State in 1865 was composed of the chivalry, the heroes of the late war, the gentlemen for whom democratic Senators so eloquently plead, who again attempted to fasten the chains of slavery upon the black man, violated the civilization of the age, requited the charity and magnanimity of the loyal North to whom they were indebted for their lives and property, rewarded the forbearance and devotion of the former slave, and outraged all decency by passing the

by a vote of 103 to 21 in the house and but 1 vote in the negative by the senate, (Winsmith,)—a statute, the spirit born of slavery alone could have concocted, its very horrors bringing down upon its authors a shocked and indignant North, and which should have covered them with shame.

Senators have no language of censure for that Legislature and its shameless act, but grow eloquent in denouncing a legislature of radicals for paying rewards of $35,000 for the arrest of murderers and outlaws, who in palliation of their offenses plead that their victims were radicals, victims for opinion's sake, and that too in free America. No, sir, what we cannot and dare not defend, and we do not wish to censure, we in charity will cover with the mantle of silence.

A fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind.

This was the love of these democratic politicians for the freed slave which we hear them prate so much about when they ask his vote to return them to power. Such love is like the instrument of torture, which invites the victim to its polished and luxurious seat but to inclose him in its deadly embrace. Their treatment of the former slave when he was in their power again was illustrated by the maxim "that we learn to hate those we have injured." The policy of thus giving power to the former democratic politician who had ruined the State and denying it to the loyal freed slave was a sad and fatal mistake, and was atoned for by the loss of thousands of lives in the South. The result soon proved that, and Congress so declared it, over the will of a faithless Executive. I refer especially to this infamous black code of South Carolina, to which I have frequently alluded, as evidence of the malice shown by the democratic politicians for the freedman, and ask their apologists to show any act of legislation since the freedman assumed power at the command of the Government and in obedience to that good old democratic doctrine that the "majority must rule" which showed any resentment, which was for the benefit of one class against another, and that was not for the benefit of all.

But I do not wish to anticipate. I have shown that the power of the State was up to 1868 in the hands of the democratic politicians and former masters; you all know no colored man voted up to that time. But for two years a struggle had been going on between President Johnson and Congress. It was feared the negro would be allowed to vote and the negro would assume power, and thus the necessity that the "bland and child-like" manners of the heroic order of the Ku-Klux should be taught to the radicals of the State. But in order to take time by the forelock, as the evidence before the ku-klux committee proves, these angels of light commenced their visits to fallen man early in 1866; and yet there could be no oppression, no robbery, plundering, or beggary of the people by the negro until his advent to power in 1868. Yet murders and whippings had been committed upon these defenseless people for two years by a hidden hand, and no effort made to bring them to justice by the then rulers. The lamented Randolph had been killed in 1868 in cold blood, in daylight, as he stepped on the platform at Cokesbury depot; a man of ability, character, and pure patriotism, chairman of the republican State committee, and killed because he was a black man and radical. Yet white democrats were present with eyes open and did not see who did it. Now I ask who was oppressed, robbed, plundered, and beggared up to this time, 1868? Not the white democrat, but the loyal black man. Ay, more, he had been murdered and whipped, and no protection offered him. He had cause for resistance, for ku-kluxing, for murdering his oppressors; but he patiently submitted to this new tyranny, although the law made him free. It was a sad mockery on freedom, and cost the lives of multitudes of its votaries.

These democratic politicians then in power refused to accept your constitutional amendments, and Congress at last, backed by the North, determined to enfranchise the negro; and in 1868 he assumed power, and from that date he is responsible for its use.

The administration of Governor Scott went into power in 1868, with a large radical majority in the Legislature, and nearly all the offices in the State were filled by men of the same party. Some of the judges and others during the next two years, who professed republicanism to secure office, fell by the way-side and smote the hand that fed them. During his first administration the taxes were very low. No class legislation was enacted. Wholesome and beneficent laws were passed for the benefit of the rich and poor alike; the school system was organized, and from that time dates the revival of business and the renewed prosperity of the people.

These democratic politicans, by secession and rebellion, by laws like the black code, failure to do justice to the colored man, and refusal to accept the logical results of the war, had oppressed and ruined and plundered the people and bankrupted the State, and when they turned over the Government to these radical successors in 1868, the condition of things was worse than at any time during or since the war. They left but $45 in the treasury, the interest on the public debt unpaid for years, an immense floating debt of past-due obligations, and State credit gone, old bonds selling at twenty cents, the credit of the State having been blown away by the first gun fired at Fort Sumter. With the bitter hostility of the former ruling classes, and under such discouraging circumstances, the new administration went into office; and the wonder is not that they succeeded so well, but that they succeeded at all.

PROSPERITY OF THE STATE RESTORED BY THE COLORED MAN.

I say the colored man found the State impoverished and the people suffering for food and they have given them plenty and prosperity. The Legislature at once settled the labor question; the laborer, confident that his rights would be protected and that he would now be paid for his labor, went to work, for there was no pay under the democratic rule. In 1868 the first good crop was made. The owners of the soil were at once benefited, and since then annually they have had good crops, labor has been rewarded, capital has been repaid, and the general prosperity of the people has increased as rapidly as that of any other State east of the Blue Ridge range. In eight years the banking capital has increased threefold, almost every important town now has its bank, and all from the surplus of the country. People do not start banks unless there is business to do and they have the capital upon which to establish them.

The railroads then were dilapidated and embarrassed with debt; now they are in good condition, well stocked, and doing a profitable business, all showing receipts double and treble what they were in 1868. Nothing more surely indicates the growth of a country than constantly increasing trade and travel on railroads. The products of the State for sale and export in 1874-'75 amounted to $35,000,000, consisting of cotton, rice, naval stores, lumber, &c. Virginia and North Carolina cannot make such an exhibit. The crops of cotton are greater than before the war and the price more remunerative. The State debt has been funded into a new bond, and when it is all funded the debt will be $6,000,000. The floating debt has been provided for in other ways, and will certainly be paid off. Expenses of the State government and the taxes have been largely reduced, and the people of the State have full confidence that a few more years of such prosperity will relieve the State from its financial troubles.

The State census taken in 1875 shows the total population of the State to be 923,000, while in 1870 it was only 705,000. The cities and towns have increased in population, while the rate of improvement in the way of new buildings has been surprising. Charleston has a greater population than ever in her history and is rapidly regaining that commercial supremacy to which her fine harbor, central location, and superior facilities entitle her. And all this prosperity under radical rule.

I invite attention to the following statement of the debt and wealth of the State at different times:

1860.
Debt	$12,027,090 16
Property	489,319,128 00
Value of slaves	211,203,000 00
Balance without slaves	278,116,128 00
1865.
Debt	15,802,946 30
1866.
Property	$90,888,436 00
Loss by the war	388,430,692 00
1866.
Debt	14,896,040 10
1875.
Debt, when all funded	6,000,000 00
Property	175,000,000 00

But it is charged the Legislature has been reckless and the expenditure largely increased from what it was under democratic rule. I admit there has been extravagance and the taxes have been too high. Is it not true of all the States and of the General Government that the expenditures since the war have greatly increased and the cry of economy and retrenchment is heard beyond the limits of South Carolina? But the case of that State is an exceptional one. Under democratic rule, the legislation and expenditures of the State were for the benefit alone of less than three hundred thousand white people, while the interests of over four hundred thousand (free but) colored people were entirely ignored. True, they were asked to perform all the labor, thus paying the taxes for themselves and their employers, but not one dollar of the revenue was ever applied for their benefit. They were not a part of the body-politic, and were only counted as so many "beasts of burden" and that too without owners.

Under the new order of things and enfranchisement of the negro, the population had suddenly swelled to over nine hundred thousand free citizens. The machinery of the old government was so rude, unjust, and unfair it had to be abandoned and a new system of government had to be established, "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people;" one that would foster, protect, and cherish the rich and poor, white and colored, all alike.

Now, Mr. President, I have briefly and frankly reviewed the history of South Carolina under the rule of the democratic politicians and that of the republican party, and I submit to every candid man if under the former the people were not oppressed, robbed, plundered, and beggared, and the prosperity of the State utterly destroyed; and is it not true that under the radical rule the prosperity of the State has been restored?

LABOR QUESTION.

It is true that up to 1868 the labor question gave great trouble, and prevented the making of crops, but whose fault was it? The negro, it was said, was lazy and would not work. No law but his own interest and necessity could compel him, and unless he was interested it was folly to expect him to work for the white man. When he was paid he worked faithfully, but refused to work unrewarded. Laws like the black code and compulsory contracts forbidding him from leaving the plantation without his employer's permission were well calculated to disturb the kind relation which should exist between employé and employer. He was forbidden to attend political meetings and to vote, when at last the franchise was given him by Congress. Why should the colored man work for nothing for the white man any more than the white man for him? This was one reason of the sad condition of the State until 1868, when the radicals got power and gave confidence to labor of full protection. From that time up to this date all the labor in South Carolina has been done by the colored people, and to them they are indebted for their rapidly increasing prosperity. They found the State poor, and its people, because of bad laws and wicked rulers, suffering for actual necessaries of life; and to-day, after eight years of their rule, the people exhibit to the world evidence of their prosperity in many ways and count the increase of their wealth by millions.

POSITION OF THE NEGRO—HIS LOYALTY AND IMPROVEMENT.

Labor in South Carolina is to this day considered dishonorable, and white men do not and will not work as colored people there do, and as millions of white men do at the North. Slavery crushed out the manhood of the slave and left him no hope this side of the grave. It is gone, but still casts its dark shadow across his path. The love of liberty is as strong with the negro as the white man, while his desire for learning and information is wonderful. He is patient, without resentment, peaceable and moderate in the use of his newly acquired power. He is loyal to the Union, and carried your flag through the late war, although to him for generations it had not been a flag of stars, but of stripes only. Two hundred thousand negroes were borne on the rolls of your Army, and 30,000 sealed their devotion to the cause with their lives. Not one armed negro ever was found in the confederate ranks. He was ever the devoted friend, the trusty guide, and tender nurse of the Union soldier, who always knew that in the slave he had a friend. Napoleon, the great master of the military art, laid it down as a cardinal maxim that "in war nothing must be regarded as done while anything remains to be done." All history demonstrates that in every emergency the adequate policy is the best. For governments, as for individuals, the path of duty is the path of safety, and this nation must insist that every right guaranteed by the Constitution to the colored man shall be enjoyed by him freely and peaceably.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA LEGISLATURE.

The other day a Senator on this floor [Mr. THURMAN]—I wish he was present—attempted to sneer at the South Carolina Legislature. A majority of the House is colored, but in the Senate the proportion of colored and white is about equal. On the democratic side in the house we have Mr. Trenholm. If our northern democratic Senators do not know him the southern democratic Senators do. He was the Confederate States secretary of the treasury, and is an able and intelligent man. We have Chancellor Johnson in the house, an ex-chancellor of the State, and we have Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Barnwell, and several of the ablest lawyers and representatives of the democratic party in the State. Upon the other side there is the speaker of the house of representatives, a colored man, Hon. R. B. Elliott. He presides over that house with as much ability and dignity as any man I ever saw in a speaker's chair. He was a member of the other House of Congress, and while there he met one of the most distinguished representatives of the South in debate on the civil-rights question. He made a speech in that debate in answer to Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, and I have never heard that Mr. Stephens or any one else ever attempted to answer it. He is to-day the peer of any man in that Legislature. There is no democrat upon that floor who will say that he considers Mr. Elliott in point of ability beneath him. But he is not the only one. There are a dozen able colored men upon that floor, Curtis, Simons, Banfield, Hamilton, Thomas, Humbert, Miller, Boston, T. A. Davis, Spencer, Freeman. Hayne, and others that I could name, who would do honor and credit to any legislative body; but because they are colored they must be sneered at. Why cannot democratic Senators be frank enough, and honest enough, and American enough to do justice to every American citizen, white or black.

Take the senate. We have the representatives of the bar of South Carolina in the senate—men sent from counties where there are democratic majorities. In the State senate Lieutenant-Governor Gleaves, colored, presides with grace and ability. General Swails, also colored, is president pro tempore, and has no superior as a presiding officer. Nash, Jones, Warley, Johnson, Clinton, Maxwell, Cain, Carter White, Green, Myers, Jervey, and Gilliard, all of whom are senators, I will mention. I know that I am not making a statement that any man will contradict in South Carolina when I say that there is not a white democratic senator upon that floor who claims that he is the superior in point of ability or fitness for the place of any of these colored senators whom I have named. The legislation of South Carolina is as wise, as beneficent, and as creditable to the Legislature of that State and as useful to the people as the legislation of any State of this Union. I will compare the Legislature of South Carolina with the Legislature of any southern State.

You need not go to the Legislature of South Carolina to find colored men who cannot spell. You can find white men in this Capitol who cannot spell who are holding high positions and representing the democratic party. O, no; democrats cannot all read and write. A great many of them cannot read and write. I see my good-looking friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] coming along the Chamber, and I want to tell him something. In 1872 I went down through the State of North Carolina on the cars the day before the election for governor, when he was a candidate. I was in the smoking-car, and entered into conversation with a gentleman. I asked him about the election. I did not know my friend from North Carolina then personally, but I knew him by reputation. Since I have known him I have learned to love him and to respect him. This man did not know me. Said I, "Who is going to be elected?" "O, MERRIMON; MERRIMON will be elected." "Is that so?" He said, "All the white people in North Carolina are going to vote for MERRIMON." "Are not any white men going to vote for Tod Caldwell?" He said, "O, no; he is a damned radical." Said I, "How about the colored vote?" "O," said he, "the negroes are all going to vote for Tod Caldwell." "It is all wrong; no man should vote who cannot read or write." "These damned negroes cannot read or write, any of them."

That fellow was strong for MERRIMON, and he was going home to vote, and he was opposed to negroes voting because they could not read or write. By and by we came to a station and I saw something that attracted my curiosity. I asked him what station it was. He said he did not know. I told him I had a list of stations along the North Carolina Railroad in my pocket, but I did not have my glasses with me, and I handed it to him telling him that Concord, or Salisbury, naming some place, was the last place, and I said, "You can see there what is the next place." You ought to have seen him,—this fellow who was going home to vote for MERRIMON, who was opposed to negroes voting because they could not read or write. He took that list, he looked at it, he twisted it around and then turned it the other way. I asked him, "Are you near-sighted?" "No," he said, "that is very fine print." "Yes," said I, "it is very fine print, but you are a young man and not near-sighted; you ought to be able to read and write." "Well, stranger," said he, "I never went to school much; I cannot read." Said I, "You cannot read!" He said, "No, I cannot read." "Well," said I, "did you not tell me a few minutes ago that you are going to vote for MERRIMON?" He replied, "Yes, sir; I am going to vote for MERRIMON." "But," said I, "did you not tell me that the fellow who could not read or write should not vote?" He replied, "I said a negro should not vote because he could not read or write, but a white man ought to vote." That is the idea; white men should have the right to vote if they cannot read or write, but you should not give that right to the colored man.

Because colored men hold seats in the South Carolina Legislature, low-minded and ignorant men, North as well as South, attempt to sneer and misrepresent them. With gentlemen of true refinement and education the true standard of merit is not the color of the skin, but the head and the heart. Fill the former with knowledge and the latter with pure patriotism and genuine humanity, and you describe a good citizen, and one worthy the respect and confidence of all the people. Because negroes have only recently been found in our legislative bodies, ignorant people argue they are not fitted for such positions. Two colored men sat in the British Parliament from 1832 to 1839, while twenty negroes sat in the French Assemby of 1792, and history records that they acquitted themselves with credit. They prove that they are as well fitted for positions of honor and responsibility as white men, when the opportunities for education have been the same.

The colored people in South Carolina are attending school and are learning rapidly. I will here mention the progress we are making in South Carolina in schools. When the reconstructed government took possession in 1868 there was not a school-house open. We have now nearly twenty-five hundred school-houses open in South Carolina. We have nearly three thousand school-teachers, and we have 110,000 young men and young women in schools. In 1860 $75,000 was appropriated for schools. We spend now a million dollars for common schools. If these people who are concerned in these riots like Hamburgh are not too old, if we should just get them to go to schools and teach them, we would have no more Hamburgh riots. Should the negro not have credit for that? I wish I could say as much of every other southern State. I wish that the cause of education in every other southern State was fostered as it is in South Carolina. This foul spirit that murders men for opinion's sake and without any regret, but believes it is right, would soon die out; but there is no remedy for it except education. I challenge any democratic Senator upon the other side to get up in his place and tell us the condition of his State and compare it with South Carolina. Let him say whether the cause of education is prospering in his State like it is in my State under negro and radical rule. "The school-master is abroad" in South Carolina, and I pray God that he may travel into our sister States.

PRESIDENTIAL ISSUE.

One or two words more and I have done. South Carolina, like every other State, feels an interest in the presidential election. In the South we have no politics like you have in the North. There we hear nothing about soft money or hard money. It is not tariff or free trade with us. In South Carolina it is a question of existence. All that the republicans there ask is to be let alone and in time we will work out the redemption of the State. We ask that our lives may be protected, and that we may live there in peace. The republicans of South Carolina, in common with the republicans of all the other southern States, feel that the election of Mr. Tilden bodes evil to them. Their papers convince us, the declarations of their speakers convince us. We know that many of the men who vote for Tilden are the men who commit these murders. If these men vote for Tilden they must hold the offices if he is elected, and if these men are to hold the offices, they will shield and protect crime; they will shield and protect the murderers; we will have no protection, and the former bondman must make up his mind to become virtually a slave to the old master and the white radical must leave the country.

I ask Senators, I ask the people of the North, if that is not a kind of politics that they are not accustomed to; but, so help me God, I believe I am telling the honest truth when I state that that is all the politics that we have got in South Carolina and all that the republicans in every State throughout the South fear. Why should the democratic party be returned to power? Let me ask the honest people of the North if the democratic party is any more honest than it was in 1860, when it was driven from power because of its corruption and its fraud, its villainies and its bankruptcy of the Treasury? Let the people of the North answer that question. Let every man who goes to vote ask himself the question if the democratic party to-day is any more honest than it was in 1860?

Mr. President, I ask another question, which I hope the people will ponder. Let every loyal man in the North when he comes to cast his vote for President ask himself whether the democratic party is any more loyal to-day to this Union than it was in 1860, when the democratic party turned over the wreck of this Government to Mr. Lincoln's administration, with rebellion rampant throughout the whole country, a new and bastard government set up within the limits of this Government, which a democratic President helped to bring about. He had not the honesty, he had not the fidelity, he had not the loyalty, because his party had no loyalty, to stop this secession and this attempted dissolution of the Union and he had not the courage to go against his party. Let the northern voter ask himself that question. In the name of the poor, down-trodden colored man of the South I implore him to do that. If the people of the North vote blindly and think not seriously upon this question, upon us first, but upon them afterward, falls the result of their folly.

I have nothing to say against Mr. Tilden's character as a man. It is not necessary for my purpose that I should do that. The other day as I was going up the street I saw a beautiful flag. It was the flag of the Union, the Stars and Stripes, stretched across the street. I looked upon the beautiful blue of that flag and I counted thirty-seven stars. Tied to the foot of that flag was the name of Samuel J. Tilden for President. The thought rushed upon my mind, Samuel J. Tilden to be President of thirty-seven States when he declared solemnly in 1864, in the democratic convention, that the war for the Union was a failure, and consented to blot from that bright escutcheon eleven of those bright and beautiful stars. Yet that man to-day is put up by the democratic party as a candidate for President of the United States which he did not save, which he was willing to let be dissolved, and by whom? By the democratic party. The next name was Hendricks—Tilden and Hendricks. There was one line which I wanted there, and if I had the power I would write it. It is this: "No more murders for opinion's sake." I say right here, with full knowledge of the responsibility of the assertion, that there are but two men in the United States who have the power to command the bad men, the murderers of the South, to halt. There are but two men living to-day who can say to the murderer of this class whose hand is raised to strike the innocent victim in the South, "Halt;" and those two men are Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks, because every murderer whose hand is raised, and whose hand will be raised between now and the election, is a democrat, and he is their friend, and he will vote for them. The President of the United States has no power to prevent these murders. This Congress has no power; the General of the Army has no power; but the candidates of the democratic party, they, and they alone, have the power. They who are responsible to the people of this country owe it to their God to issue that edict. If it defeats them let it do so, but in God's name, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the credit of the country, they should use their influence with these bad men of the South to stop these outrages.

Senators may not have studied this question as I have. They may think I am trying to shake the "bloody shirt." Senators will testify that I have been quiet since I have been in the Senate about the "bloody shirt." Sir, I have hesitated to attempt to describe the condition of affairs at the South because the truth is so frightful as to make men at the North believe it is fiction. No, sir; half the truth has never been told, and I had hoped that no necessity should arise to require me to address the Senate upon this subject, as I preferred to cover the errors of my people with the mantle of silence, but duty compelled me to no longer keep silence. I am in favor of peace; I want reconciliation; I want harmony between the sections. The northern people have forgiven the southern man for being a rebel. They take him by the hand and say he is a citizen. They invite him to this high place of power and they invite him to all the places of power and responsibility under this great Government. I ask the southern white man to conquer his prejudice and forgive the negro for being free, being a voter, and being his equal before the law. The South has been famous in the history of this country. She has been great in counsel and gallant upon the field, and she has reflected honor upon the whole country. Why cannot the white man of the South conquer his prejudice and extend the hand of true friendship and protection to the republican, no matter where he comes from and no matter what his color may be?

No, Mr. President, I am not trying to shake the "bloody shirt," but I speak words of "truth and soberness." The people of the North are not aware of the true condition of things in the South. If the history of the crimes and the murders since the war for opinion's sake up to this time could be written and published it would be a record that would appall this nation and shock civilization. More men have been murdered in cold blood in the South for opinion's sake since the war than were killed in any one battle in the war on the Federal side, and that, too, in free America. I make that statement not hastily. The facts and the record will prove it, and I beg the people of the North to consider it. If such a carnival of murder had been visited upon the North they would realize it. We who live in the South do realize it, but we have not the power to help ourselves. The power of this Government, the seat of empire, is at the North. You hold the key to the position. You have got the power and you are responsible for the rights and lives of these people. I pray my people of the North, from whom I have descended, who have the same blood that flows in my veins, for my sake, for the sake of my family, for the sake of the poor colored man throughout the South, who is as loyal to the flag as the proudest, the greatest, and the best man in the North, to consider these facts. I beg them to consider them and reflect upon them when they come to vote, and if they do conclude to vote for the democratic candidate for President, I say so be it. But I have the satisfaction that I have given them my warning. I have entered my protest against his election.

South Carolina in this contest will do her duty, and in the face of these dangers, in the face of these outrages and these murders the loyal people of South Carolina will do their duty and their whole duty, not as politicians, not as partisans, but as American citizens. We believe in the principles of the republican party. We believe they will promote the prosperity of this whole country. We believe they are right, and believing in them, the republican party of that State will sustain them. Every republican in South Carolina is prepared to go out and take his life in his hand, and we have to do that in every campaign. This Hamburgh matter is no new thing for us. We had murders, we had violence, we had our meetings broken up in 1874, in 1872, in 1870. We are used to all that. When we go out there to make a speech we take our chances, and it is not any more pleasant than a person would imagine. Somebody has got to do it, and the republican leaders in South Carolina do not hesitate to do it; and while we do our duty we expect our friends at the North to do their duty. When the storm rolled over the North in 1874 and carried the State of my distinguished friend here from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] into the democratic column, South Carolina stood true. South Carolina was then found on the side of the true American principle, and she will be found there again.

Every colored man in South Carolina will pray that Mr. Hayes and Mr. Wheeler may be elected, not as politicians, but because they believe that the election of Hayes and Wheeler will give them protection. They want time to educate their children, they want time to work out their own salvation in their own way, and they do not believe that they can do it under a democratic administration. They have a right as American citizens to be given that opportunity.

RETURN TO POWER.

Mr. President, a few short years ago an army of brave and desperate men, full half a million, well-tried soldiers, commanded by officers of genius and skill, experience and courage, were drawn up in battle array beyond the line that separated loyalty from disloyalty. That army was the "mailed hand" of a bastard government, whose cornerstone was "human slavery," and whose flag was not the Stars and Stripes, the flag of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson, the dead patriots of the Republic, but the stars and bars, the miserable rag of Davis, Toombs, Hunter, and Benjamin, the living traitors of a betrayed nation. That mailed hand was raised against the life of this Republic; ay, that army was knocking at the very gates of this capital. That army met its "Appomattox;" that hand was stricken down, and that flag was furled in defeat, it was then hoped forever. The glorious sunlight of peace, clouded by the sad sorrow for their martyred President, cheered the hearts of all true Americans.

Eleven years have passed away. Forgiveness, generosity, and magnanimity have been extended with "gospel measure" by the victor to the vanquished. Not one drop of blood has been demanded as an atonement for the crime of treason. The armed traitor of yesterday is the respected ruler or honored representative to-day. Yet it is a fact, as I have already stated, that more American citizens, many of whom passed safely through the "fire and hail" of the battle-field, have been murdered in the Southern States during the past eleven years for opinion's sake than were killed on the federal side in any battle during the war.

The same men who directed the movements of that army in war have since by what they call peaceful means obtained political control of nearly every southern State. Nearly one-third of the present Congress comes from what was but yesterday the confederate army, while scarcely one-tenth of this present Congress comes from what was but yesterday the Army of the Union. The Romans opened the doors of the temple of Janus in times of war. We in times of peace open the doors of our temple of liberty to our enemy of yesterday, and invite him to preside at its high altar upon promises of peace and sealed by the solemnity of an oath.

The traitors of yesterday were democrats, they are democrats to-day; they enter Congress as democrats, join hands with their democratic allies from the North as naturally as the links of a chain are united, but to all appearances that chain never was broken, but has always been united by the mystic bonds of an ardent sympathy. This we are told is the return of democracy to power and means peace.

Mr. President, it is recorded in the history of France that the allied armies of Europe assembled at her capital to witness the coronation of Louis XVIII after the fall of the great Napoleon. In the vast throng who gazed upon that scene, made resplendent by the jewels of the most powerful dynasties of the world, there stood a soldier of the empire who had grown gray in war while following the eagles of the mighty Corsican alike over the vine-clad hills of Italy, through the olive groves of Spain, and amid the deadly snows of Russia. As he contemplated the scene, with his heart beating in sorrow beneath the cross of the Legion of Honor which he had earned by his gallantry at Austerlitz, a Bourbon nobleman, not recognizing in him one of the grenadiers of the Old Guard, said to him: "Is not this magnificent? Is it not grand? What could make it more perfect?" "Nothing," answered the battle-scarred veteran; "nothing but the presence of my brave comrades who died to prevent it."

I say to the loyal people of this nation to beware in placing in the presidential chair a State-rights democrat. Already we have seen sixty wounded Union soldiers, employés of the House, dismissed, and forty ex-rebel soldiers appointed to their places. The one-legged Union soldier made to give place to able-bodied ex-rebel soldiers. Union soldiers of the North, you know the reason; and think well over this picture before you cast your votes in November. Yonder flag, which floats so proudly from the Dome of this Capitol, the emblem of a nation's honor and pride, the representative of its greatness and power, honored at home, respected abroad upon every land and sea, may be lowered by the new ruler and in its stead may be unfurled the "stars and bars," a fit representative of a nation's degradation and a free people's shame. The last democratic President lowered the flag, destroyed public credit, and let the Union be broken up; and what assurance have we that the same treason may not again be witnessed under another democrat if elected?

When that time comes, loyalty will furl the Stars and Stripes, deposit them in the tomb at Mount Vernon, the only place on American soil sacred against the hand of the vandal, burn the battle-flags of the Republic, plow up the cemeteries in which are deposited the ashes of a nation's dead, and thus remove every remembrance of the late struggle which may be offensive to our new masters.

By a democratic triumph, is treason to gain all it lost at Appomattox? Is this the feast to which you invite the American people in the coming election? Is this the price you demand for the peace you promise? Is this the hidden purpose of a democratic triumph, not to be revealed until the power is secured?

In the campaign of 1860 the scheme of secession was concealed and denied by the democratic leaders north. The American people have before them that terrible lesson, and in 1876 let them meet this new issue with full knowledge of its great danger and settle it at once and forever. God grant that my fears may not be realized, that the people of the South may be spared a new sorrow and the nation a new shame.

All I have to say in conclusion is that I hope the people of the North will wake up to the real issue involved in this contest. It is not a question of currency at the North any more than at the South; it is not a question of hard money or soft money at the North; it is not a question of tariff or free trade. Every man in the Senate, every man in public life in the United States, every intelligent man throughout the North knows that, after all, the secret spring in this contest is the question of loyalty. The question for the people of the North to decide is, Will you and are you prepared to trust this Government in the hands of the democratic party, controlled as it now is, with its present leaders North and South? That is the question in this national contest. That is the question that must be decided; and I have so much confidence in the good sense, in the integrity, in the patriotism, and in the loyalty of the people of the North that I believe that their verdict will be in favor of the right, and that the right will prevail.

For the democratic party, with such aims and such designs upon the integrity of the Union and the existence of the Republic, I can only express my horror by quoting the following verse:

> May all thy hopes be smitten,
> Thy brightest hour be gloom
> And infamy be written
> In lightning on thy tomb.

Mr. HAMLIN and Mr. WALLACE rose.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WALLACE. For what purpose?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I rose on my feet before the Senator from Pennsylvania did. I am very sure I did.

Mr. WALLACE. I have had the floor on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine rise to this question?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is not an inquiry to be put to me by the Chair. If I rose first I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine claims the floor, having addressed the Chair first.

Mr. HAMLIN. The rule provides that the Chair shall recognize which Senator is entitled to the floor when two shall rise at the same time.

Mr. WALLACE. I was certainly recognized by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the rule requires that the Senator who first addresses the Chair shall be recognized. The Senator from Maine first addressed the Chair. The Chair did recognize the Senator from Pennsylvania, but strictly within the rule he will be obliged to recognize the Senator from Maine, if he insists. The Chair would say in justification, however, of the recognition that the Chair understood that the Senator from Pennsylvania desired to speak upon this subject. It was for that reason that the Chair addressed himself to the Senator from Maine and asked if he rose upon this question. That is the justification of the Chair.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state that the Senator from Pennsylvania had the floor the other day and very kindly gave way to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that, and for that reason the Chair recognized the Senator from Pennsylvania; but the Senator from Maine is correct, according to the rule.

Mr. INGALLS. I was present in the Chamber the other afternoon when the Senator from Pennsylvania rose and addressed the Chair to speak upon the pending question. My recollection is that he was recognized, and that the Senator from South Carolina then asked the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to him, and that he did so with the consent of the Senate. It seems to me that under the rule which has uniformly prevailed, the rule of which the Senator from Maine is so strenuous an advocate, courtesy, if nothing more, and the uniform precedent, would certainly require that the Senator from Pennsylvania should have the floor after the Senator from South Carolina has concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senator from Kansas is correct in his statement. The Senator from Pennsylvania had the floor yesterday, and yielded to the Senator from South Carolina; but having yielded, of course lost the right to the floor, but the Chair supposed the Senator rose to speak on this question and recognized him for that purpose. The Senator from Maine first addressed the Chair, and according to the rule, ruling strictly, the Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say a word upon this subject of courtesy, because I hope I am as incapable as any Senator in this body of acting discourteously toward any member of it. In the first place, a little bill with which I was charged here, and in which all Senators are interested, got under this great big load of hay precisely by the same movement which I have risen to inaugurate. Again, knowing that the Senator from Pennsylvania had gotten the floor yesterday and expected to follow the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Pennsylvania I know will do me the credit to say that I called upon him and stated to him that I was incapable of doing a discourteous thing to him, but situated as I was in relation to the post-route bill I felt that it was my duty, at the importunity of Senators all over the Chamber, to see if I could get the floor and get the Senate back to that bill, and back precisely in the same way it went from it, by moving to lay the pending order upon the table. If the Senator from Pennsylvania insists that under these circumstances he ought to have the floor, I will not make that motion, and I submit it to him.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator from Maine moves to lay the pending motion on the table, it necessarily cuts off debate, and I, in common with all other Senators who wish to speak on the subject, will be foreclosed by the action of the Senate on account of other business pending before the Senate. I think that would be perhaps a breach of courtesy. The Senator from Maine did call upon me, and asked me the question as to whether I desired to speak, and said to me that he intended to move to proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill if he could get the floor for that purpose. I will state that he did say so to me, and hence I rose as rapidly as I could. I thought I had the recognition of the Chair; but it seems I was mistaken. If the Senator from Maine insists, I have nothing to do but to submit.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want, then, to say to Senators who have come to me and asked me to get the post-route bill again before this body, and to whom I said I would make the effort, that I decline to do so simply upon the ground that the Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon the floor.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. Before Congress adjourns the Senate ought by all means to take action either favorably or unfavorably upon the legislation pending which has passed the House in reference to the Hawaiian treaty. I doubt if there is a Senator upon the floor who will disagree with me upon this proposition. We certainly ought to act promptly upon it for the benefit of trade, either that the treaty shall go into effect or release business from the embarrassment which the uncertain condition of this legislation has put upon it. I ask the consent of the Senate that this subject be made the special order for Saturday next. I think that will be enough ahead to allow Senators to make their speeches and to dispose of the matters pressing upon the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. We want to adjourn on Saturday.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think we can adjourn before next Monday. At any rate I will take my chances. I have waited from day to day for an opportunity to call this measure up and could not do it without incommoding Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that as there is now a prospect of an adjournment I will make a suggestion that will dispose of this political matter. I suggest that after a reasonable recess we meet to-night to allow Senators who desire to make speeches (and I am one of them, because I wish to speak briefly and do not wish to stand in the way of business) to come here this evening and finish this political question. Then I think the three days left of this week will be sufficient to dispose of the business that the Senate will desire to act upon. As a matter of course neither the Hawaiian treaty bill nor the post-route bill can be acted upon to-night, but we can afford an opportunity to speak to those who choose to attend and we shall probably have enough Senators to vote upon the resolution. I think everybody or nearly everybody will vote for it at the end, it being merely to print several thousand extra copies of a document.

Mr. HAMLIN. Having yielded the floor to the Senator from Pennsylvania I now ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me the floor for the purpose of affording me an opportunity of moving that the Senate take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to have some understanding with reference to the Hawaiian treaty first?

Mr. HAMLIN. Well.

Mr. SARGENT. If there should be a session for debate to-night I should like to have Friday assigned for the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty. I ask the Chair to submit the question to the Senate that the Hawaiian treaty be made the special order for Friday next after the morning hour.

Mr. INGALLS. Subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. SARGENT. Of course not to interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say that to-morrow morning I propose to call up the report of the conference committee on the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty be made the special order for Friday next at one o'clock p. m., which requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to make an inquiry as to the post-route bill. I think that bill ought to pass and we ought not to make any order to interfere with that bill.

Mr. SARGENT. This will interfere with no bill whatever.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no possible objection to making this special order; but, as my friend from California knows, a special order does not amount to anything; it is superseded by the unfinished business; and there is one bill that I think we ought to consider in preference to any other bill that is before this body, even the appropriation bills, and that is the bill for counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. I think it would be criminal for us to adjourn without at least attempting to pass some bill of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to make the Hawaiian bill the special order for Friday next, at one o'clock.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 14.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not press the matter at this time; but I give notice that I shall vex the ear of the Senate unless I get this thing attended to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also give notice that I will join the Senator from California every time he does it. I think it would be a case of self-stultification if the Senate should adjourn without taking action.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will join the Senators and make a trio in that. Now I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the motion?

Mr. HAMLIN. That the Senate take a recess from half past five to half past seven o'clock to day.

Several SENATORS. Say five.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, from five to half past seven o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me. I think if we have a session to-night it may be possible to report the legislative bill from the conference committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then we shall consider possibilities. This general discussion is regarded of more importance than your post-route bill, and I do not know but that it should be more than your other public business. I will express no opinion upon that just now. I ask that my motion be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock to day until half past seven.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. With the understanding that this evening will be for debate only?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; we must go right on.

Mr. McDONALD. Is it the understanding that the debate is to close on the pending resolution to-night? ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no understanding on that point.

Mr. KERNAN. I understand that it is for business as well as debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of five o'clock having arrived the Senate takes a recess until half past seven.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is entitled to the floor on the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 100, which has been read twice at least.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope I may be allowed to make a report.

Mr. SPENCER. Very well.

THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to report the same favorably with an amendment. I give notice that I shall move to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator have the amendment printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be printed under the rule, of course.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 24th ultimo, a statement showing the aggregate number of civil officers in or connected with the Navy Department, not including laborers or mechanics employed by the day or contractors, for each of the years named; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate insisted on by the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM R. MORRISON of Illinois, and Mr. JOHN A. KASSON of Iowa managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra;

A bill (H. R. No. 2252) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood;

A bill (H. R. No. 2602) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California;

A bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 4060) to provide for the payment of certain indebtedness incurred in the construction of the New York court-house and post-office building; and

A bill (S. No. 84) extending the time for the redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing a commission to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and other purposes.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Alabama whether this comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia unanimously? I see no member of that committee on this side present.

Mr. SPENCER. It comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the committee are unanimous. The resolution has passed the House, and the committee propose to amend it so as to make it a joint committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the thing taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not yet. It has been read for information. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject for a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, subject to a call for the regular order.

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed to amend the joint resolution by striking out in line 3 the words "two non-residents," and inserting "three members;" by striking out in line 4 the words "District of Columbia and one resident thereof," and inserting "House of Representatives;" by striking out in line 5 the word "appointed," and inserting "designated;" by striking out in line 6 "two residents of said District and one non-resident thereof," and inserting "three Senators;" by striking out in line 7 the word "selected," and inserting "designated;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, &c., That a commission, consisting of three members of the House of Representatives, to be designated by the Speaker of the House, and three Senators, to be designated by the presiding officer of the Senate, is hereby appointed, whose duty it shall be, during the recess of Congress, to prepare a suitable form of government for the District of Columbia, and appropriate draughts of statutes to be enacted by Congress for carrying the same into effect, and report the same to the two Houses, respectively, on the first day of the next session thereof. It shall also be the duty of said commission to prepare and submit to the next session of this Congress a statement of the proper proportion of the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, or any branch thereof, including interest on the funded debt, which should be borne by said District and the United States, respectively, together with the reasons upon which their conclusions are based. Said commission are authorized to employ such assistance as may be needed to enable them to discharge the duties hereby imposed on said commission; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the necessary expenses of said commission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the resolution whether it is usual to provide by law for a joint committee of the two Houses? This is a law making appropriations, and then to provide for a committee of three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives to be appointed.

Mr. SPENCER. To be designated. The resolution as passed by the House provides that two non-residents of the District of Columbia should be appointed and two residents, two by the Speaker and two by the President of the Senate. The Committee on the District of Columbia thought after consultation with numerous citizens that it would be better to appoint members of the respective Houses, and they have amended the resolution accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say it is better. My only inquiry is as to providing by law for each House appointing members of its own on a particular committee. That belongs to their own constitutional privileges.

Mr. SPENCER. As this resolution had passed the House we concluded this would be the shortest way to get at the matter. The House provided that a commission should be appointed, not of members of Congress, and we have amended it so as to provide for a commission of members of Congress. We thought this was the shortest way of getting at it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a joint resolution and is in the nature of a bill with an appropriation, and it requires each House of Congress to do a thing which the Constitution gives them the power to do by a mere resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the Senator will allow this to be finished. It has been up several times.

HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to print ten thousand extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in reference to the Hamburgh riots; on which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will yield for a few moments I should like to call up a House bill that I have tried to get up several times and I think it can be disposed of in a few minutes. It is House bill No. 3849.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I have called for the regular order against my friend from Alabama I would not be courteous to yield to another Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to defend the outrage at Hamburgh. Like many another outrage upon society, it can neither be palliated nor defended, if the facts charged in the documents sent to us are true. But, sir, if this offense, heinous and outrageous as it is, shall be judicially investigated by the courts constituted to arrest, investigate, try, judge, and punish; and if these courts shall visit upon this outrage prompt, condign, and legal punishment, I shall rejoice. I shall rejoice, sir, because of the vindication of outraged law. I shall rejoice that in that community, among a people who claim to have the power to govern themselves, they have succeeded in vindicating that power and have vindicated the majesty of law. They will then have proved their capacity for self-goverment. But they are upon trial. It is for them to vindicate their capacity in the proof that comes from this very situation. If they shall thus vindicate themselves, it will add another proof to the theories of our friends on the other side.

But let me ask those who find in something else the cause of these outrages, why it is that they always occupy their minds and always vex the public ear when important elections are pending? Why is it that we hear so little of them on other occasions and at other times? Why is it that only when the people are upon the eve of an election in which the rulers of the country are to be changed that these outrages come to the public mind and communities are stirred to their very depths by accusations, by tergiversations, by charges of riot and bloodshed and of wrong and injury? Why is it that peace and order and the administration of the law, the vindication of the majesty of the law, are found in all the reconstructed States controlled, governed, and directed by democrats, while from those alone in which some other power is in control do we find these reports of outrages, of broken law, of riot, and of bloodshed?

Mr. EATON. Will my friend from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. I have just received a dispatch which I desire to read in this connection. I had the pleasure yesterday to say here on the floor of the Senate that the election in Alabama had been carried on with absolute fairness. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] avowed that there had been intimidation. Doubtless he believed it; I did not, and I so expressed myself. I have just received this telegram, which I desire to read:

MONTGOMERY, August 9.

Senator W. W. EATON:

Alabama thanks you for your generous defense of her in the Senate yesterday. The election was conducted throughout the State with absolute fairness and without the slightest disturbance or complaint of intimidation that we have heard. The democrats have elected their State ticket by over forty thousand majority, and at least four-fifths of both branches of the Legislature. Negroes in large numbers voted with us.

W. D. GRAHAM,
Chairman Democratic State Committee.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me a moment? I desire to state, in answer to the dispatch read by the Senator from Connecticut, that the majority in Alabama is very large and that on Monday last large republican counties, for instance the county of Greene, which has, ever since the republican party was formed, given over 2,000 majority, voted the democratic ticket; that the county of Sumter, which has a republican majority of 2,000 in it, voted the democratic ticket; that the county of Marengo, which has a republican majority of 2,000, voted the democratic ticket. Those counties voted the democratic ticket simply because the colored people were afraid to go to the polls and vote. The colored people did not vote, and it was intimidation and nothing else, the chairman of the democratic State committee to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, what better answer is there to the arguments of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] than that the State of South Carolina, the State of Louisiana, and the State of Mississippi are the only placers in which they can find these outrages. Why is it that in democratic States, in States that are reconstructed and controlled by democrats, prosperity is returning, peace and order prevail? Why is it that there the freedman is contented and industrious? Why is it that taxation is being reduced, that the communities are orderly, that material prosperity is increasing? Why is it that in all of these States under democratic rule order prevails, business is restored, material wealth grows, taxes lessen, interest on State bonds is being paid, the credit of the State is being restored? Why is this, I ask, while in States that are still under control of others than the democratic party in the South the freedman is discontented and riotous, outrages, blood, and murder are heard of, the people are discontented and unhappy, taxation is redoubled, and the only right that a white man has there is the right to be taxed? Why is it that in all these States material prosperity is lessening, prosperity decreasing? Why is this? Can there be any other answer than that in the latter the power, the control, the interference of the Federal Government exists, and men are not permitted to govern themselves as we do in the North, regulating and controlling our domestic affairs in our own way; our township affairs, our roads, our schools, everything that concerns us as a people from the bottom upward through the township, the county, the State, to the Federal Government; while in these States you undertake to rule them from the top through the power of the Federal Government with the bayonet, through the State, through the governor, through the power that the Federal Government only controls and directs. This is the true answer to it, and it is an answer that goes to the very essence of Saxon liberty. It is an answer that will come to you wherever and whenever you undertake to reverse the traditions of the governments and people from whom you get your liberty and your laws.

The old Saxon form of government, the government of the people themselves in their closest relations to their home life, the home government, home rule, is the only rule for any free people. When you give to these people the entire and absolute control of their institutions themselves; when you take away the Federal bayonet and cease to vex and oppress them by interfering with them, then you will have peace and order; taxation will be reduced; the credit of the Commonwealths will be restored, and you will have contentment and industry and peace and order and just administration of the law.

But it is charged that the free schools are disturbed; it is alleged that education does not prosper in the States that are reconstructed and under democratic control. Such is not the fact. Sir, but yesterday, this week certainly, we have the information from the trustees of the Peabody educational fund that in all the States south save and except alone the States of South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, their school systems are being properly managed and cared for, while in those States the report states that they are not being properly managed, that they are not being cared for. The report of Mr. Stearns, the general agent, is as follows:

The report shows the general flourishing condition of public schools in the Southern States, except in the three States of Florida, South Carolina, and Louisiana. Mr. George Peabody Russell, who has been spending the last winter in the South, gave it as his opinion that nothing could be expected from these States in the way of advancing their educational interests until there was a change in their State governments.

Here is an answer to the educational argument of Senators, and you find this answer everywhere in the democratic South. The charge of the Senator who was last upon the floor in this regard may be placed side by side with the report of the general agent of a nonpartisan independent educational fund, and let the people judge between them.

This is a political discussion. It has degenerated into such. We recognize it; it is declared to be such by our brethren on the other side. We have already had extracts from the letter of acceptance of Mr. Tilden; let me read another brief extract.

Speaking of the South and the negroes, he says:

But, in aid of a result so beneficent, the moral influence of every good citizen, as well as every governmental authority, ought to be exerted, not alone to maintain their just equality before the law, but likewise to establish a cordial fraternity and good-will among citizens, whatever their race or color, who are now united in the one destiny of a common self-government.

Place this declaration side by side with the concluding paragraph of the report of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] on Mississippi, which reads thus:

3. The constitutional guarantee of a republican form of government to every State will require the United States, if these disorders increase or even continue and all milder measures shall prove ineffectual, to remand the State to a territorial condition and through a system of public education and kindred means of improvement change the ideas of the inhabitants and reconstruct the government upon a republican basis.

Follow this with the argument of the cool, clear-headed Senator from Vermont made on this question, in which he looks to reconstructing reconstruction, and then I ask Senators on whose side will those who love peace and order, who believe in the stability of government and in honest payment of the public debt, be found? Senators who occupy the vantage ground of leadership, as do these Senators, do not deliberately conclude their State papers or make their studied addresses without a purpose to execute the conclusions at which they arrive. Sir, is it to be questioned whether the order and law loving people of the North, nay more, sir, the capital of the North, will not scan these declarations with the closest scrutiny? I mistake much their temper if this programme be not the tocsin of danger, the fire-bell in the night, to arouse that capital and those people to the just apprehension of what the entertainment is to which they are invited.

But, sir, this is not all. One of your most pronounced partisan papers but yesterday denounced in unmeasured terms this programme in emphatic and decided language. The New York Times of yesterday, the mouth-piece of the capital of the city of New York on the republican side, emphatically denounces it.

It says:

A more outrageous proposition cannot be easily imagined. That in this centennial year, before the echoes of our national self-glorification have died away, grave Senators should propose to vest somewhere a power which on its face would be equivalent to a confession that the Republic is a failure, is a circumstance that would tax the credulity of any dispassionate observer. Here is the proposition, however, and in a form that leaves no room to doubt the earnestness of its authors. It is a proposition so far in excess of the needs of the occasion, so obnoxious to all who would preserve the administration of the Government in the spirit which has imparted all its vitality and earned for it all its glory, so directly in conflict with the feeling that dominates among the people and, therefore, in a party sense so inexpedient, that we would fain believe its acceptance by the Senate impossible. The reconstructed States are parts of the Union in the same sense that applies to New York or Massachusetts; and it is monstrous to suppose that the Government or any department of it may be clothed with an authority whereby it may "remand a State to a territorial condition," if in the opinion of the partisan majority for the time being the local administration be not "upon a republican basis."

Now, sir, if it shall be, as I said when I began, that in this matter South Carolina shall prove herself able to defend the majesty of the law, we shall all rejoice. If in this duty cast upon her, for it is a duty if she be a sovereign State, to protect life and property, to punish crime, to vindicate the broken law—if in the performance of her duty in this she shall be successful, I and all who act with me will be proud of its accomplishment. But she is upon trial. She cannot as a government controlled by people whom you claim can govern themselves, demand of the Federal Government interference and aid. These people are upon trial. Can they govern themselves? Can they punish crime? If they cannot, let those who can, come to their aid in public affairs through peaceful and home agencies.

Now, Mr. President, with my hand upon my mouth, and my mouth in the dust, with humiliation of face I am compelled to refer to what was said upon the floor of the Senate the other day in regard to the great State which I in part represent. It was in reply to a declaration of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that my colleague said that all the murders committed in Pennsylvania by the Molly Maguires were committed by democrats. My colleague is mistaken, Mr. President. These men are of both political parties; many of them are unnaturalized citizens, desperadoes who come to our Commonwealth from other countries, who consort with the miners, band them together, and form organizations which are violent, arbitrary, and a terror to the people. They have honey-combed several of our counties with crime, and I am humiliated that I am compelled here on the floor of the Senate to admit it as the foulest blot upon the escutcheon of that proud old State. Yet the fact is here, and it is my duty as one of the representatives of her people to say what is the truth.

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded that the Senate might take a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.]

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned I was endeavoring to express a sense of the humiliation that as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania I felt in being required to express here on the floor of the Senate any reason, any cause why she should be unable in any portion of her broad domain to vindicate law and punish crime. But it is here; the question is in the Senate. It has been brought here by the Senator from Ohio and my colleague; and it is my duty to say that however much there may have been of breaches of law and of order, of violence, crime, and bloodshed in that Commonwealth, it is not all attributable to one political party, that both political parties have members among the organization that has committed these violations of law, and that many of its members are unnaturalized desperadoes from other lands. But the communities in which they exist have become, through a species of terrorism they have exercised there, to a large extent demoralized; crime has honey-combed two or three counties, and officials, whether republican or democratic, have become in a manner under the control of this organization. That violence occurs, that murder has occurred, cannot be denied. That the power of the counties has been attempted to be exercised in vain also cannot be denied. I have no recollection that executive power has ever been called there; but, if so, it too has been powerless or weak to stem the tide of lawlessness. But, sir, recently an attempt has been made through the efforts, not, I am sorry to say, of executive power or the power that ought to control it—the police, the grand juries, the sheriffs of the counties—but through a great railroad organization, headed by a democratic president, which placed its police and its power among these desperate men, traced them to their lairs, and is now dragging them to the light and to justice. The courts before which they are being tried are presided over by democrats; the juries before whom they are being tried are selected under a non-partisan jury law; and I believe that six men have been convicted of murder in the first degree. These crimes are now being drawn to the light; the prosecutions are being pressed; these men are being driven to the wall; terrorism is ceasing and law and order is about to prevail in that State in which law and order originated, for from Penn and his followers and their theories came the system of law and obedience to constituted authority that now governs this country. From that Commonwealth more than from any other in the country proceeded recognition of law, of orderly methods, and of peace; and it is my pride to say that the people of that great Commonwealth will immediately, if not through regular channels at least by some power, coerce order, vindicate law, punish crime, and permit no further outrages upon its peace.

I also read in reply to what has been said on this subject what was said to the jury in the trial of one of these men in the county of Schuylkill by the gentleman to whom I have alluded, the counsel for the Commonwealth. I read from the argument of Hon. F. B. Gowen in the court of oyer and terminer of Schuylkill County in the trial of Thomas Munley for the murder of Thomas Sanger, a mining boss:

Then we knew we were freemen. Then we cared no longer for the Molly Maguires. Then we could go to Patsy Collins, the commissioner of this county, and say to him, "Build well the walls of the new addition of the prison; dig the foundations deep and make them strong; put in good masonry and iron bars, for, as the Lord liveth, the time will come when side by side with William Love, the murderer of Squire Gwither, you will enter the walls that you are now building for others." Then we could say to Jack Kehoe, the high constable of a great borough in this county, "We have no fear of you." Then we could say to Ned Monaghan, chief of police, and murderer and assassin, "Behind you the scaffold is prepared for your reception." Then we could say to Pat Conry, commissioner of this county, "The time has ceased when a governor of this State dare to pardon a Molly Maguire; you have had your last pardon." Then we could say to John Slattery, who was almost elected judge of this court, "We know that of you, that it were better you had not been born than that it should be known." Then all of us looked up. Then, at last, we were free, and I came to this county and walked through it as safely as in the most crowded thoroughfares of Philadelphia.

* * * * * * * *

Can you imagine the condition of the people of this country with murderers upon the bench and in the jury-box and in control of all the principal offices of the county? I lived in the apprehension of all this for two years and a half alone, and God knows that when the time comes that all I know may be told to the world it will reveal a history such as will make every American citizen hang his head with shame. I have seen a society of murderers and assassins having its members in the highest places of this county. I have seen them elected to fill the positions of constables and police officers. I have seen a trusted member of that band of murderers a commissioner of the county. I have seen this organization wield a political power in the State which has controlled the elections of a great Commonwealth. I have received the information of meetings between some of the highest officers of the State and the chief of the murderers, at which large sums of money were paid to secure the votes of this infernal association, to turn the tide of a State election. God knows if ever in the world there was a revelation as deep and damning as that now laid open to the people of this Commonwealth for the first time.

Now, Mr. President, can it be, is it to be said that the order-loving people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, that great German population, than whom none respect order and obey law more, that all of the people of that great Commonwealth are to be stigmatized with the crime of a single locality; yet this is the argument that comes to us in regard to the South.

Sir, I have done with this humiliating subject in regard to my own State. I regret that it has come here. I could do no less than I have done. I have given to the Senate what is the truth, the record.

Now I take up, and I am sorry that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is not here, a speech of that Senator delivered in the Senate on the 18th of July, in which he produces a statement from the Treasury Department, which statement is lengthy and elaborate. That Senator said in introducing it:

I have the statement from the Treasury Department; I am going to read it. Some four or five months ago, on the 9th of February, I believe, the Senate passed a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to make a statement from the books of the Treasury of all the defalcations and failures to make settlement, from whatever cause, that had occurred in our country since the 1st of January, 1834. That embraced the last administration of General Jackson. That document was sent here and with it an analysis printed officially. It comes over the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury; it is true.

I propose to examine this valuable document, to test its value by recorded facts, and to see whether its statements are true, or, if they be taken as true, whether they help the cause that it was produced to serve. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury on the 19th of June sent to the Senate a mass of documents, a mass of names, an immense, voluminous document at least five inches in thickness and eighteen inches square. The columns of that document were not added. It appeared upon the face of it that credits were to be entered; it appeared that charges were to be made to the men who were alleged to be defaulters thereon. It was incomplete and unfinished in every particular, and it showed this upon its face. It lies now in the office of the Secretary of the Senate incomplete, unfinished, buried in the tomb of the Committee on Printing. It was not honored by the poor credit of being printed. This was objected to by the Senator from Ohio, and it was sent to the committee as valueless. That document, which was not worthy of being printed, served to produce to the Senate and to the country a mass of figures, a tabular statement and compendium which has been sent to the country and is now being circulated broadcast as a veritable document. Sir, that statement is unreliable and untruthful to show the real defalcations due to the Government, and the Senator from Indiana in the concluding part of his remarks admits it. He says:

The statement is not correct in this, Mr. President, that there are defalcations put down that do not exist, that were afterward settled; but so far as the proportion is concerned between the different administrations, so far as my purpose is concerned in the comparison I propose to make, it is the same as if every defalcation here stated took place. The objection is that the statement is not too small, but too large. I stated wherein it does not present the facts, that some of these defalcations in all administrations were afterward settled or turned out to be nominal; but that pertained just as much to one as to another, and, so far as the object I have in view is concerned, it is a fair statement, because it shows the proportion in all administrations, and now I propose to give it just as it is furnished from the books of the Treasury Department.

But this is not all. The Senator from Indiana says this statement comes here over the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury. This is a mistake. A statement somewhat like that published did accompany it, but it was neither signed nor certified; and the speech of the Senator demonstrates that. It was not signed nor certified in the paper. If the statement of the Senator from Ohio in reference to what was told him by a Treasury official be admitted to be true, if it were verity and intended to impart the truth, why is it not certified to? If true, it would be honored and not discredited as well by the Senator as by the Treasury officials whom he quotes. The published table nowhere shows his certificate, but says it was prepared under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. This statement, so elaborate and complete, so unfinished and mysterious, so untruthful and unreliable, is printed as Senate Document No. 118, and has upon its face the indorsement that it comes from the Treasury; but it has no signature. The documents themselves upon which it is based are not printed because they are unreliable, but the statement printed gives the figures they contain. Why was it not printed? Why is it not certified? Is it authentic? Does it give the truth? The Senator from Indiana admits that it does not. Other Senators admit that it does not, and they quote the officials of the Treasury as discrediting it. When the motion to print was up the Senator from Ohio said of this document as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the printing of the document I should like to have that question referred to the Committee on Printing. I will say that my attention was called to the document itself by an officer of the Government in the Treasury Department. It covers several volumes, most of them matters of no possible moment, which can be of no interest to any mortal man, woman, or child. I think it would do great injustice to thousands of worthy men to print this document. The Secretary of the Treasury in the letter read says he has commenced from the time the last report was made in 1830. There may have been some general statements made in the mean time, but nothing like the detail here. These papers were shown to me. As a matter of course, the Secretary of the Treasury felt bound to go back and do this work. Here [exhibiting] are some of the tables sent here—great, long tables. There are general results from these tables that are shown also in the tabular statements that accompany the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no objection to printing this document except on account of the great cost that will be involved and the unfairness and injustice that will be done to innocent people now in their graves.

Mr. President, these tables show that most of the persons named as defaulting officers were men in the military, naval, and civil service of the United States, who are now dead. The names of their sureties are given here, many of whom are dead; the amounts range from $1 up to $100,000. Scandals without number all over this broad country of ours will be published to the world without any good whatever if we print this document. It gives the accounts of every officer of the Government from 1830 to this time. I notice many cases of this class. During the Indian wars, and during our recent civil war, a soldier may have been killed in battle who was charged with a lot of muskets, and against his account they all stand in the balance charged to him, while it was stated that he was killed in battle, &c. Consuls have died abroad and it has been impossible to settle their accounts, and yet balances are charged at the Treasury Department against the consul. Honorable men, men of the highest rank in the public service, men of the greatest distinction in this country, have little balances charged against them, and they would now be published in the list of defaulters. There may have been nothing due from them, but if there were some little discrepancy in their accounts they are still unbalanced. Such a list would injure greatly the reputation of honorable officers in the civil, military, and naval service, if published, although they are little matters, sometimes amounting to but a few dollars.

The officer to whom I have referred called my attention to the fact that while the Department was obeying a simple, plain duty, no one pretended that this money was due by these people; and yet it is charged on the books of the Treasury Department as a claim against them, but it never would be and never could be settled.

On the objection of the Senator from Ohio this voluminous, this unreliable document was sent to the Committee on Printing. It came back to the Senate on the 27th of June with a report against printing the document, but for printing the tabular statement that contains its results. The aggregate of the document was reported in favor of, but the document itself was reported against. On that day the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] said:

It contains a list of all persons, including those not now in the public service, against whom there appears to be a balance on the books of the Treasury. In very many instances the balance is nominal, not real, sometimes so designated; in very many cases it arises out of misunderstanding between the disbursing officer and the accounting officers of the Treasury, which, when they come to be explained and adjusted, may be decided in favor of one party or the other. In very many instances it arises from balances due from officers of the Navy who have gone down with their ships with their papers upon them; officers of the Army who have fallen in battle or died in hospital and whose vouchers have been lost; while it is apparent from the supplies which they had purchased and from the men whom they had paid that the money intrusted to them had been expended for the purposes for which it was appropriated. According to the law these all appear upon the books of the Treasury as indebted for the unsettled balances; for, while the Treasury charges an officer with everything paid to him, it does not credit him with what he has paid out until it is ascertained and adjusted according to regulations of the Department. Many of these are charges for overpayments; that is, where an officer has erroneously paid to some creditor of the Government more than he was legally authorized to receive; and of course the disbursing officer must suffer the consequence of his error. That is a blunder, but it is not a crime. He has not embezzled the money; he has not defrauded the Government; he has made a mistake and paid a man a thousand dollars, for example, when it appears from all the information yet in the possession of the Treasury that he only ought to have paid him $990; and therefore he stands as a defaulter for $10 on the books of the Treasury. This may in many cases remain yet open for adjustment. I am sure that nobody wants to publish the names of such men, living and dead, as embezzlers and defaulters in any criminal sense.

The great defalcations, the criminal defalcations, are all known; they are all made public; they cannot be concealed without criminal complicity of the accounting officers. They are put in suit against the defaulters and against their bondsmen; and other cases are put in suit, the results of which do not always show that the officer is a defaulter. There may be cases of honest differences of opinion between the officer and the Department as to the law, which are to be settled by the courts. A great many cases grew up before the present improved system of keeping the accounts, when disbursing officers who were also receiving officers received the revenues of the Government, disbursed the expenses of their Departments, and turned over the balance to the Treasury. That system prevailed until it was reformed in our day, and under that system the result of every difference of opinion between a disbursing officer and the Department would stand as a defalcation against him. Some of these cases are so trifling that I have collated a few of them. Although I should not read the name of any person who would suffer by it, I suppose the illustrious name of Washington Irving will not suffer if I say that he stands here as a defaulter to the amount of three cents! Here is another officer in the list whom I was instrumental, among others, in commending to the public service, in which he greatly distinguished himself. I shall hold myself responsible for his defalcation, principal and interest in gold. It amounts to one cent. I do not suppose anybody will think that Robert Walsh was an embezzler or defaulter to the Government, and yet he is put down for a small amount. Here I find an old colonel whom I knew well, who died in 1854, who is marked as a defaulter for $3.60.

Mr. President, I do not wish to impair the credit of the great banking house of this city, but I am bound to say that Corcoran & Riggs stand down here as defendants under this call.

Baring Brothers are down, and, worse than that, the English government itself is put down as a defaulter. As we have just settled nearly all our old difficulties with England and got into a new one, I do not wish to see the credit of that government impaired, and for its relief I must say that a marginal note reads: "The Secretary of State says he has no doubt this was settled long ago." It occurred in 1813, but it stands on the books as over $1,200 of default by the British government.

Mr. President, I might go over a great many illustrations of the same kind, but I have made quite sufficient to show that, while there are of course in the great operations of the Treasury many defaulters and many embezzlers, nothing could be more unjust than to mix them up with these persons who are marked in default in the Treasury, but who are not defaulters in any sense whatever, and probably do not owe the Government anything. Certainly it is not likely that Corcoran & Riggs, Baring Brothers, and the British government owe the Treasury anything.

That is what Senators said in regard to this document, and yet the table is printed. They discredit the source, they deny its truth, they repudiate its statements; yet they order its results to be printed and preserved, and it is used as a campaign document. They make campaign speeches upon it. They quote it as true, and they calculate results from it. What becomes of political fairness if such proceedings as these are to be countenanced by the Senate? What becomes of the verity, the truthfulness of the record of the Senate if statements of this kind are to be printed and filed with our records to remain there as official documents from the Treasury Department? The basis of this statement was bad, the structure unsound, and the results it produces are utterly and absolutely unreliable. The statement is incorrect in every particular; the losses are not truthfully stated, and necessarily the conclusions are not correct; and yet the Senator from Indiana prints the statement and relies upon it. A leader of the House—I dare not refer to what is said in the House; but in the RECORD of Sunday I find a speech that also relies upon this and quotes it in extenso, to a figure, administration by administration, the ratio of losses fixed by this most veracious document. It is quoted by the republican leader of the House, not by him alone, but another prominent republican gentleman of the House in his speech also quotes and relies on it.

It is for us to test this statement by known facts, ascertain whether it is true, discover for ourselves whether it can be relied upon, learn whether this is the kind of budget to be given to an intelligent people on the eve of a great political contest by the Senate of the United States from which the people are to make up a verdict which is to control their destinies for four years. Let us examine it by the tests of the record; let us examine it by printed documents; let us test its truth by that which cannot be gainsaid, and if we find that not only have Senators here discredited it, but that on its face it bears falsehood, then the cause that it attempts to serve must be baseless and bad indeed.

At the outset it may be said that it is of course difficult for those who are in opposition to obtain the necessary access to records to get the data on which to contradict a statement of this character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. WALLACE. I mean by that that we are compelled to grope our way through printed records. We go for data to the Treasury Department, and find it occupied with something else; to other Departments, and printed orders intervene; and when we go to the Treasury we cannot get a voluminous mass of documents in time to serve our purposes, and yet Senators get it. I do not pretend to say that there is any willful disposition to refuse information, yet I say that printed orders are in the road, that time cannot be given to the officials to furnish the documents in time for use on such occasions as this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, because that is rather a serious implication, I wish to say for one, and I feel pretty sure that I am stating the truth, that no discrimination whatever is made in the Treasury, or any other Department, between Senators, with regard to their political faith, or their race, or color, or whatever, and the Senator can get all the information from the Treasury that my honorable friend from Massachusetts, an Ex-Secretary, can, at any time.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no doubt that I can get it; it will not be denied, but it will not come in time to serve the purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will come in the same time that it will for anybody else.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator may have that opinion, but I am entitled to mine. We are obliged to grope through printed data; we are obliged to meet the accusations that we find on this printed statement in the best way we can. If we prove its falsehood in vital points we think we shall have disposed of it. If we prove that it is untrue and false in certain vital points, the maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus applies, and we can rely on the people to fail to believe its reliability as a whole.

The Senator from Indiana states that during the last term of President Jackson, from January 1, 1833, to December 31, 1837, or as it should be, from March 4, 1833, to March 4, 1837, the ratio of loss by defalcations was $10.55 per $1,000, and he relies on this statement to demonstrate this and the figures given by it he says is the actual amount of defalcation. This statement shows, and he relies upon it, that there were losses by receiving officers of $1,383,825, and there were losses by disbursing officers of $1,163,000, a total loss of $2,547,000. Here is a specific, distinct, and accurate statement apparently. Let us see how fallacious it is; how wild a statement these loose data furnish. It is fortunate that we have the data for these four years or we could not meet these charges; but it happens that on the records is found a report of Hon. Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, made in 1839, to the House of Representatives, in which the real losses by defalcations from 1789 up to that date are stated. That report is found in House Document No. 10 of the Twenty-sixth Congress, first session. It shows the losses by receiving officers to be $214,648, not $1,383,000. It shows the losses by disbursing officers to be $230,336, not $1,163,000; total losses on both sides $444,984, not $2,547,601; thus making the trifling difference of $2,102,000. On the figures of the Senator from Indiana this difference makes the ratio $1.87 per thousand of losses in place of $10.55. Can we rely upon data of this character, when we find upon the records of the Government a statement over the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury palpably, plainly, distinctly saying that instead of the losses being $2,547,000 for those four years they were $444,984? From one we learn all. I have extracted these figures, and have a table which I annex:

Extracts from statement of aggregate amount of defalcations and ratio of losses from 1789 to March 4, 1837, furnished December 30, 1839, to Congress and found in House Document No. 10, first session Twenty-sixth Congress, including public debt.

Mr. Secretary Woodbury in his report on the finances made to Congress December 3, 1839, discusses this subject so broadly and specifically and so thoroughly refutes this nameless statement as to its figures, that I quote him:
